How can the Committee on Appropriations monopolize the power of the Senate? It is within the power of every other committee to put gyves upon our wrists in this Chamber if we refuse to appropriate as they wish us to appropriate, by securing the adoption of appropriations if they are such as to meet the judgment of Senators upon this floor and can be met by the revenues of the Government.

When you come to analyze the system as to these appropriations, you find that there is no wrong; and yet it is proposed now, without reference to a committee, without giving a standing committee of the body the power to give us their judgment upon the question, to put the Senate to a yea-and-nay vote upon a single proposition which takes away from the Committee on Appropriations the jurisdiction which it has over these bills, and thus practically declare that the committee itself shall be disbanded.

It may be a wise thing in these modern days; it may be a wise thing in a Senate of 90 members to thus, without the examination of any one of its committees, upon the motion of a single member of this body, brought in here without much debate up to this time, to take a vote upon a proposition to divide among the committees of the body the great power of appropriating money in accordance with law, if it be a great power, or if it be one of the ordinary powers which appertain to this body, to take from the committee especially designated for that purpose, most of its members having devoted the greater portion of their term of service to membership upon it, the power of supervision and control, and divide that power among the various committees here proposed.

Mr. HILL. I understand the Senator from Iowa to complain because this resolution has not been referred to the Committee on Rules and reported upon by that committee.

Mr. ALLISON. No, Mr. President; the Senator is mistaken. I do not complain.

Mr. HILL. The Senator makes the point and argues that the resolution ought to have been so referred. I simply desire to call his attention to the fact that no one has made any such motion, that no one made such a motion on the day the resolution was presented, and no one made any such motion after the argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS]. I desire further to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are some ten or fifteen, and I do not know but more, amendments to the rules—good, bad, and indifferent—which have been referred to the Committee on Rules, and that committee has not made a report, either adversely or favorably. It has made no report in this Chamber in five years.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, this proposition has been before the Senate a number of times. In the speech which I made here on the 11th day of December I called attention to the fact that the Committee on Rules would not report back these proposed amendments; and I gave the Senate notice in that speech that I wished them to consider the resolution on its merits, so that when they sent it to the Committee on Rules it should go there with the vote of the Senate showing how the Senate stood on the proposition. The distinct proposition was laid down in my remarks that the resolution was not to be referred to the Committee on Rules because we could never get a report from the Committee on Rules in regard to it.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly the Senator, before committing the resolution to the committee, asked the Senate to decide, and then have it referred to a committee. We all understood that. But the Committee on Rules, at the time the resolution was offered, and when the Senator's speech was made, was an imperfect committee, and not organized. That committee now consists of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], who is chairman, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN]. Here are seven of the Senators of this body who are familiar to us. Is it a wise thing for us to deal with a great question like this, imperfectly presented to us, without the report of a committee? Are we to decide and judge first, and hear the evidence afterwards?

I do not complain; it is not a subject of complaint in this body; but we have provided a number of committees selected to deal with particular questions in the division of powers in this body, and here is a great Committee on Rules, familiar with all parliamentary rules of procedure, organized for the consideration of such a subject as this, and yet the Senate is called upon by a yea-and-nay vote to deal with the question, when it has never been examined, so far as we know, except by a single member of this body. Mr. President, this is an exceptional thing. You may ransack your records and you will find that no important question has ever been considered in this Chamber that met with discussion or debate which was not first referred to a standing or select committee of this body. Nothing is passed here without unanimous consent, unless it has been first referred to a committee and had the judgment of the men who are selected to investigate such questions as are submitted to their care.

I have occupied much longer time than I intended; but I repeat here is a great public question going to the very foundation of public expenditures, relating to the credit of this nation, that is sought to be dealt with here by Senators without reference to a committee. I may be wholly mistaken in my views regarding it; I may be wrong; but I believe where proposed legislation is projected into this body and an attempt made to secure its adoption here and in the other House, under which large expenditures of money would be made, it is wise that those expenditures should be supervised by a committee designated by this body for that purpose, and that those expenditures should, from year to year, and from time to time, have some relation to the condition of the Treasury of the United States, and its power to pay the expenditures authorized by the appropriations.

I know perfectly well—and I make no distinction in that respect—that the honorable Senators who preside over these various committees have probably greater ability and more knowledge of the special topics committed to their charge than has the Committee on Appropriations. But what I am undertaking to show is that if the argument upon which these changes are to be made is a sound one, it is an argument for the dismemberment and destruction of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. What right has the Senator to assume in his argument, as he does, that any one of the committees named in the resolution is not as competent to deal with appropriation bills as a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, one of the last observations I made was that they are just as capable, and I have no doubt more capable than the Committee on Appropriations. I certainly do not impugn the ability or the capability or the power of any committee of this body. We are all equal here, thank God.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator assume that those committees will be more negligent of the laws than the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not. I have wholly failed in my argument if I have not shown that the wisdom in the consideration of these questions lies in the fact that when the law authorizes the expenditure of money and when that expenditure is authorized to be made there should be some committee having charge of all these appropriations, in order that we may see that the credit of our Government is maintained and continued, and that our appropriations are somewhere within the limits of our revenue. That is my argument, if it is worth anything.

Mr. NELSON. Does the Senator maintain that the only guardian of this matter is the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. President, the efforts of the Senator and his allies remind me of a pamphlet, a very eloquent and able paper, which had much influence during the war. Its title was "How a free people conduct a long war." I perceive that the Committee on Appropriations is very earnestly opposed to this measure, and that it is prolonging a very able debate, I do not say beyond proper limitations; but in the meantime I hope it is not gaining any recruits from this side of the question.

The only thing about this proposition which gives me any sort of regret or hesitancy is that I am afraid some of the men whom I most love in the world do not like it, but I do no not think that ought to stand in the way of my sincere judgment of what will be better for the Senate and for the legislation of the country.

The very wide field of appropriations still left open to that great committee covers some of the most important bills, carrying a multitude of items in which there is most likely to be extravagance. That is evident.

There are but eleven subjects of expenditure that are to be distributed, and the name is legion of the matters to be attended to outside of those eleven bills. I can not help supposing that it is better to give a great subject to a committee of men who ordinarily have some special reason for being on a committee than to give it to three men, which practically is the rule now. The upshot of it is the consideration of three men in the Committee on Appropriations, with whom I find no fault, with whom my intercourse has been agreeable.

I have been to them many and many a time to get slight changes made in appropriation bills, sometimes to add something to the expenditure; sometimes I was backed by the favorable judgment and report of some select committee. I do not complain of the reception given me there; but I have more than once felt that the two or three gentlemen, able as they were in general and in the general field of appropriations, did not know as much about some things as some other committees did, and I will give you one reason.

To speak of what I know most about, and not because I have any special reason for boasting at all, I sincerely think the Committee on Military Affairs could better consider and dispose of a bill to support the military establishment than any three gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee. One reason is that we are eleven in number, and that we are decently qualified you may perhaps infer from the tabulation which I have just made. There are eleven men on the committee. Eleven of them have been soldiers on one side or the other. Seven of them were bred to the law and have more or less given themselves to the practice of the law. Six of the eleven have been honored by their States with what with us in New England is the high office of governor; and two of them have been Secretaries of War.

I submit that the odds are that we can as speedily and with a better knowledge of the subject pass upon the details of the bill for the maintenance of the Army than can the gentlemen of the Appropriations Committee.

I confess that one of my reasons for wishing this thing is that I would rather have the bill for the support of the Army for three or four weeks in the Military Committee room than to have it three days in the hands of three men of the Committee on Appropriations. I think there will be no danger of our being extravagant. I think we may be even a little wiser than the Committee on Appropriations sometimes are in diminishing the sums given some few things and raising the sums given to others.

I am not troubled, Mr. President, with a fear of the extravagance of the United States Senate. I do not apprehend that the eleven committees would rush the Government into a deficit of revenue, for I think we are as anxious to have wise appropriations and appropriations that come within the just needs of the public service as they are.

I am sure, speaking for the Committee on Military Affairs—other committees will speak for themselves—that it would not desire to unduly increase appropriations, and would have some regard for the general condition of the revenue and for the propriety of all subjects referred to them.

I am not prepared to make a long speech, and do not care to. I have practically nothing more to say. I shall vote for this change in the rules.

One thing further, however, occurs to me. The Senator from Iowa complains that this matter has not been referred to and reported upon by the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules, I hope, will forgive me—I do not mean to be discourteous—but if the Senator will read the list of members who constitute that committee I think he will find that every solitary man of them is opposed to the proposed change. If he will consult history he will find that this subject has been before the Committee on Rules more than once, and never has had the honor of being reported adversely or of being reported at all.

I admit that this proceeding is a little bit revolutionary, but I think we can forgive our friend from Idaho for learning something so early.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho if he desires to press the resolution to a vote this evening?

Mr. DUBOIS. I do. I very much desire to have a vote on the resolution this evening.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to make one or two observations about the resolution before the vote is taken. I shall be brief, because the hour is late and I do not think the matter which I have to submit is very weighty anyhow.

This proposed change in the rules is not a new matter to my thoughts. I have long felt that the present arrangement, by which all these important matters were referred to one committee, was wrong in two aspects—wrong as a deprivation of other members of the Senate of their equal participation in the important legislation of the Senate, and wrong in another aspect, that these bills come to us very frequently from the House of Representatives at so late a period in the session that time is not allowed for one committee to give that calm and deliberate consideration which the matters deserve. So I am informed, and it has been so stated in the debate here to-day, that the committee has found it necessary to act by subdivision. Being a large committee, and it being impossible from the lateness of the season and the want of time for the whole committee to act, they proceed at once to divide out the various appropriation bills to subcommittees composed of three Senators.

Mr. COCKRELL. Those subcommittees report back to the full committee and the full committee considers their action.

Mr. GEORGE. I am very glad the Senator told me that. When any of the committees, if the resolution shall pass, shall have acted upon a matter, they will report to a higher body than the Committee on Appropriations for their final action and judgment.

So there seems to have been, so far as I have listened to the debate, a kind of tacit concession made on all sides that the Appropriations Committee possesses almost the power of legislation and of determining what shall be appropriated and what shall not be. I do not understand that to be the office of any committee. The Senate has committees for one purpose and for one purpose only, and that is to inquire into the subject-matter referred to them and then to report to the Senate their best judgment as to that subject-matter. If that is the condition, it seems to me there can be no dispute about the proposition that the various committees named in the amendment to the rules—I will call some of them: The Committee on Agriculture, the Committee on Foreign Relations, the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, the Committee on Indian Affairs, etc.—have better opportunities for discharging the duty which the Senate imposes upon them by referring to them a bill than this general committee.

The Committee on Military Affairs, as was stated by the honorable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], taking it for an example, is composed entirely of men who at some time in their lives have been devoted to the military profession. That committee has charge of the whole military establishment. It is its duty to look into and inquire what laws ought to be passed, what regulations ought to be made, how many soldiers we ought to have, what kind of guns we ought to have, and all that sort of thing. It seems to me that on a bill providing money for the military establishment of the country the powers of that committee ought not to stop at the very point where they are most essential. The committee can inquire, it can decide how many soldiers we ought to have, what sort of guns we ought to have, and all that, but it can not decide how much money shall be appropriated for the purpose.

Mr. President, it seems to me that is not the right thing to do. So with the other committees. Every one of them, if they discharge the duty imposed on them by the rules of the Senate, ought to be familiar, and more familiar than anybody else, with the special subjects to which their duties relate. They have no power, as I remarked, except to recommend, and is not the recommendation of the Naval Committee, for instance, as to how many ships we need, what kind of ships we ought to have, how much money we ought to appropriate for them, better than the recommendation of a committee which is charged in this general way under our rules with a kind of supervision or jurisdiction over the whole affairs of the country? So on that ground, Mr. President, I favor the resolution.

But it is urged that if we divide out the appropriation bills no relation will be preserved between the money we appropriate and the money we have on hand to appropriate. Let us see how that is. In the first place I ought to observe that it is the sworn duty of every Senator here in the discharge of every office given to him by the Senate to perform the duties of that office with reference solely to the public good and not to be influenced by a kind of esprit de corps to favor the Department over which he has supervision in preference to any other Department. I will not assume, therefore, that the Military Committee, or the Naval Committee, or the Post-Office Committee will be influenced by any other consideration than a desire to appropriate the exact money which is needed for the public service and which the condition of the Treasury will enable them to appropriate.

But it is said that each committee, not knowing what the report of every other committee is, may make extravagant appropriations, may make appropriations beyond the means of the Treasury. But the reply to that is as stated by the Senator from Florida in reference to the river and harbor bill, that the last and final tribunal to decide how much money is to go to this thing and to that thing and to every other thing is the Senate. When it was urged that the Committee on Commerce had appropriately discharged its duties in reference to rivers and harbors, it was suggested that very large appropriations, too large appropriations, had been reported; and the Senator from Florida very properly stated that the Senate cut them down and made them right and proper. The Senate can do that with reference to every other bill.

Now, one other observation, and I believe I shall have said all I desire to say upon the subject. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] seems to complain that the amendment is illogical; that we ought to have gone further; that we ought to have conferred upon the Judiciary Committee power to consider appropriation bills with reference to the judiciary; and other amendments were suggested. I desire to state, in response to that argument, that as the rule now is, as was well suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], we have departed from the rules of logic on the subject. We have already taken away one of the appropriation bills from the general Appropriations Committee and have given it to the Committee on Commerce.

I wish to state further that it is the chief excellence of Anglo-Saxon institutions that they are illogical. Those institutions have grown up according to the needs and according to the experience of the people who live under them, and there is nothing now more illogical than the Constitution of the United States. The very first section of the Constitution says that all legislative power is granted to a Congress composed of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and yet there is another provision which says that a bill can not become a law without the approval of the President. Another provision of the Constitution vests all judicial power in the Supreme Court of the United States, and such other courts inferior to that as may, from time to time, be established. And yet, in the very same Constitution, we have a provision that a very large part of the judicial power of the United States is vested in this body—the trial of impeachments, and a part of it in the House of Representatives—the preferring of articles of impeachment. Then in reference to the executive power vested in the President in another part of the Constitution there is an apparent contradiction. There is not the logical sequence of giving to the President, as the Constitution says in that article, all executive power; but we find this body associated with the President in the making of treaties and the appointment of officers.

Then in another part, when all officers are to be appointed by the President of the United States, it provides that those officers of the United States who happen to be officers of the Senate shall be elected by the Senate, and those officers of the United States who happen to be officers of the House of Representatives shall be elected by the House of Representatives.

So there is nothing in the argument that we are illogical or inconsistent. All Anglo-Saxon people when they have come to arrange institutions of government have not undertaken to pursue the rules of logic to their final conclusion; but they have adopted this thing and that thing or the other thing, sometimes a little contradictory and crossing the lines of each other, because experience and observation have shown that those inconsistent provisions in the Constitution and in our institutions are best for the Anglo-Saxon people. We are bound by the rules of logic only when we undertake to prove the truth of a single proposition, when we have legitimate and honest and true premises; but when we come to framing institutions for a people we are bound to follow the rules of common sense, the rules of experience, the rules of expediency—those things which our common sense, our observation, and our experience have shown to be best.

Now, what has experience shown in reference to a division of the appropriation bills? We are not without experience on that subject. The House of Representatives several years ago adopted about the same thing, I believe, which is proposed to be adopted here. Has any complaint arisen as to the practice in the House under the changed rule? On the contrary, we find every single member of this body who served in the House of Representatives under those rules testifying here to their excellence. It was said on the one hand, that if we divided out the bills it would largely increase the appropriations, and it was answered on the other that that had not been the experience in the other House, and we had the very extraordinary assertion that the House committees on purpose refused to appropriate the necessary amount in order that the Senate should take upon themselves the odium, if it be an odium, and I do not think it is, of adding to the appropriation bills the amount necessary to carry on the Government.

Here let me make one observation in reply to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. He spoke of the large urgent deficiency bills as being made necessary by the parsimony of the other House. Does the Senator forget that there can be no insufficient appropriation by the House alone; that there must be the concurrence of the Senate as well as of the House in order that there can be a deficient appropriation bill? He seems to have forgotten that proposition. So if there be anything in the suggestion which was made, I believe, by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] that the other House did not make the necessary appropriations for some reason or other which was satisfactory to them, I answer by the statement that if they sent such bills to us we have failed to do our duty as to supplying the deficit.

Mr. CALL. We did our duty and the House would not assent to it.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, I crave the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes. For the sake of brevity partly, but more for fear that my treacherous voice might give out and I would be compelled, following an illustrious example, to pass the penciling over to the Senator from New Hampshire to read, I have reduced what I wish to say to writing. The notes were made while the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] was speaking, and as he is not in his seat to be embarrassed by the remark I may say that the Senate will understand how very difficult it was while the smooth, mellifluous, and captivating flow of his eloquence was going on to give attention to anything else.

I can not see the danger of increased appropriations from this proposed change. It makes a number of committees who would naturally make common cause against amendments in the Senate increasing appropriations, while it is often the case that they now make common cause, and successfully, to increase them. Now, it is a proposition almost self-evident, and one that I do not think the members of the Committee on Appropriations will seek to controvert, that with a given fixed sum of money the committees on the subject-matter of the general appropriation bills could distribute this money to the best advantage, because they are constantly acquiring, session after session, a personal knowledge of the needs of their branches of the public service.

Take the $5,000,000, for example, which is appropriated by the District of Columbia appropriation bill. That bill provides for the building and repairing of streets, alleys, sewers, aqueducts, support of schools, hospitals, prison, jails, etc. The District of Columbia Committee make many visits in the course of the year to the objects of the appropriation, and become personally acquainted with the situation.

The same is true in a great measure of the other committees. The Committee on Military Affairs is in constant communication with the Department and officers of the Army, who come from all parts of the country, and its members necessarily acquire in the course of their term of service, long or short, a large amount of information.

There is a large element of safety in this change, by reason of this personal knowledge. Personal observation is the best evidence; and parties naturally go to the committee having the subject-matter in charge with their views, pro and con, on any matter under consideration. So they are all the time accumulating information. On the other hand, the Committee on Appropriations can have little knowledge except what they acquire in the very brief and hurried hearing in the committee room. The hearing is so hurried necessarily that there is little opportunity to get adverse evidence. This gives the persistent beggar a great advantage.

Now, it being granted, as it must be, that the committee on the subject can make the best distribution of a given sum, then the only remaining question is, can they not be trusted to fix the sum? I fully believe they can. Every committee will take pride in keeping within proper limits. The several committees will naturally stand by each other in the Senate to resist an increase, while the present system tends to lead applicants for amendments to combine against the Committee on Appropriations. We have all seen this tendency and its resulting evils. If the change should result in increasing expenses, the Senate can be trusted to apply a remedy by limiting the sum of the appropriations and specifying the amount, if necessary, that each should have. That is an improbable event, but it is a remedy that would certainly be applied if the evil should be found to exist.

Mr. COCKRELL. How long would it take the Senate to come to a conclusion as to the amount that the respective committees should allow to each branch of the service?

Mr. PROCTOR. I do not think it necessary to cross that river until we come to it. I have no doubt means will be found to cross it if we ever reach such a river. But I do not believe we ever will.

The Senators coming here from the other body bear strong testimony that the distribution works well there. We hear of no suggestion of its returning to the old system. I do not believe there would ever be any such suggestion here if the change was once made.

The opponents of this measure claim that it is a slight upon the Committee on Appropriations to make this change. Certainly there is no such feeling on my part. I have always been well used by that committee. I have never sought to go on it. The committee is a very able one, and has done its work as well as such a tremendous overburden of work could be done in the short time available for it.

I now come to a point to which I have been asked to refer. I should not have spoken at all except for it. The Committee on Appropriations, if the change is made, will, in my opinion, have more important work and be more desirable as an assignment than any other business committee, if I may use that term. Certainly I should prefer it to any other committee except Finance. I would gladly exchange, if this transfer of bills is made, any two committee assignments I have outside of a chairmanship. Why, Mr. President, a committee having the sundry civil bill in charge would have, I believe, with the 381 items of that bill, more work, if it gave proper time to its consideration, than any other committee of this body. Nearly all of its provisions require separate consideration. They cover the entire country and an infinite variety of subjects. Again, Mr. President, this committee will have, if this change is made, in my opinion, more to do than its entire work when this committee was first constituted. It has grown—especially the sundry civil bill—with great rapidity, and must continue to increase as the country grows and public wants increase. I have looked back to a period of twenty to twenty-five years ago, and I think anyone must be satisfied that more time should now be given to the three bills than was then required for all the bills.

I will refer to some of the appropriations. Take, for example, the appropriations for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1871. The sundry civil bill was then thirteen million and odd thousand dollars. It is now, in the last bill, $46,000,000. The legislative bill has increased less, but it has increased from $18,000,000 to about $22,000,000. The entire appropriations for that year were $161,000,000, and this included the deficiency bills, which were more than double what they were the present year. It also included the Army bill at that time, which was also considerably larger, as the military establishment has been reduced since. It was a third larger. The pensions were $30,000,000. So it can be readily seen that, taking those items and considering that many of the appropriations, especially the Post-Office, which was then over $26,000,000, the entire service then was decidedly less than would be required now, I believe, on a single bill; certainly less than would be required on all three, which aggregate $80,000,000.

But, Mr. President, I did not intend to take so much time. I have, as I said, no criticism to make on the Committee on Appropriations. I do not believe any can justly be made. But I believe in this change upon principle, that it is the truest system; that it will work well in practice, as it has in the other House, according to the great balance of testimony. I do not attach much weight to the scarecrows and prognostications of disaster with which the Senator from Iowa has favored us. He fights bravely, as he ought, to present his side of the case, to retain all the great powers and duties of his committee. I respect him for it. If any were needed, it furnishes another evidence of his eminent qualifications for the highest position in the gift of the people. I say that in his absence. I almost wonder, in view of the great trouble that he has imagined, that the Senator did not claim that the unprecedented low state of the barometer to-day was a protest from the very heavens against this change. But I have faith to believe that the skies will clear, and that the sun will shine, and that the atmosphere of this Chamber will calm down, whatever way this question is decided. The measure is right in principle, and there is no question in my mind but that the Senate will go on safely, easily, and harmoniously under it when once adopted.

Mr. BURROWS. Mr. President, I dislike very much to trespass upon the attention of the Senate, but I have been requested by several Senators, by reason of the fact that I have had the opportunity for many years in the House of Representatives to witness the practical working of a distribution of the appropriation bills, to say just a word in relation to it.

I happened to be a member of the other House when the distribution of the appropriation bills was made. It was resisted there at the time as it has been resisted here, and I believe it is a matter of parliamentary history that from the hour all appropriations were committed to one committee in the House of Representatives every effort to distribute appropriations and divide responsibility had been met with the severest opposition. It is but human. Men love power and will not readily surrender it.

The distribution of these bills in the House of Representatives occurred in the Forty-ninth Congress, at the instance of the Committee on Rules, composed at that time of the Speaker, Mr. Carlisle; the Representative from Pennsylvania, Mr. Randall, an ex-Speaker; Mr. Morrison, of Illinois, now on the Interstate Commerce Commission; Mr. REED, and Mr. Hiscock, a committee of five distinguished and experienced legislators and parliamentarians. After thorough consideration of the matter by that committee, they reported unanimously in favor of the distribution of the appropriation bills, with the single exception of Mr. Randall. The report was presented by Mr. Morrison, of Illinois, and I hold that report in my hand, from which I desire to read some brief extracts as showing the considerations which influenced the Committee on Rules of the House in making the proposed distribution, and in this extract we have a brief, but interesting history of the division of appropriations.

For nearly forty years—

This report says—

of our history the appropriations were made in one act, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Government."

One bill, it will be observed, covering the entire service of the Government.

The first separate bill for the expenses of the Post-Office Department was passed in 1844.

In 1847 the appropriations were made in nine separate bills, namely: Army, civil and diplomatic, deficiencies, fortifications, Indians, Military Academy, Navy, pensions, and Post-Office.

In 1856 the consular and diplomatic appropriations were for the first time embodied in a separate bill. In 1857 the legislative, executive, and judicial bill first appeared in its present form.

In 1862 the sundry civil bill was established, containing the various miscellaneous items not embraced in the other bills, and in 1880 the Agricultural and District of Columbia bills were established, the Agricultural bill being transferred to the Committee on Agriculture. With but few exceptions the river and harbor bill was prepared and reported by the Committee on Commerce until the creation of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, in 1883, when it was assigned to that committee.

As showing the great increase of appropriations for the support of the Government, it may be stated that each one of our principal general appropriation bills embraces as much money as the whole amount of the net ordinary expenditures of the Government during the first ten years of its existence, and the specific objects to be investigated and provided for in these bills have so greatly increased in number that it has become a very considerable task even to enumerate them. For several years past the various general appropriation bills have been reported at such late periods in the session as to preclude their careful and thorough investigation by members not on the Committee on Appropriations.

The committee is of opinion that the distribution proposed will enable all these bills to be reported at earlier periods in the session, will permit a more careful and thorough consideration of each bill by the committee having jurisdiction of it, and also by the House, resulting in more considerate and economic legislation, and will obviate the necessity for the passage of any of these bills under a suspension of the rules, which has been so frequently done in late years.

This proposition, as I said, coming from the Committee on Rules and reported unanimously, except for the dissenting opinion of Samuel J. Randall, of Pennsylvania, was debated for several days in the House of Representatives and finally, at the close of the debate, with a view of testing the sense of the House on the single question of distributing the appropriation bills, a motion was made to strike out of the report that portion of it which distributed the appropriation bills to the several committees named, and upon a yea-and-nay vote the yeas were 70 and the nays 227—a most decisive vote. So the distribution was consummated, six bills remaining with the Committee on Appropriations and eight distributed to the several committees having jurisdiction of the subject-matter embraced in the several bills.

For ten years this system has been in operation in the House of Representatives, and I never heard during my membership in that body, after this distribution, the faintest suggestion from any source that it would be wise or desirable to return to the old practice; and I have no hesitancy in saying that in my judgment if such a proposition were made to-day in the House it would not command a dozen votes in that body.

There were several reasons which actuated the House in making this distribution. First, it was thought that it was a fitting thing to do. No one was then able to present any sufficient reason why, for instance, the Committee on Agriculture, having that subject particularly in charge, should not make the appropriations for that Department. Their attention is entirely given to that subject, and it was thought not only a fitting, but a wise and appropriate thing to do to allow the Committee on Agriculture to make the appropriations for that Department. So with the Committee on Foreign Affairs and all the other committees.

The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] the other day suggested that this proposition is more sweeping than the proposition of the House, because it proposes to take from the Committee on Appropriations the bill for fortifications. Let me suggest to the Senator that the reason why that bill was not taken from the Committee on Appropriations at the time the distribution was made was because under the House rules there was no committee on fortifications. Had there been such a committee at that time I have no doubt it would have been given control of the appropriation for coast defenses.

But without going over each of these committees——

Mr. HALE. That is not the only difference between the pending proposition and the practice in the other House.

Mr. BURROWS. No; pensions and the District of Columbia were left with the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. There were six bills, were there not?

Mr. BURROWS. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. And there never has been any proposition since the Committee on Fortifications was provided for for sending the bill to any committee except the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BURROWS. No; there is no committee in the House on fortifications, so that the bill had to go from necessity to the general Committee on Appropriations. But there is a Committee on Fortifications and Coast Defenses of the Senate, and I allude specially to the propriety of a reference of that bill to such committee not because I happen to be a member thereof, but it will serve as an illustration of the propriety of distributing our bills to the several committees clothed with jurisdiction of the subject-matter to be considered. The Committee on Coast Defenses has, from my knowledge, been investigating that great and important question for the last month or six weeks. It had before it a large number of experts from the War and Navy Departments, and has gone into the subject thoroughly. At its head is the distinguished Senator from Washington, Mr. SQUIRE, with whom is associated the Senator from Connecticut, General HAWLEY, the Senator from Georgia, General GORDON, and the ex-Secretary of War, Senator PROCTOR, and other gentlemen of long and distinguished service, and I submit that the Committee on Coast Defenses thus constituted will be able to make the appropriation for coast defenses and fortifications wisely and with a just appreciation of the needs of this service.

This was one of the reasons which actuated the House in making the distribution of the appropriation bills. There was another reason which, I presume, possibly does not affect the Senate. It had grown to be the practice in the House that the Committee on Appropriations used its power to defeat other legislation. The Committee on Appropriations were in the habit of retaining these bills in committee until toward the close of the session, although prepared and ready to report at any time, and then when any measure came up which in the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations ought to be defeated, the Committee on Appropriations would bring forward an appropriation bill, thrust it upon the attention of the House (such bill having the right of way), and insist that they must proceed with the appropriation bills or the wheels of the Government would stop.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator from Michigan whether he has ever heard from any source any intimation that ever in any single case in the history of this body an appropriation bill has been held up for that purpose, either for delay or to antagonize other measures, or for any purpose whatever?

Mr. BURROWS. The Senator, if he observed what I stated a moment ago, will recall that I said distinctly that I did not know what the practice was in the Senate; I was stating one of the reasons which actuated the House in making the distribution; but whether that practice has obtained here I am not advised.

Mr. HALE. Has the Senator from Michigan ever heard it intimated?

Mr. BURROWS. Oh, I have made no inquiry on that subject. I was confining myself to the reason which actuated the House in making a distribution of the appropriation bills. The Senator knows better than I can possibly know whether the appropriation bills are ever used in the Senate to thwart or impede the consideration of other measures, or to interfere in any way with other and important legislation.

Mr. HALE. I think I may say with entire confidence, appealing to all members, that in all the discussion and urgency with which this proposition has been pushed that has never been claimed.

Mr. BURROWS. The Senator will bear me witness that I have not so stated. On the contrary, I disclaimed any knowledge upon that subject.

Mr. HALE. On the contrary, the Committee on Appropriations has prepared and reported and pressed the bills as fast as it could be done.

Mr. BURROWS. But the evil grew to such magnitude in the House of Representatives that the practice became frequent of holding these bills back to prevent other legislation and then passing great appropriation bills, involving hundreds of millions of dollars, under a suspension of the rules.

There is another reason given for the distribution of these bills in the House of Representatives, and that was that it would create more general interest among the members of the body. I hazard nothing in saying that if we had a rule in the Senate that all proposed legislation of every character should be referred to one committee, it would be impossible to keep a quorum of the Senate present. The more general the distribution, and the more the labors of the body are distributed among its membership, the more general will be the interest, and the greater will be the attendance and attention to public business.

But it is suggested that if we are to make the distribution of these bills among the various committees, why not assign to the Committee on Patents the appropriations for patents and to the Judiciary Committee the appropriations for the judicial service. A sufficient answer to that proposition is that there is no such scheme proposed. These fourteen general appropriation bills cover in fact every conceivable branch of the public service. It is simply porposed to put these bills with committees that have the subject-matter embraced in those bills under special consideration.

These were some of the considerations which influenced the House in distributing the appropriation bills. There were other reasons assigned, which I will not detain the Senate to enumerate.

But it is said, among other things, that it is necessary that these appropriations shall be in charge of one committee, that such committee may confer with the Committee on Finance and ascertain the probabilities as to revenue, so that they may make their appropriations to conform to the receipts of the Government.

I remember the statement of General Garfield in the House that it was important that the distribution should not be made; that the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Ways and Means should stand "back and back," the one facing the resources of the Government and the other its expenditures. One would judge from the argument that it is the habit of the Committee on Appropriations constantly to confer with the Committee on Finance, to ascertain how much money there probably would be in the Treasury, and for the Finance Committee to confer constantly with the Committee on Appropriations with a view of advising that committee how much money could be expended. Judge Kelley said a word in regard to that, to which I beg leave to call attention, which, I think, is quite pertinent. Judge Kelley, in reply to that suggestion, said:

> Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Georgia seems to have fallen into an error as to the functions of our Ways and Means Committee. The Ways and Means Committee report at long intervals, according to the history of our country, bills for raising revenue, and then until the season comes for reporting another bill, changing the scope or system of revenue, the Ways and Means Committee have nothing to do with it. The idea that each year the Ways and Means Committee provides as much money as the Appropriations Committee wants to appropriate or Congress wants to expend is a fanciful theory. It has no foundation, or at least has had none during the sixteen years I have had the honor to be on the Committee on Ways and Means. We have never heard of the Appropriations Committee intimating to the Committee on Ways and Means what amount of money they were likely to appropriate, nor have I heard, on the other hand, of the Committee on Ways and Means saying to the Committee on Appropriations, we will not give you more than so much money. I am quite sure the business men of the country would be frightened from their propriety if they were to hear it was now to be so arranged that the tariff should be changed by each Congress to meet the opinions of the Appropriations and Ways and Means Committees. The theory is a purely fanciful one.

Judge Kelley said further on, in reply to another suggestion, which I try to quote in this connection:

> Sir, it may be that the wisdom and honesty of the House are concentrated in a single committee thereof, but I do not believe it. I find myself one of 325 chosen Representatives, who, I believe, present a fair average of the prosperous and intelligent men of their respective districts. If it is true that we need but 15 men to determine what appropriations ought to be made, what existing offices ought to be abolished or reduced in consideration under the plea of economy, and what laws ought to be repealed or enacted, why not change our laws and save the pay of the other 310 members? If, sir, you have a better guaranty of integrity and intelligence in the case of a committee of 15, operating, so far as the public is concerned, in the dark, with a guardian at the door of the committee room to prevent intruders from spying into the procedure, than you have with 325 men, each directly responsible to an intelligent constituency, operating in the broadest electric light, with the representatives of the press eyeing them with the microscope and the telescope in order that every constituent may judge of the wisdom and integrity of their acts—if the secret committee offers the better guaranty I have miscalculated probabilities.

Mr. President, the chief objection urged in the House at the time this distribution was made, and the chief objection presented here to the distribution of these bills, that the membership of the Senate may participate in the great work of this body, is that it would increase expenditures, and that it would not be safe to trust to the other committees of this body the appropriation of public funds. That was combated at the time in the House of Representatives, but of course it could be answered only as a matter of speculation. But we have now had the practical working of this distribution in the House of Representatives, and I have taken occasion to have prepared a statement showing the aggregate of appropriations for ten years previous to this distribution and the ten years since, the appropriations carried by the bills retained by the Committee on Appropriations and the appropriations made by the committees to whom the bills went after distribution. The bills referred to the other committees in the House of Representatives aggregate in appropriations, ten years previous to the distribution, $955,000,000, and after the distribution, during ten years, the same bills carried $1,470,000,000, in round numbers, or an increase of the appropriations by the committees to whom these bills were distributed of $533,000,000.

The six bills left with the Committee on Appropriations during the ten years preceding the distribution carried $1,256,000,000, and after the distribution the committee retaining these six bills made an increase of $878,000,000. The increase of appropriation in the eight bills not reported by the Committee on Appropriations during the ten years of the distribution was $533,000,000 and the increase in the bills retained by the Committee on Appropriations was $878,000,000.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the Senator——

Mr. BURROWS. In a moment. Of course it is fair to say that the expenditures of the Government in all branches greatly increased, but it demonstrates the one fact that with the bills the Committee on Appropriations retained the appropriations increased to $878,000,000, while the other bills were increased only $533,000,000.

Mr. HALE. Now, is it not a fact——

Mr. BURROWS. Allow me to conclude the statement.

Mr. HALE. Very well; I will wait.

Mr. BURROWS. I desire to say one thing further. The only instance of a decrease in appropriations on any bill is that of the Army bill, which was taken from the Committee on Appropriations and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The decrease in that committee during the ten years after the distribution was nearly $19,000,000. I cite this simply as tending to show that the claim of Senators that the distribution of these bills will tend to increase expenditures is not borne out by the history of the appropriations.

Mr. HALE. Now will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BURROWS. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Is it not the fact that when the Senator adds together the items of appropriations on the bills left in the hands of the Appropriations Committee and compares them with the bills reported by the several committees, the great increase in ten years that is charged to the Committee on Appropriations comes from the consideration that is always occurring to us here, and that is, the overwhemingly large pension appropriations? That bill was retained by the Committee on Appropriations, and they are made subject to the charge that their aggregate appropriations had largely increased when a great portion of the increase was attributable to the immense and constantly growing aggregate of the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. From thirty to one hundred and fifty million dollars.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. BURROWS. If the Senator will allow me one word there I will yield the floor and the Senator from New Hampshire can reply, or I will yield to the Senator in just a minute.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; the Senator will cover it all.

Mr. BURROWS. Possibly I will not cover it as the Senator from New Hampshire can, who is so familiar with the pension question. What is said by the Senator from Maine is true, that the pension appropriations have largely increased. That bill was left to the Committee on Appropriations; and while I include in this statement the increase of pensions, the Senator will observe that I also include in the other statement the increase in the appropriations for the Post-Office service, amounting to $319,000,000. If you will eliminate $319,000,000 from the Post-Office appropriations on the one hand and strike out the increase by reason of pensions on the other, you still have an increase of $195,000,000 under the bills distributed, and an increase of $137,000,000 by the bills retained by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. President, I have submitted reluctantly all I care to say on this subject. I rose simply for the purpose of stating that, so far as the House was concerned, this distribution has worked well; it has contributed to the general interest in legislation in that body; it has facilitated the consideration and the report of the appropriation bills; and I believe that the proposed distribution, if made here, would increase the general interest of the individual membership of this body in matters of vital and common concern, facilitate the business of the Senate, and promote the public welfare.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the Senator from Michigan takes his seat I would be glad to ask him to state again the aggregate amount of the increase of appropriations of the Committee on Appropriations in those ten years. What was the total?

Mr. BURROWS. The total was $878,000,000.

Mr. ALLISON. Although these figures are somewhat illusory, if I may add a word, I will state that I have a document before me which shows them in detail, and of this increase $719,648,000 was for pensions alone. So nearly the total increase of the six bills of which the Senator speaks was owing to increases of pensions, certainly to the extent of $719,000,000 in ten years.

Mr. BURROWS. That is true. The increase of pensions was $719,000,000; but, leaving out the increase in pensions, the increase aside from that was $138,000,000, while the increase carried by the bills assigned to the other committees, leaving out the Post-Office appropriations of $319,000,000, which, of course, increased very largely year by year, was $195,000,000.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the statement of the Senator from Michigan, who comes to this body as a veteran of the House, is most interesting. In the reasons he gave why the House adopted the system of distribution he struck upon one which was, as I believe and know from long service in the House, the great and prevailing reason that brought about the radical change adopted there. It became a necessity. The conduct and management of appropriation bills, in the manipulation by which they were made to antagonize other measures, the delays to which the body was subjected, with the result that appropriation bills carrying millions of dollars, after having thwarted the purposes of the House and turned aside other legislation, were passed under a suspension of the rules, became intolerable.

I know from my service in the House of Representatives on the Committee on Appropriations that there was a world-wide difference between the condition there and what it is here. There was there constantly occurring what never occurs here, the question whether or not the House would take up appropriation bills. Those bills were antagonized to at one time and destroyed the right of way and turned aside a great revenue bill which was being presented. In my day—and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] will bear me out, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], in the statement—there were constantly those conflicts until it became the settled conviction of men in the House that the only remedy was to destroy the evil, and the only way to destroy the evil was in the manner indicated. That never obtains here. No man, however long he may have been in service here, has ever known an appropriation bill to be used for any purpose except to expedite business. The Committee on Appropriations, in dealing with these bills, sits day and night and reports them here at as early a day as possible, and at a very early day after receiving them from the House of Representatives, and by common consent and the rule and practice of the Senate they have the right of way over everything else and are pushed at once to a passage, and thereby got out of the way of other bills.

There is another thing to which the Senator has referred, a belief that appropriation bills would be matured more quickly, sent to this body at earlier dates, and thereby expedite early adjournments. The result is found to be precisely the opposite. I have tables here—I did not have the pleasure, as I was called out, of listening to all the Senator from Iowa said, and it may be that he put them in—showing that since this change, instead of the appropriation bills in the House, which are in the hands of the individual committees, coming to this body earlier than they did when they were prepared and put through by a single Appropriations Committee, they are later now. So that, interesting as the Senator's statement is, and well conceived and presented as it was, attracting the attention of this body, the two great reasons which he has furnished disappear absolutely, one great reason not obtaining here, and never has, and the other, the expedition of the bills, not being borne out by the facts.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose at this late hour in the afternoon to undertake to contribute anything of consequence to the discussion. I have listened to it as one of the most interesting and practical discussions which has occurred in the Senate for many years. It has been argued with great earnestness and ability and fullness of information and argument on both sides; but I have listened in vain, having heard nearly every speech which has been made, for any answer to, or any attempt to answer, the one important argument which has been adduced against making this change—if one has been made it has been when I did not happen to hear that part of the debate—and that is, if this change be adopted, there will be no responsible body or organ or authority anywhere to graduate the total expenses of this Government with a consideration of what the Government can afford in each year. Every item of expenditure is to be made, so far as this change goes, by gentlemen interested in a particular subject, for I take it that it is the mark of a good committee, as well as the old maxim of law says it is the mark of a good judge, to expand its jurisdiction. Every committee which proposes one of these great appropriations of public money is to do it without the slightest consideration of what the total expenditure of this year can be or ought to be.

Take the Committee on Commerce, which has the separate jurisdiction of an appropriation bill now, and has had for a good while, and I therefore take that for an illustration. The river and harbor needs of this country, according to the estimates, would require an annual expenditure of seventy or eighty million dollars. It would be money well spent; it would be money which you and I, being business men—if we had the responsibilities and the properties and the duties which this Government has—would rightfully and wisely expend upon rivers and harbors alone, if we had the money and could afford it, in any particular year; and yet Congress never expends more than from 20 to 25 per cent of the amount which the War Department has recommended as required by national and international commerce.

So take the matter of coast defenses. It would be a wise thing, if we had the money, to expend $100,000,000 this year in defending our coasts.

Mr. HAWLEY. That is utterly and absolutely impossible.

Mr. HOAR. I understand it is absolutely impossible. It is impossible considered in relation to the revenues of the Government; but if we had a hundred million dollars in the Treasury which we could apply economically and profitably to that subject and could get a complete system of coast defenses to-morrow in this country, it would be a reasonable and wise expenditure to make. We could not enter into a foreign war, as everybody knows, this year, if the necessity for one came, except at the risk of having our great commercial cities bombarded and laid under contribution.

So in regard to the Navy. Everybody knows that the public desire for a complete and fit navy to patrol the seas and protect our commerce could not be gratified in one year or in ten. So of the matter of public buildings and of a great many other things. There ought to be and should be somewhere a committee or other authority whose duty it is to take every one of these expenditures and see what can be fairly and conveniently afforded in any one year, without bankrupting or discrediting the Government or putting undue burdens upon the people.

What householder, what farmer, what business man makes his annual expenditure for desirable objects without counting the cost, adding up all the expenditures, and considering what that year can spare or can afford?

Now, it is said that the House of Representatives, formerly having a committee whose duty it was to make that estimate and consideration there, has changed that policy. For that reason so much the more the Senate ought to adhere to it. The House could not safely or wisely have made such a change in its policy unless it had known that elsewhere all these expenditures were to be brought under a single eye, compared with each other, and their comparative importance considered in relation to the resources and the capacity of the Government.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HOAR. For what purpose—to ask a question or to make a speech?

Mr. HILL. To ask a question.

Mr. HOAR. I will hear the Senator.

Mr. HILL. I ask the Senator whether he thinks that the few appropriation bills which have already been reported by the Appropriations Committee have been made with an understanding of what the House committee is going to report hereafter?

Mr. HOAR. I will answer the question. They have been made with an understanding as to what the Senate committee intends to report hereafter, however the House committee may report.

Mr. HILL. Let me ask the Senator, further, how can the Senate committee know what they are going to report on bills which have not yet reached them from the House? Have they predetermined the question?

Mr. HOAR. Our Appropriations Committee is made up of men whose minds have been soaked with this knowledge and information, who have been in the habit of doing this thing year after year. They are absolutely cognizant; they know what is coming over from the House of Representatives; they know what is going to pass in that House in all the general items of appropriation just as they know what is likely to happen in the Senate or to happen in their own committee.

Mr. HILL. How could the Senate Committee on Appropriations know that the District of Columbia appropriation bill was going to be defeated yesterday?

Mr. HOAR. There will be a District of Columbia appropriation bill here before this session is over. The Senator need not be frightened about that. The Committee on Appropriations deal with every one of these appropriation bills with a full knowledge that whether it passes before or after a certain time there has got to be $6,500,000 appropriated for the expenditures of the District of Columbia.

That brings me to the only other point which I ought to make, and that is that this is, as it seems to me, a very bad time in the session and in the year to make this proposed change. The Senator from Idaho, it is true, introduced this resolution at the very beginning of the present session, as hundreds, and I do not know but thousands, of resolutions and bills are introduced by Senators to bring the matters to which they refer before the body. He called it up two weeks after, made some remarks upon it, and dismissed it again. It has now got to be within three weeks of the end of winter, within three weeks of the time when, in the short session of Congress, Congress is ready to adjourn. Now the Appropriations Committee consists of men who, by an experience of years, are thoroughly familiar with this subject, and with this subject in the aspect in which I have endeavored to state it, and they are prepared to take up and deal with this years' expenses by the experience they have had and the expectation they have had up to within a day or two, that, of course, they were to discharge this function. On the other hand, the membership of these various committees is made up very largely of new men, of men who have not special experience in the subjects committed to those very committees which men of long service on those committees have.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish this point, and I shall then yield to the Senator from Idaho.

I have looked over these various committees, and the Senate will be surprised to see on each of them how many gentlemen there are who are altogether new to the subjects proposed to be committed to those committees; some of them new to service in the Senate; none of them, even the elders, having had the responsibility of dealing with these subjects with reference to making appropriations.

It seems to me that, if the resolution passes, it ought not to take effect until another session of Congress; that it will be a very bad thing indeed for us to make this sudden change, wrenching the proceedings of the Senate all awry, committing these subjects to men who have not expected to take them up until within the last two or three days of the present session. At this time, when we are so eager to have a short session, and both parties are so eager to have an economical session, I think that it is very unwise indeed to make our appropriations and go before the people with appropriations made without any common oversight of the whole, and made by gentlemen who have not even during the present session of Congress been preparing themselves to deal with the subjects proposed to be committed to them.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I desire to interrupt the Senator from Massachusetts to make the statement that at the close of the last session of Congress I introduced this resolution. It was not allowed to be considered then. That would seem to have been a very proper time, according to the Senator from Massachusetts, for its consideration. At the very beginning of the present session I reintroduced it, having given notice at the previous session that I should do so. There has been opportunity at all times to consider it, but no time seems to have been a fitting time. I should have been glad to have it considered earlier, but I was put off by one pretext and another until the bond bill came in, and pretty soon the tariff bill will come up. So it does not seem as though there was any fitting time for this resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator understood, and the Senate understood, that I did not make that observation as imputing any laches to the Senator, but only as pointing out, however the fact may have occurred, that the committees of this body, the Appropriations Committee and the others, have not been expecting to have any change of jurisdiction in the middle of the session. I think the matter ought to go to the Committee on Rules. I think so for the reasons stated by the Senator from Iowa, among others, that this resolution cuts into a great many rules that are not named in the resolution. That was one reason for the rule, which was debated when the matter was taken up, which required notice to be given of every rule and part of a rule to be affected by a proposed amendment. Here are a great many rules that will become totally inoperative, or at any rate difficult of construction and application if this amendment shall pass.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator from Maine yield to a motion to adjourn? It is now twenty minutes to 6 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MILLS. Let us have some understanding about this matter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. DUBOIS. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. MANTLE (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES] on the main question. I do not know whether it is proper for me to vote on this question or not.

Mr. BERRY. If my colleague [Mr. JONES of Arkansas] were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. MANTLE. Then I withhold my vote and announce that, if he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PETTIGREW (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY].

Mr. VILAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], but I transfer that pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], and I vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON].

Mr. QUAY. If my colleague were present, I have no doubt he would vote "yea."

Mr. WALTHALL. I vote "yea," then.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DUBOIS (after having voted in the negative). I ask if the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am paired with that Senator, but will transfer my pair to the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], and let my vote stand.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest that that Senator would vote the same way as the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Wyoming asked me to do this, and said to me a few days ago that he wished me to protect his pair.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] asked me to protect his pair with the Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY].

Mr. CLARK. On the main question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" on this vote and I should vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER. I think there is some mistake by the Senator from Idaho in reference to the pair of the Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY]. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER], and I so stated to the Senator from Wyoming some time to-day. I understand that there is a letter here from the Senator from New York making that statement.

Mr. NELSON. I am paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DUBOIS. I became a little confused. There is no question about how the senior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SMITH] would vote. His pair and mine have been transferred and the senior Senator from New Jersey stands paired with the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN]. I think they would both vote "nay." I am quite certain the Senator from New Jersey would vote "nay."

Mr. FAULKNER. I question that very seriously. From information I have, I think the Senator from Idaho is mistaken.

Mr. LINDSAY (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. Not supposing the pair extended to a motion to adjourn, I voted. I transfer my pair to my colleague [Mr. BLACKBURN], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I rise to assist in this matter if possible. The senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] is absent and not paired on this question. He would vote "yea," if present, and so the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALTHALL], who has a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania, was at liberty to vote on this question, and voted "yea," as both Senators would vote the same way.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

Mr. WOLCOTT. If I could be permitted to make the statement, I am quite sure I should get it right.

Mr. GEORGE (after having voted in the negative). I desire to know if the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] has voted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. He has not voted, the Chair is advised.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. LINDSAY. I transfer my pair to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON] and will let my vote in the affirmative stand.

Mr. GALLINGER. As I am somewhat responsible for the pairs on the Republican side, and as I am frequently called to account the next day by Senators saying that their pair had not been protected, I desire to call attention to the fact that the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] has a pair with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER], who, I think, has voted.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], but I am thoroughly aware of the obligations of a pair and my duties under it, and I am voting in accordance with what I regard as my understanding with him.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New Hampshire has charge of party pairs, but this is in no degree a party question. The pairs which are arranged on political questions are not applicable in the least to this question. I am paired generally with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES], yet he and I agree on this question. So the arrangement does not apply here in the least.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the two Senators from West Virginia would vote differently on this proposition. However, I accept the little lecture from the Senator from Maine with all due humility.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ought to have objected to debate on the part of the Senator from Maine, and I do object to debate on the part of my colleague. [Laughter.]

I voted "nay." I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] on all political questions and on any other question where he sends me notice. He sent me notice by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], who did not give it to me. Am I right, I ask?

Mr. GORMAN. I received notice from the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY] requesting me to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to his pair, and asking him to observe it on all votes on this question. In the press of matters I failed to give the notice to the Senator from New Hampshire until after he had voted.

Mr. CHANDLER. Therefore, I now withdraw my vote.

Mr. DUBOIS. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] would vote "nay" if he were present. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] that the Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY], if he is not paired, be paired with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE].

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President——

Mr. GEORGE. Will the Senator from Idaho be responsible for that statement?

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I shall vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] had recorded his vote before I could obtain the floor. I was about to say, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], that the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON], my colleague, is also absent. He would vote "yea," if present, and it would seem to me that it would be proper to pair him with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCBRIDE] instead of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who is present.

Mr. ALDRICH. Two pairs have been announced with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. VILAS (after having voted in the affirmative). I was about to correct that, if the Senator from Rhode Island will allow me for a moment. I have a general pair with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL], and he desired me to protect him upon this vote. I transferred my pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], but inasmuch as the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] says that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] has a special pair with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN], who is absent, it is unnecessary that the transfer should be made, and my vote can stand because I am at liberty to vote irrespective of the pair.

Mr. HILL. The difficulty with that arrangement is that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] is paired with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] and he has transferred his pair and voted.

Mr. PASCO. That is the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY].

Mr. LINDSAY (after having voted in the affirmative). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN]. I transferred my pair to the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CAMERON]. If that stands I have a right to vote. Otherwise I shall withdraw my vote.

Mr. WOLCOTT. That is right. Let it stand.

Mr. VILAS. I suggest that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LINDSAY] transfer his pair to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES].

Mr. LINDSAY. Then I will transfer my pair so that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] is paired with the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES] and let my vote stand.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the result be announced.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the affirmative). There has been a good deal of controversy about pairs, which induces me to announce the fact that I have a standing pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. But as he and I always agree upon questions of adjournment and absolutely agree upon the question lying behind this adjournment, I voted "yea," and I elect to let my vote stand.

Mr. HILL. I desire simply to say that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] has a perfect right to vote, because the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is paired on this question with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] by an arrangement made to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the result be announced. I insist upon proceeding in order.

Mr. VEST. I have a standing pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON]. He and I agree on this question, but at the personal request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] I announce a special pair upon this particular vote with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. HILL. A pair has already been announced for the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY].

Mr. VEST. I understand; but the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] agrees on this question with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from New York is right as to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], of course I do not wish to be——

Mr. HILL. I ask the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] to state how it is. He has charge of the pairs on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] being ill——

Mr. PETTIGREW. If the Senator will allow me, I will state that I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY].

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

Mr. HILL. I ask the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO] to state how it is.

Mr. ALLISON. At the personal and special request of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], who asked me this morning to secure a pair for him on every phase of this question, I asked the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] to pair with him, and I hope that pair will stand unless some other Senator is paired with him.

Mr. PASCO. I will state, in response to the inquiry of the Senator from New York [Mr. HILL], that the arrangement was made as he states, but the proposed change is entirely fair, as the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. IRBY] is left paired with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW].

Mr. HILL. I made the arrangement at the request of the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO]. I did not suppose any other arrangement would be made without his consent. The only way to keep the pairs straight is to have one man look after them.

Mr. VEST (after having voted in the negative). I withdraw my vote under my special pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL].

The result was announced—yeas 34, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—34.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Quay,
Allison,	Faulkner,	Lindsay,	Sewell,
Bacon,	Frye,	McMillan.	Thurston,
Bate,	Gear,	Mitchell, Wis.	Vilas,
Berry,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Walthall,
Brice,	Gorman,	Pasco,	Wetmore,
Caffery,	Gray,	Perkins,	Wolcott.
Call,	Hale,	Platt,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Pugh,

NAYS—29.

Baker,	Davis,	Martin,	Squire,
Blanchard,	Dubois,	Mills,	Tillman,
Brown,	Gallinger,	Nelson,	Turpie,
Burrows,	George,	Palmer,	White,
Butler,	Hansbrough,	Peffer,	Wilson.
Carter,	Hawley,	Pritchard,
Chilton,	Hill,	Proctor,
Daniel,	Lodge,	Roach,

NOT VOTING—26.

Allen,	Gordon,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Blackburn,	Irby,	Morrill,	Teller,
Cameron,	Jones, Ark.	Murphy,	Vest,
Cannon,	Jones, Nev.	Pettigrew,	Voorhees,
Chandler,	Kyle,	Sherman,	Warren.
Clark,	McBride,	Shoup,
Elkins,	Mantle,	Smith,

So the motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, February 7, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 6, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the regular order.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman will withhold that for a moment, I have a matter of some importance which will take but a few moments——

Mr. DINGLEY. I regret very much that I can not withhold the demand; but more than 50 gentlemen have just such matters, and I have been compelled to refuse all such requests.

Mr. BAILEY. This will take but two or three minutes.

Mr. DINGLEY. I regret very much to be compelled to decline; but if I grant this request, I would have no ground on which I could refuse it to others. I think under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I must demand the regular order.

I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 2904.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 1464) to amend chapter 76, laws of 1893;

A bill (H. R. 2175) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation;

A bill (H. R. 3812) to authorize the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw Nation in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. 5566) to prohibit prize fighting and pugilism and fights between men and animals, and to provide penalties therefor, in the Territories and District of Columbia.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 1591) to extend the mineral-land laws of the United States to lands embraced in the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

BOND REDEMPTION FUND.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. Chairman, I was recognized last night just before the termination of the session, but the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN] desires to occupy ten minutes this morning, and with the permission of the Chair I will not take the floor until after he concludes.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. Chairman, I had not expected to take any part in this debate. When the bond bill was before the House a few days ago I fully expressed my views thereon.

The silver question has been so thoroughly discussed that it is not now a question of argument. It is a question of brute force and money on the one side, and of manhood and votes on the other side. A reference, however, to the State which I have the honor to represent, by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON], renders it necessary for me to say something in addition to what my friend and colleague, Mr. TALBERT, said last evening on the spur of the moment.

In the first place, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] speaks of South Carolina "carrying us into a new secession movement."

Mr. Chairman, it is a useless task to discuss the motives which led to that terrible war. Neither the right nor wrong belongs to one side alone. But I want to say here, that our people acquiesce in the result of the war; and that to-day there is not a State in this Union whose people are more loyal, more devoted to our common country, than the people of South Carolina. I venture the assertion that should foreign aggression threaten us no more loyal sons would be found in any section of this Union.

Our people fought not for slavery, but because they believed that the principles of local self-government, equality in taxation, and all those fundamental questions which have lain beneath every contest for freedom were at stake; and, Mr. Chairman, to-day we are just as devoted to the principles of liberty and of justice as any people. It is time, Mr. Chairman, when the last vestige of bitterness should be wiped out, when the only memories left, is pride and glory for those of both sides who fought, bled, and died for principles which they believed were sacred. Our people are glad, sir, that the Union was preserved. The time has come when the people of South Carolina, are prouder of these United States, more loyal to a nation's flag, than they are to any State, whose star is but one of those constituting the bright galaxy, which makes America the grandest and greatest among the nations of this earth.

Mr. Chairman, the time has come when Representatives on the floor of this House, who for cheap applause would revive the bitter recollections of thirty years ago, should be frowned down by the great, the generous, and the forgiving American public. God speed the day!

It comes, sir, with poor grace for a Southern man to refer to his own section, his own people, a sister's children, as the gentleman from North Carolina did last evening. I yield to none in love for this great country, and my patriotism is not bounded by State lines, not cramped by partisan bigotry, nor yet paralyzed by race prejudices. But, Mr. Chairman, I love my native home, the soil which gave me birth. I love my people, hot-headed, impulsive, but loyal and true. Their faults I would condone, their virtues I would extol. And, Mr. Chairman, I shrink in horror from the "bird which would befoul its own nest."

The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] refers in bitter terms to a speech made by Senator TILLMAN in the Senate as "hoisting the red flag of anarchy or the black flag of dynamiters in this country," and as trying "to carry us over into a new secession movement." I am not here to answer for Senator TILLMAN; he is fully capable of taking care of himself; but, sir, it would have been better had some Senator possessed the nerve and courage to reply in an arena where he could be fitly answered, not behind these walls and through the eloquent mouth of the gentleman from North Carolina. In my State, when I thought Senator TILLMAN wrong I have said so, and opposed him; where

I thought him right, I defended him. Let me tell the gentleman from North Carolina that the manner in which this speech is received is an omen of trouble. Those awful words were but the echo of unexpressed thought in the bosoms of millions of American citizens. Instead of referring to Senator TILLMAN as an anarchist, let my friend turn his abuse upon those who rendered it possible for such utterances, to go unchallenged in the United States Senate. I was present, sir, and witnessed the shock to "Senatorial dignity," and when all eyes turned toward the "David" from New York he failed to produce his "sling" and smooth rocks which have slain so many Goliaths. There are all sorts of anarchists in this country; the poor devil, shivering with cold at a switch crossing, the maniac in the legislative gallery, and the fat, round anarchist, robed in power, who, by changing the unit of value, has robbed the toiler of his just reward, and the producer of the fruits of his labor.

Oppression and extortion in high places, breed the most disastrous forms of anarchism. Rid us of this class, and the former will disappear and the upper House recover its normal "Senatorial dignity," which of late has been so rudely disturbed. [Laughter and applause.]

[Mr. WHEELER addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE was recognized.

Mr. BRUMM. I would like to have the gentleman from North Dakota resume the floor for the purpose of answering a question for information. I am sure that the House will extend his time, because this is a matter of a great deal of importance.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman had yielded the floor and the Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRUMM. I hope the gentleman will take the floor——

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. May I resume the floor for the remaining eight minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has been recognized.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Chairman, I have on former occasions so fully discussed the general propositions involved in the free coinage of silver by this country alone that I had proposed at this time to largely confine myself to some observations on the subject of prices of certain commodities, but on that topic the very able argument and demonstration of the gentleman from North Dakota, just concluded, seems to have produced so much feeling and excitement that, as a matter of prudence, to allow the blood to cool, which now seems somewhat heated, I propose first to present briefly an answer which seems conclusive to the question which has been repeatedly asked in this House and elsewhere as to the reasons for the passage of the act of 1873, if confessedly by friend and foe the silver dollar was then worth 103 cents. It would seem that if such were the fact that it was a vain and useless thing, and in the interest of accurate history upon a subject about which there have been so many loose statements and so much reckless misstatement I ask the attention of the House for a few moments. We were in 1873 on a paper basis, there being no gold in circulation, nor silver, and our currency consisting at that time only of irredeemable paper.

Why, then, was it necessary to legislate upon the subject of coinage? It was because the friends of honest money looked forward to the time as not far distant when we should resume specie payments, and the legislation in relation to the mints was in such a discordant condition that it seemed necessary to codify and systematize it. In doing that it seemed desirable to put it upon a basis which should be permanent, which should be adapted not simply to the conditions of 1873, but to the conditions of 1879, of 1880 and succeeding years.

The recommendation for the passage of the mint act was made to Congress by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury early in 1870. Accompanying it were communications alluding to the fact that the dollar of silver was then worth 103 cents, but that bill was pending in this House and in the other House for nearly three years. It was under consideration while times and circumstances and conditions were changing, and when the Forty-second Congress met, in December, 1872, it was confronted with a different condition of affairs than existed when the bill was first presented in April, 1870, and the Secretary of the Treasury, in communicating to Congress under date of the 2d of December, 1872, called attention to the changed condition of affairs. I read from the report of Secretary Boutwell, and from that part wherein he speaks of this very act, the passage of which he recommended.

In the last ten years the commercial value of silver has depreciated about 3 per cent as compared with gold, and its use as currency has been discontinued in Germany and some other countries. The financial condition of the United States has prevented the use of silver currency for more than ten years, and I am of opinion that upon grounds of public policy no attempt should be made to introduce it, but that coinage should be limited to commercial purposes and designed exclusively for commercial uses with other nations.

The intrinsic value of a metallic currency should correspond to its commercial value, or metal should be used only for the coinage of tokens redeemable by the Government at their nominal value. As the depreciation of silver is likely to continue, it is impossible to issue coin redeemable in gold without ultimate loss to the Government, for when the difference becomes considerable holders will present the silver for redemption and leave it in the hands of the Government, to be disposed of subsequently at a loss.

If the policy should be adopted of issuing silver coin irredeemable, but whose intrinsic and nominal value should correspond to gold, the time must come when the country would suffer from the presence of a depreciated silver currency, not redeemable by the Government nor current in the channels of trade.

These were words of almost prophetic wisdom.

At the head of the Treasury Department then was one of the ablest and most accomplished financiers that ever occupied that position in the history of this nation, a straight-forward, hard-headed, broad-minded Yankee, trained in the school of practical business affairs, who looked, not simply at the conditions that were present, but at the causes which produced those conditions.

Now, let us see what they were? On December 2, 1872, he made that communication to Congress, written presumably in November. I have before me a statement of the Director of the Mint of the price of silver, month by month, during the year 1872. Commencing in January, it was $1.33 an ounce, and the silver dollar was worth $1.03. In November, when this report was written, and the attention of Congress was called to the fact, the price of silver was $1.30 an ounce, and the silver dollar was worth less than $1.01.

During those few months it had depreciated 2 cents on a dollar, and everything indicated that the depreciation would continue as it did. Why? The Secretary of the Treasury looked undoubtedly at the production of silver. When his recommendation was first made in 1870, the production of silver in the United States was $16,000,000, coinage value. In the next year it had increased nearly 50 per cent, and was $23,000,000. The following year it was $28,000,000, and the next year it was $35,000,000, a constant and progressive increase in the production. The production of the world showed a practically similar increase, rising from $51,000,000 in 1870 to $65,000,000 in 1873 and to nearly $82,000,000 in 1874. So that when this act was last presented and the attention of Congress was asked to it by the careful financiers who were watching history and watching the economic forces that were at work they presumed that these causes would continue, and they desired to place this Government upon a basis, when it resumed specie payments, where it would not be confronted with the necessity of using but one metal and having no gold. That that was understood by Congress I desire to demonstrate by quoting from the speech of the chairman of the Coinage Committee, Hon. William D. Kelley, of my own State. I quote from the Congressional Globe of 1872. He says:

Hence all experience has shown you must have one standard coin which shall be a legal tender for all others, and then you may promote your domestic convenience by having a subsidiary coinage which shall circulate in all parts of your country as legal tender to a limited amount and be redeemable at its face by your Government. The values of gold and silver—

This is what I wish to call attention to—

The values of gold and silver continually fluctuate. You can not determine this year what will be the relative values of gold and silver next year. They were 15 to 1 a short time ago. They are 16 now.

So I say that the careful student of history will see that that act was passed for a proper and wise purpose, based upon the conditions existing at that time and future conditions that must inevitably result from forces then in full play.

When the new Congress assembled, in December, 1873, the Secretary of the Treasury made reference incidentally to the fact that this country had "adopted the gold standard and demonetized silver," and spoke of "the depreciation in the market value of silver as compared with gold, which has been going on for some time," and of the purchase by the Government of "as much silver bullion as could be conveniently used in giving employment to the mints," thus clearly indicating the conditions existing and the governmental policy being pursued. The Director of the Mint, in his report under date of November 1, 1873, discusses the effect and operation of the act of 1873 at great length, under the heading, printed in capital letters, "Gold the standard or measure of value—silver subsidiary."

I hold here in my hand that report. With that official statement and explanation before them, with the fact that at that time, when the new Congress assembled, in December, 1873, the price of silver was only $1.27 an ounce and the value of the silver dollar only 98 cents, was any movement made to repeal that act? In this House were such eminent bimetallists as Richard P. Bland, of Missouri, who has only just closed his long and distinguished service in this House. At the head of the Democratic membership of the Coinage Committee was the present eminent Senator from Texas, ROGER Q. MILLS. In this House were the now venerable William S. Holman, of Indiana, and Senator Beck, of Kentucky, all ardent bimetallists.

With the facts stated in that report before them, with the value of silver less than the value of gold in the dollar, was any movement made to repeal that act? In former history, in 1864, when Congress made a mistake and undertook to regulate the value of gold, and the mistake was discovered, in less than fifteen days the same Congress which passed the bill had blotted from the statute books their own work. Did they do it in 1873 or 1874? No. On the contrary, the eminent Senator from Nevada—and Nevada was represented then by those two distinguished and able champions of silver, JOHN P. JONES and WILLIAM M. STEWART—the eminent Senator STEWART from Nevada said, on the 11th day of February, 1874, in the Senate of the United States:

I want the standard gold, and no paper money not redeemable in gold.

And less than ten days later he said:

Gold is the universal standard of the world. Everybody knows what a dollar of gold is worth.

Will gentlemen undertake to say that the act of 1873 was clandestinely passed without purpose? If it was, let me submit to you a practical question. In 1876, when the Democratic national convention assembled and sought with a fine-tooth comb to find all the sins of transgression and omission committed by the Republican party, did it make the least mention of this terrible crime against silver? In that convention were such eminent silver champions as the Senator from Indiana [Mr. VOORHEES], who was on the committee on resolutions, and who had been a member of this House in 1873, when this bill passed. The subject of finance was so thoroughly considered in that committee and convention that there were two reports and a heated discussion on it.

In that convention sat my genial friend whose seat I now occupy, Mr. LESTER of Georgia, one of the vice-presidents of the convention; his colleague, the distinguished gentleman from Georgia, Judge TURNER; the aggressive champion of free silver from Tennessee, Mr. RICHARDSON, and that eminent Democrat, prominent then, prominent often in this House and elsewhere, the Hon. W. C. P. Breckinridge, of Kentucky. Yet in that memorable arraignment of all the sins of the Republican party, real and fancied, no man undertook to charge to it the "enormous, monstrous crime of 1873." Why not? No man who reads the arraignment of the Republican party embraced in that platform of 1876 will believe that this charge would have been omitted had there been any basis on which to plausibly rest it.

But now what has been the effect of that act? If it has reduced prices, as alleged—if the demonetization of silver has sent down the prices of the products of this country, of the wheat, of the cotton, and the other products—if that is true, it is worthy of serious attention and ought to be carefully considered. Gentlemen said last night, and gentlemen frequently say, "Here is a list of 26 articles, and the depreciation has been so much." Do they name the articles? Certainly, they name two articles. We have been deluged with charts, not as illustrative and not as accurate as the charts that have been exhibited in your sight to-day by the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]; but in former years we have been deluged with charts showing the prices of what? Silver, wheat, and cotton. Nothing else.

Now, then, is there any connection between them? If the reduction in the price of wheat and the price of cotton was due to the appreciation of the money metal or the medium of exchange, the same law and the same force would apply to all the other products, unless there are exceptional forces which make a difference in particular cases. If the appreciation of the money standard has caused a depreciation in the price of wheat, it would cause a depreciation in the price of corn, oats, potatoes, and tobacco. Certainly it would. But it did not. No, sir; the reason why wheat depreciated in price was because the cost of production had been lessened; the productive power of a day's work had been marvelously increased, as demonstrated to you by my friend from North Dakota, and because the cost of transportation had been wonderfully reduced. I read briefly from Schoenhof's "History of Money and Prices," just published, and you will find in the Statistical Abstract for 1894 the tables showing that in the single element of the cost of transportation there had been a reduction of 20 cents per bushel in the rates between Chicago and New York between 1873 and 1894.

Schoenhoff says:

The through freight charges on grain by the leading roads from Chicago to New York averaged about $1.20 per 100 pounds from November, 1865. They had fallen in 1870, for the same month, to 60 cents, and averaged at that rate till about 1873. Thence, in 1874 to 1880, the rates fell to 40 and 35 cents, and from thence came down to rates varying between 20 and 25 cents in 1890.

What is worthy of note is that rates of freight, when once lowered, have never come back to old positions. * * *

But taking the six months from July to January, when the bulk of the harvest is being shipped, we average for 1870, per bushel, 15¼ cents; for 1873 even, 25¼ cents; for 1876, 16 cents; for 1880 we have 14 cents; for 1884 we have 10 cents; for 1888 we have 8 cents; for 1890 we have about 4 to 5 cents, which is the average for 1892 and may be considered as the general average rate now. * * *

If we go back no further than 1873 we can state that a difference in freight charges from Chicago to New York of 20 cents per bushel over the present rates has accrued to the Eastern consumer and to the Western farmer alike. A further benefit to the Western farmer and the European consumer is in the fall of ocean freight of fully 10 cents in this period of about twenty years.

We in America certainly have to take this margin into consideration (about 30 cents per bushel, the saving of freight to the consumer of the farmer's surplus) when we speak of the fall in the price of his wheat.

Subtract 20 cents from the price of 1873 and you will see how it affects the average price of wheat in these years.

But let me call your attention to the contrasts in the matter of culture and prices between wheat and corn. Both are food products. Wheat is mostly produced on large farms, by the employment of great amounts of capital, by the application of improved machinery and power; produced in exceptional localities. Corn is produced in every State in this great Union. It is consumed generally where it is produced. The element of the reduction in the cost of transportation does not enter into its value. The employment of power increasing the productiveness of individual labor does not materially enter into its value. The small farmer grows corn just as he always did and pursues practically the same methods in Maine, in Pennsylvania, in Oregon, and all over the country. He follows his own plow, behind his own team, cuts his own corn, husks his own corn, and disposes of and frequently eats his own corn. There has been no material change in the methods of production. There has been no material change in the element of transportation, for corn is an article of home consumption; and there has been no material change in price. I have before me tables of prices furnished by the Secretary of Agriculture, which I will insert in the RECORD. The price brought by a bushel of corn in 1872, immediately prior to the demonetization of silver, was 39.8 cents a bushel—the average price.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman, but I desire to ask him for information—at what place?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. That is the average price throughout the country, given by the statistician of the Agricultural Department. In 1872 it was 39.8; in 1892 it was 39.3 cents per bushel. The average for the decade of 1870 to 1880 was 44.17 cents per bushel; for the decade between 1880 and 1890, 40.75 cents per bushel; for the first four years of the present decade, 41.25 cents per bushel. Allowing for the fact that there was some appreciation, some inflation of paper prices in the first decade, and you will find a wonderful stability in average price, because there were no exceptional influences affecting the price.

Take oats, produced largely in the same way. I am not going into details, but the prices in 1872 were 33.6; in 1892, 31.7, and the average for the first decade was 36, for the second 32, and for the third 33. Take potatoes, in which there is no special improvement in the methods of cultivation. You plant them as you always did and you dig them as you always did. They were worth 59 cents in 1872, 67 in 1892, with the average price corresponding from year to year.

Referring briefly to the other commodity so frequently mentioned, the price of cotton, which has depreciated during these years; and why? There have been improved methods of cultivation and handling. I remember something of the rather primitive methods that were in vogue thirty years ago, when I was trying to raise cotton, and pretty unsuccessfully. With respect to that commodity, also, you will find that the cost of transportation has diminished just as the cost of transportation of wheat has diminished, the conditions being the same.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the gentleman will permit me to interrupt him, I understand him to say that there have been some improvements in the methods of production of cotton. I wish he would state to the House just one.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. In the application of power to ginning, and the application of power in baling and compressing. When I was raising cotton we ginned by hand and pressed by turning the long lever with a mule, and you do not do it so now. Then enormous fields of extra production have been opened.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman if he is not aware of the fact that the great mass of the cotton crop is ginned and pressed in that way to-day?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I am not aware that the vast majority of the crop is produced in that way.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And does not the gentleman know that the ginning has nothing to do with the production?

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. I am aware that the application of steam power has made a good deal of a revolution in many localities, though possibly not in the gentleman's section.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I beg the gentleman's pardon. If it had made a revolution anywhere it would have made it in my section, because that is a great cotton region.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. It is possible, Mr. Chairman, that there is some section in this great country where the possibilities of modern improvement and progress have not reached, and if so I make the necessary exception.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not want to interrupt the gentleman, but——

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. And I do not want the gentleman to interrupt me, because my time is limited. Now, Mr. Chairman, the element of transportation in determining price is a very important one, and has changed materially since 1872. I read further from Schoenhof on Money and Prices:

In cotton the rates by steamer from New Orleans to New York, in 1873, averaged 60 cents per 100 pounds; in 1880, 45 cents; in 1892, 32 cents. The all-rail rates from Atlanta, Ga., in 1886 were 85 cents; in 1893 they were 67 cents. Ocean rates have followed a similar course as in wheat.

Then, sir, another element in the question is that cotton seed is now worth about half as much as the staple, and was practically valueless in 1872. So that for the cotton crop, seed and staple, about as much is received now as in earlier years.

Again, take tobacco. What is the reason why the same forces which apply to the price of cotton should not apply to that of tobacco? The methods of the production of tobacco have not been materially changed, and the element of transportation is not involved to the same extent as in the case of cotton. Now, what has been the price? I have here the average price of tobacco for the decades I have been considering. For the first the average price has been 8.87, for the next 8.41, and for the third 8.01, showing a remarkable stability of price.

The fact is that exceptional influences, cheapening the cost of production and lessening the cost of transportation, have materially affected the prices of wheat and cotton, and have not operated to nearly the same extent on other agricultural products. They have, however, operated even more strongly on silver. The field of production has been vastly increased and the methods of mining, concentration, and reduction have been wonderfully cheapened and increased in effectiveness. This was fully explained by William H. Beck, a practical miner, in his testimony before the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures of the Fifty-first Congress, in part as follows:

In my observation in the far West I see causes there that I think are tending very much to depreciate the value of silver. When I went to Montana in 1886 it cost us to transport our ores from Dillon to Omaha $24 per ton. That transportation now costs $10 per ton. It cost us then to treat the ores $17 a ton. Now it costs $8 and $10. Mining powder cost us 50 and 60 cents a pound. We can buy it now for 20 and 22 cents a pound. It cost us then to board a man $1 a day and more. We can do it now for a less sum. Machinery is better, and improvements in mining machinery are being continually made. Concentration of ores is extending very largely. Many of our ores that were considered of no value a few years ago are now quite profitable.

When I first went to Colorado in 1878 the superintendent of a silver mill at Georgetown told me that he could not afford to treat ores that assayed less than $20 to the ton. By concentration ores can now be profitably handled that yield as low as $5 a ton. By using scientific processes of treatment low-grade ores, running 2 or 3 ounces of silver and 3 or 4 or 5 per cent in lead, will yield a good profit.

So you have similar causes operating on wheat, cotton, and silver, and necessarily producing similar results. The price of each has fallen, but in different and varying degrees. Neither has any relation to the other nor influence on the other in matter of price, but each yields to the influences operating on itself, which, as I have shown, are effective to produce the result found, and a result not found in other commodities not subjected to these influences. Prices of many have remained stable, some have fallen, some have increased. No one disputes the marked increase in the rate of wages of labor, which enters as the most important element into the value of all commodities.

But, gentlemen say give us an increase in the amount of the circulating medium, give us, in other words, an inflation of the currency, and it will raise prices. Now, is that necessarily a fact? If it is a fact, why have not prices increased while we were increasing the amount of our currency by injecting into it over four hundred millions of silver dollars, as we have done since 1878?

But it is said, and the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] has eloquently dilated upon that point, that in 1873 we took the burden of sustaining the circulating medium of this country, which had previously rested upon two metals, and imposed it on one alone, and that the consequence was the appreciation of the metal that was retained and the depreciation of the one that was rejected. Was the gentleman candid in that statement? Did he mean to say that in 1873 the circulating medium of this country rested on gold or silver or on both? He knows, and every man knows, that at that time the currency of this country was an irredeemable paper currency, and that it so continued for six years thereafter. He knows, and every man ought to know, that when we did come again to a specie circulation we came to it with silver as an important element, and that our currency system then rested more heavily upon silver than ever before in the history of this nation.

He knows, and every man ought to know, that when we returned to a specie basis in 1879 we coined more legal-tender silver dollars in that one year than we had coined in the whole eighty-six years of the previous history of the Government—aye, sir, double the amount. What was the proportion of gold and silver in our currency in 1873 and prior to that time? I have before me a statement of the Director of the Mint showing the figures. From the foundation of the Government until 1873 we had coined $795,091,690 of gold currency, and we had coined $143,813,598.70 of silver currency, of which $8,031,238 was in standard silver dollars.

Up to that time, then, the burden of sustaining the circulating medium of this nation had rested upon gold and silver in the proportion of 8 to 1¼. How has it rested since? Why, you have got practically in circulation to-day approximately equal amounts of silver and gold. You have got in this country to-day more nearly a typical bimetallic currency—not a bimetallic standard, but a bimetallic currency—than can be found in any other great nation of the world. And where is the complaint? With four hundred millions and over of standard silver dollars, with a subsidiary silver currency approximating half that amount, where and how is silver unjustly or unfairly treated? What more can you do unless with the cooperation of other nations?

But the gentleman from Colorado says—and it is the old hackneyed illustration which we have heard for years and years—if you should take two kinds of grain—corn and wheat—both used for food, and the Government should stop the grinding of the one and confine the people to the use of the other, would not that inevitably tend to appreciate the price of the one that was kept in use and to depreciate the price of the one that was rejected? I answer that question put to us so often by saying that if the gentleman will make his illustration conform to the facts, if he will assume that the Government had been receiving wheat and corn, storing the wheat and issuing obligations for it, issuing storage certificates, if you please, for it, until the accumulation had reached 400,000,000 bushels, while there could not, by any possibility, be forced out among the people 60,000,000 bushels of it for actual use, while all the corn was freely used, if the proposition were then made to the Government, not simply to resume grinding wheat for use, but to accept every bushel of wheat grown in the United States, or in the world, and guarantee for it to the owner $1, when it was really worth only 50 cents anywhere else, and force every man in this nation to take it for $1 when he could buy it for 50 cents elsewhere, I would say that the Government ought not to do that. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, silver is a national product, relatively unimportant when compared with our great agricultural staples or the production of our manufacturing industries, but still a national product, and the men who mine it should be fairly treated; but I can not aid in the effort to double the value of their product at the risk of cutting in half the wages of the laborer, the pension of the soldier and his widow, and the accumulated savings of our people. The credit and power of this nation are great. It can sustain at par its present stock of silver coin, greater relatively to that of gold than that of France, of Germany, of Great Britain, of Russia, the other great commercial nations; but it has reached the limit of safety. Further advance in that direction, solitary and alone among the enlightened nations of the world, it can not take without inevitable disaster.

Now, sir, I have just one word more to say and then I shall be through. The gentleman from Utah [Mr. ALLEN] asked the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] during his very able speech—and asked the question as if it were one that was difficult to answer: "What is the condition of the Mexican people to-day?" That question I shall answer, in connection with the statement that by Mexican law there is in that country a complete system of unlimited coinage of both gold and silver upon practically equal conditions, the charge for the coinage of silver being a trifle less than the charge for the coinage of gold, but the mints being open to both metals without limit or restriction; and the result has been that Mexico is under a flood of silver and has coined practically no gold.

The question is asked, "What is the condition of the people under that system of coinage?" In answer I will ask the Clerk to read from the Bulletin of the American Republics, entitled "Mexico," pages 105 and 106—a publication issued by our State Department.

The Clerk read as follows:

Labor is abundant in Mexico; in some places the supply is greater than the demand, and as the laboring classes can live on such frugal diet and need so little clothing, wages, except for imported skilled labor, are small.

Speaking of these classes a Mexican newspaper says:

"One of their greatest evils at the present time is the existence of a scale of wages which defies all power of reduction; which robs the laborers of all sense of dignity or of feeling of association with the rest of their fellow-citizens, and having reduced them to a condition of abject debasement, deteriorates to a like extent their productive power and the measure of their utility. Instead of claiming and occupying the position of an important and essential element in the process of the development of the country's resources, they, the laboring classes, are content to regard themselves as a plant, or machinery, which moves by extraneous aids only, and has no power of volition, and no desire to exercise it if it had."

Mr. John Bigelow, late minister to France, once said that the laborers of Mexico lived at a less expense than a farm horse in a New England State.

The hacendados, as the large landowners are called, own immense tracts of land, and the hacienda, or manor, is a congregation of buildings forming at times quite a settlement, and is generally fortified.

* * * * * * *

The hacendado usually works his possessions in accordance with the traditions handed down from the time of the Spanish conquest—a veritable feudal system. He is not only a landowner, but he is a dealer in provisions, clothing, etc. His peons, as the laborers and tillers of his soil are called, are descended from those his father had before him, and they are paid, live, and work as their progenitors were and did. The peon is born under the shadow of his master's house, grows up, and remains under him, following his father's steps in everything; using his same implements and receiving the same pay, generally from 27 to 37½ cents a day.

Mr. CHARLES W. STONE. Mr. Chairman, let me say that if the condition of affairs there shown is prosperity I trust the day is far distant when such "prosperity" shall come to the United States. We want no such cheap wages; such cheap civilization; such cheap methods of living; nor such cheap money. [Applause.]

ADDENDA.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
DIVISION OF STATISTICS,
Washington, D. C., January 10, 1895.

SIR: In compliance with your request of recent date, I send you herewith a table giving the annual average farm price for the United States of corn, wheat, oats, potatoes, and tobacco, as estimated by the Department of Agriculture, for the years 1870 to 1893, inclusive.

Respectfully,

HENRY A. ROBINSON, Statistician.

Hon. CHARLES W. STONE,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Annual average farm price for the United States of corn, wheat, oats, and potatoes per bushel and of tobacco per pound, from 1870 to 1893, inclusive.

December 1—	Corn.	Wheat.	Oats.	Potatoes.	Tobacco.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1870	54.9	104.2	43.3	72	10.6
1871	48.2	125.8	40.1	59.6	9.8
1872	39.8	124	33.6	59.9	10.4
1873	48	115	37.4	70.5	8.3
1874	64.7	94.1	52	67.7	13.1
1875	42	100	36.5	38.9	8
1876	37	103.7	35.1	65.5	7.4
1877	35.8	108.2	29.2	44.8	----
1878	31.8	77.7	24.6	58.9	5.6
1879	37.5	110.8	33.1	43.6	5.8
1880	39.6	95.1	36	48.3	8.2
1881	63.6	119.3	46.4	90.9	9.6
1882	48.4	88.2	37.5	55.7	8.4
1883	42	91	33	42	9
1884	35.7	64.5	28	39.6	8.2
1885	32.8	77.1	28.5	44.7	7.7
1886	36.6	68.7	29.8	46.7	7.4
1887	44.4	68.1	30.4	68.2	10.6
1888	34.1	92.6	27.8	40.2	7.7
1889	28.3	69.8	22.9	40.3	7.1
1890	50.6	83.8	42.4	77.7	7.7
1891	40.6	83.9	31.5	37.1	8.4
1892	39.3	62.4	31.7	67.3	----
1893	36.5	53.8	29.4	59	8.1

From this table the following averages for the several decades are compiled:

	Corn.	Wheat.	Oats.	Potatoes.	Tobacco.
Average:	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1870-1880	44.17	106.35	36.49	58.14	8.87
1880-1890	40.75	83.44	32.03	51.66	8.41
1890-1894	41.25	60.18	33.75	60.18	8.01

Average London price of bar silver 925 fine during the year 1872, by months, and the equivalent value of an ounce 1,000 fine in United States money.

Months.	Pence.	United States money.
January	60.875	$1.3345
February	60.9375	1.3358
March	60.8125	1.3331
April	60.5625	1.3290
May	60.28125	1.3214
June	60.0625	1.3166
July	60.125	1.3181
August	60.125	1.3181
September	60.375	1.3235
October	60.125	1.3181
November	59.50	1.3043
December	59.6875	1.3082
Yearly average	60.2891	1.3218

BUREAU OF THE MINT, January 27, 1896.

R. E. PRESTON, Director.

Average price of silver, by months, during the calendar year 1873.

January	$1.3118
February	1.3118
March	1.3111
April	1.3097
May	1.3070
June	1.30022
July	1.3088
August	1.29334
September	1.28581
October	1.28786
November	1.27143
December	1.27221
Average	1.298

[From Statistical Abstract of 1894.]

Freight rates on wheat, by lake, canal, and rail, from Chicago to New York, 1857 to 1894.

[Prepared by Mr. J. C. Brown, statistician New York Produce Exchange.]

Calendar year.	Average rates per bushel. By lake and canal.*	By lake and rail.	By all rail.	Calendar year.	Average rates per bushel. By lake and canal.*	By lake and rail.	By all rail.
	Cents.	Cents.	Cents.		Cents.	Cents.	Cents.
1857	25.29	----	----	1876	9.58	11.8	16.5
1858	16.28	----	----	1877	11.24	15.8	20.3
1859	17.59	----	----	1878	9.15	11.4	17.7
1860	24.83	----	----	1879	11.6	13.3	17.3
1861	26.55	----	----	1880	12.27	15.7	19.9
1862	26.33	----	----	1881	8.19	10.4	14.4
1863	22.91	----	----	1882	7.89	10.9	14.6
1864	28.36	----	----	1883	8.37	11.5	16.5
1865	26.62	----	----	1884	6.31	9.55	13.125
1866	29.61	----	----	1885	5.87	9.02	14
1867	22.36	----	----	1886	8.71	12	16.5
1868	22.79	29	42.6	1887	8.51	12	†15.74
1869	25.12	25	35.1	1888	5.93	11	†14.5
1870	17.1	22	33.3	1889	6.89	†8.7	15
1871	20.24	25	31	1890	5.85	8.5	14.31
1872	24.47	28	33.5	1891	5.96	8.53	15
1873	19.19	26.9	33.2	1892	5.61	7.55	14.23
1874	14.1	16.9	28.7	1893	6.33	8.44	14.7
1875	11.43	14.6	24.1	1894	4.44	7	12.88

*Including canal tolls until 1882, but not Buffalo transfer charges.
†Averages of officially published tariffs.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF THE MINT,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1896.

Statement of the coinage of gold and silver from 1793 to 1873.

Description.	Value.
Gold coinage	$795,091,690.00
Silver dollar coinage	8,031,238.00
Fractional silver coinage	76,734,964.50
Subsidiary silver coinage	59,047,396.20
Total silver coinage	143,813,598.70

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE] is recognized for forty minutes.

[Mr. MCRAE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, I favor the provisions of this Senate bill. I shall vote for it. In giving the reasons why I propose to vote for that bill I shall not attempt to fill you with statistics or to please you with a map. I shall attempt to give you some reasons which seem to me strong enough to induce every Republican on this floor to vote in favor of concurring in the Senate bill.

It is related in the chronicles of old that at one time a cunning artificer in metals hung over the road a most beautiful shield, one side of it embossed in gold and the other side embossed in silver, and both elaborately carved.

Two knights coming in opposite directions, one from the east and one from the west, stopped at a short distance to admire the shield. He of the east said, "What a glorious golden shield I see before me." The knight of the west responded, "Sir Knight, it is a beautiful shield; but it is silver." He of the east responded, "Do you mean to say that I lie in reference to it? Sure it is golden." The knight from the west replied, "I know it to be silver." From words they came to blows; and they killed each other in defense of the opinions that they had. While lying weltering in their blood and breathing their last, an honest peasant came along and, looking on both sides of the shield, said, "What a beautiful shield it is, with gold on one side and silver on the other." And the knights said, "God forgive us for killing ourselves; that we did not look on both sides of the shield before we fought, and thus save our valor and our blood for our common enemies."

And so to-day the American people are fighting among themselves because they do not look on both sides of this question of the money of the country. The men from the East are for gold and the men from the West, like knights in legend, are for silver. The Republican party and the Democratic party alike are divided among themselves upon this question. I have no right to speak for the Democratic party. They enjoy internecine strife, they thrive on factional quarrels, and they are most dangerous at election times after they have broken each other's heads at primaries and conventions beforehand. [Laughter.] But I do claim some right to speak to the Republicans of this House and these United States.

I deprecate the manner in which this discussion has been carried on in the newspapers, and to some extent upon the floor of this House and in the other House, with reference to the epithets that have been bandied between one side and the other. On one side you will hear expressions of "gold bugs," "emmisaries of the Rothschilds," and on the other side we hear the expression "silver lunatics," and "silver cranks." To call names is no argument. It amounts to nothing. I am willing to admit that the gold men commenced calling names, and I am of the opinion that they followed the example set them by a young lady who heard her mother having a row with a neighboring woman. She thrust her head out of the window and shouted, "Hurry up, mother, and call her a thief before she calls you one!" [Great laughter.]

These gold gentlemen commenced calling names for fear the silver men would commence that game first. I will admit that if they did commence to call names, the silver men made a very good second in the race. [Laughter.] Now. all such bandying of epithets, and such talk as that, to my mind, is worse than time wasted. Particularly is it unnecessary and unsuitable for us Republicans. We can not afford it—and I am speaking to Republicans now as a Republican—we can not afford to have dissensions in our ranks. Titus would never have planted the Roman eagle over the streets and temple of Jerusalem but for the dissensions and factional fights that kept the Jews cutting each others' throats and expending more power in that than in fighting the common enemy. [Applause on the Republican side.]

And so to-day, when I meet Republicans on the outside, I say what is the good of fighting in the party; we must not fight ourselves. The Democratic party is like Joe Bagstock, "tough, very tough, and hard to kill." [Great laughter.] I attended the funeral of the Democratic party in 1872. I saw its estate administered upon. I saw the auction of the effects of the decedent, with Belmont of New York as auctioneer, to a syndicate composed of so-called liberal Republicans. Horace Greeley, Charles Francis Adams, and Carl Schurz conducted the negotiations and made the purchase, and the result of the election of 1872 was disastrous alike to buyer and to seller.

The Democracy was worse beaten that year than ever before, and the fumes of the bargain killed poor old Greeley, made Charles Francis Adams an imbecile, and reduced Carl Schurz to the faded condition of a civil-service reformer. [Great laughter.]

And yet in 1874 the Democratic party, for the first time in the history of probate courts, came fresh and undiminished in estate out of the probate court and, through some strange transmigration of souls that would puzzle Buddha himself to explain, aroused the American people and elected a majority of the House of Representatives. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And they have made a Democratic desert of this House ever since, except for two Republican oases, the Forty-seventh and the Fifty-first Congresses. [Laughter. Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, it is wise to look at these things. It is wise to remember also that in 1876 this same party, that is now supposed to be dead and buried, scared us almost to death when it came to the election of a President, and since that time every good Democrat has said, and no doubt if you will strip the clothing from our Democratic friends here you will find inscribed on their bosom the legend, "Tilden was de jure President and Hayes was only the de facto President of the United States." [Laughter.] We can not afford, then, to underrate their strength. We can not afford, then, to omit or refuse to do anything that is necessary for the purpose of bringing our ranks together in order to win the election, for in the campaign of 1896 we shall find the Democratic party, in the language of the prize fighters, "slightly disfigured, but still in the ring," and an antagonist worthy of our best endeavors. This House is very strongly Republican, but is our majority permanent? We can not tell until after the election of November, 1896. Therefore we must not be unduly enthused over our 130 majority in the Fifty-fourth Congress.

We can not win this year by a do-nothing policy. A do-nothing policy is unworthy of our party, unworthy of its history, unworthy of its membership, unworthy of its aims, and will as surely result in defeat as the election in November, 1896, comes around. Censuring Ambassador Bayard is not enough [laughter]; seconding Cleveland in Monroe doctrine ecstacies is not enough [renewed laughter]; cheeseparing on appropriations is not enough [applause]; denouncing the Democratic party and the President of the United States and drawing parallels between what they did in reference to the Wilson-Gorman tariff bill and our own action on that subject is not enough. [Applause.]

If we wish to win we must give the people something besides a do-nothing policy. Our self-appointed and our duly elected leaders of the party say to us, "Oh, do nothing, gentlemen; just pass the appropriation bills and go home. Wait until we elect a Senate and a President that are in accord with our party, and then just see what we will do for the people." But, Mr. Chairman, that policy will not win this year in my opinion. We must give the people some substantial fruit from the tree of Republicanism, now so strong in this House. Mere words, mere promises, for next time will not do. We must act for ourselves and for this body. For four years we have belabored the Democracy because they did nothing, although in power, and we at the same time promised to act, to do something, if the voters of the country would turn the Democrats out and put us in. Hence a do-nothing policy is worse for us than usual, and will not satisfy the hunger of the masses of our constituents, who are clamoring for remedial legislation.

What have we to do with the Senate or with the President? Let us do our duty as we find it before us, and leave the Senate and the President to work out their own salvation. [Applause.] I am reminded of a story of an old colored preacher who, speaking of the Bible, said that he believed in it. "Whatever is commanded in this book," he said, "I will do. If I should read in this Bible that it was my duty to jump through a stone wall, I would try. Jumping at the stone wall belongs to me; going through it belongs to the Lord." [Laughter.]

So I say let us do our duty as the House of Representatives and leave it to the people to teach the Senate and the President to do their duty and to pass the wise bills that we send them. [Laughter and applause.] I am a Republican. I want to see a Republican President elected. I believe we shall elect him. But I wish to avoid all question; I wish to make assurance doubly sure. I believe this is one of the turning points in the campaign. I may be mistaken. You may say that I am throwing cold water on the party that I love. You may say that I am wrong. If so, my only excuse is that I am uttering in public the sentiments I utter in private; that I am appealing to my fellow-Republicans in the only manner that I can to get their ear and attention to do something for the people, to act in such a way as to hold the party together in every State, and to recognize the appeal of hundreds of thousands of Republican voters.

I have no fear of the consequences to the Republican party if it does its duty and if its representatives fully understand all the questions before it. [Applause.] But I say to my Republican friends, looking at this political campaign as I do—and I have gone through many a campaign, sometimes successful, sometimes beaten, but always ready to fight [laughter]—I say to you that if the Democratic party of this nation has the courage of its convictions and, when it meets in Chicago in July, adopts a free-silver plank in its platform, if it does not beat us next November we shall at least be worse scared during the fight than we were in 1876. [Laughter and applause.]

I make no prophecies. I indulge in no threats, but I wish in time of fair weather to prepare for storm; I wish to keep peace in our own ranks. I wish to do right by our voters. I wish to do right by the people, and I wish that we would do something in regard to this question. The silver question will not be suppressed. It raises its head in every State, yea, in every county of our nation. It is the most discussed by the plain people of the land of any question before them. It must be met. The cries of its friends must be answered. It is the part of good generalship to increase our army and to cement our forces.

I do not believe in the policy of certain United States Senators who have made the cause of silver a stink even in the nostrils of its friends. I do not believe in the motto of the old Roman who ended every speech by saying, "Carthage must be destroyed." I do not believe it is right or proper to stick a silver amendment upon every bill. No man who is a real friend of silver will act as some men have acted in the Senate. As a friend of silver I repudiate such conduct. I am in favor of free silver. I am in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. I am ready to work for it, to speak for it, to vote for it, but I do not want it thrust upon me in the morning and at noon and at night. I do not want to be waked up in the dead hour of the night and called to a caucus, in order to put a free-silver amendment upon every bill that is brought before the House of Representatives, and no true friend of silver does. [Applause.] But I do believe in my party doing something for the cause of silver.

I feel that it is absolutely necessary. I feel that we need the votes of the silver men. To gain those votes honorably should be our aim. We should not make improper bargains or enact any measure not in full accord with Republican principles. But in the strict line of our duty to our party, in direct accord with Republicanism as enunciated from every Republican platform save one in the United States, we should recognize silver as entitled to aid at our hands and should do something to cause its rehabilitation as money of the nation. This is all I ask. This is what I am pleading for in my feeble way without going into the history of metals or furnishing you with tables of weights and measures and values and prices.

Have you gentlemen who so glibly talk about your majority on this floor and the certainty of electing a Republican President this fall—have you gentlemen who so glibly talk about the strength of gold monometallism—have you gentlemen who talk and feel so strongly in reference to sound money, as you call it, ever thought that there are 9 States of this Union, polling 37 electoral votes, that are solid for free silver—Republicans, Democrats, and Populists alike? Are those men not entitled to some recognition? Is not such a large portion of the United States to be considered in legislation? Are its interests to be ignored, its wishes disregarded, its appeals to be ignored, and its people told that they are like children, knowing not their own wants?

One other State ought to be solid for free silver. Its conventions are solid, but its Representative votes against the platform on which he was elected. But there are 9 States, with 37 electoral votes, solid for silver. Are the people in those States all crazy? Are they all "cranks"? We people in California consider ourselves reasonably well informed. Speaking for the other six Congressmen in California, I will say we are reasonably nice men. Of course I am willing to be counted anything; but I am speaking of others. [Laughter.]

But our people are united as never before on this question. Every State convention in California—Republican, Democratic, Prohibition, and Populist—passed resolutions in favor of free coinage of silver. Hence all the voters of California—proud, golden State of the Union—are together on this question, and I speak for them all here to-day.

Are they all crazy? Are they all lunatics? Are they all mistaken? Perhaps they are. If they are cranks, if the people of these nine States are lunatics, remember that Oliver Cromwell's Ironsides that won every battle, that gave freedom to England, that made the commonwealth of England respected all over the world, that carried the British flag in triumph wherever they went—remember that Cromwell's Ironsides were three-fourths crazy on religion; and they were irresistible in battle. So if we are "cranks," we are rather more dangerous than sensible people, and should be cultivated as friends, not ignored. [Laughter and applause.]

The Republican national platform of 1892 was for silver; there is no question about that. Why, sir, we could no more have carried a single State in 1892 upon a gold platform than we could carry this Congress in opposition to the will of a certain four or five men here. [Laughter.] Thirty States of this Union in their Republican State conventions passed resolutions in favor of silver. I have not time to read the platforms, but with the permission of the committee I will print them in my speech with the names of the States. I simply call attention to a few of those States; and the reason I do so is because I want to understand how any human being from North Dakota, or Indiana, or Illinois can vote against silver on this floor; and I want to hear some explanation when we come to a vote.

I want to understand how anybody from Delaware, or from Iowa, or from Kansas, or from Michigan, or Minnesota, or Missouri, or Nebraska, or North Carolina, or West Virginia can vote against silver on this floor. There is not anybody here from South Carolina or Alabama who represents the Republicans of those States [laughter]; but I should like to know how any man from those States is going to vote against silver when all the parties that speak therein have announced themselves in favor of free silver. [Laughter.]

How is it in the State of Mississippi, where you recently had a Senatorial election? Every candidate for the United States Senate was for free silver except one, and he was so badly beaten he did not know he was in the race. How, then, is any man from that State going to vote against free silver? How are any of these Republicans from Tennessee, from Texas, or from good old Vermont, and how, I would like to know, is even a man from the State of Maine going to vote in favor of gold monometallism, when the Republican platform of the State of Maine in 1894, the platform upon which all four of these men were elected, declared openly and squarely that the Republican party was opposed to monometallism, either gold or silver. Yet I presume that some of them, perhaps all of them, will vote against silver.

Only one State, and that the State of New York, has apparently declared against silver. That is not to be wondered at. "Ephraim is joined to his idols." [Laughter.] The State of New York believes in Wall street; and so far as New York is concerned, if the Democrats want the State of New York to lead them to defeat again, I am perfectly willing that they should have the State of New York. [Laughter.] I say that that is the only State that is apparently against silver. Every other Republican State in this Union has either passed resolutions in favor of silver (and the States that have done so number 30) or has passed resolutions in favor of bimetallism, which was intended to make the voters believe they were in favor of free silver, and hence I have a right to claim from the record that the Republican party of the United States, barring New York, was in 1894, when we were elected, practically unanimous in favor of silver and its remonetization.

I might remark right here that there are 25 Democratic States—solidly Democratic—that have pronounced for free silver. I am sorry to be compelled to say right here—and I say it to answer a possible claim that may be made that we do not need to carry the West to elect our President because we can get electoral votes in the South—that I take no stock in the hope of carrying a single Southern State at the Presidential election except West Virginia. Particularly is our case worse than hopeless if we refuse to recognize silver and stand upon a gold monometallic standard. Do you suppose that those gentlemen who control elections down South propose to allow anybody to carry those States for the Presidency except the Democratic candidate? If you do you are very badly fooled. The State of West Virginia perhaps may be carried by us, but that is the only one.

Twenty-five Democratic States, I repeat, have pronounced solidly for free silver. The Populistic party is also for free silver. There is a large number of them, although they do not make so much show here. Are these people, thus numbering millions of voters, located in every State of the Union, representing all shades of business and thought—all parties and creeds—all crazy, as I asked before? Why not, then, do something for silver, when its friends are so numerous, its demands so slight, and our Republican party platforms have so uniformly recognized it and pledged relief? It is in the mouth of every orator; it is inscribed upon the platform of every political party in this nation; it is recognized as a money metal by all these States; and even the States that have pronounced against silver have pronounced in favor of a bimetallic convention with foreign countries, thus squarely proclaiming in favor of silver as a money metal of the country, but seeking merely to postpone its rehabilitation, not because it is not right, but for fear we could not do it alone and must ask help of foreign countries to manage our own financial affairs and settle upon our own money.

For one I do not believe in foreign influences in this country either in a matter of money or anything else. I am in favor of the Monroe doctrine, not merely when it comes to the onslaught made on the little Central and South American Republics, but I am in favor of that doctrine when it comes to defending the United States against the onslaught of that mightier power, stronger than any army even that marched under Napoleon, the men that control the money markets of the world. [Applause.]

Why not support the Senate bill, Mr. Chairman? Why do you not support it? Why will you not give us something for silver? I would for one, answering my friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], not care one brass farthing whether the bill is an answer to the House bill or not. I do not care whether it is polite to us or not. It is for silver; it is a legal bill, and I favor it because it does something for one of our great interests, because it answers the appeal made by Republican voters through conventions and elections. I do not want the House to be so very polite, as was a young lady of whom I once heard, who, when the house was on fire, when she was cut off by the flames and stood at a window, the only mode of escape being by means of a ladder, when a brawny, grimy fireman came up through the smoke and the flames, with the ladder crumbling under his feet, and offered to save her, said: "No, sir; you can not take me down that ladder. I have never been introduced to you, and I can not get into your arms; I prefer to burn." [Laughter.]

I am not so awfully polite that I can not accept the bill simply because it is not an answer to ours. This is a bill for silver, and I accept it on that ground. If you think it too much for silver, then do not throw it aside, but amend it; modify it, change it. Show us some middle ground, some bill on which we can all agree. Give us some measure of relief. This on the face of it appears to be a relief for silver, and we are for it on that ground. If it is too strong a bill, then dilute it; give us something, though, that will help the silver cause. It is needed by the country. It will aid our party and the people alike.

Mr. Chairman, I do not regard this Senate bill as a bed of Procrustes, upon which every man must lie, and if he is too short he shall be pulled out by machinery until he fits the bed, and if he is too long that he shall be sawed off until he is of the required length. [Laughter and applause.] I do not regard it as the sine qua non of legislation, but it is for silver, it is in the right direction. You may amend it, but give us, oh, give us something, and make the bill, if it is not satisfactory to you, better by your own amendments, and we will accept it. [Laughter and applause.] But give us something which will legislate in favor of silver.

Some of us think this bill is a good one. Some of us are going to vote for it. Some of you think it a bad one and are going to vote against it in its present shape. If so, and perhaps you have a majority, then your majority will enable you to change it and make it better, but gives us some remedy, some relief under the circumstances. Do not wrap the mantle of criticism around your shoulders and say about this bill, "It is all wrong," and then fade away into the heavenly realms of your own greatness and refuse us any relief. [Laughter.]

Something should be done for silver. We are like the three little boys who hid under a tree during a thunderstorm. Said one, "Bill, can you pray?" "No." "Tom, can you?" "No." "Neither can I," then said the boy, "but, by George, something has got to be done!" [Laughter.] So, if you think this is not a good prayer, and if you are not satisfied with it, give us something for silver that will bring relief; something that will legislate for silver, for something should be done. [Applause.] Do not turn your back and say that "it is not good"; it is not the "original Jacobs"; it is not the "original Pond's Extract"; that it is diluted and needs modification, and then content yourselves with such condemnation and refuse to do anything except find fault with this bill. Do as you please with it—modify it, amend it, reform it, but give it to us in some shape or other. If it is not right, give us something that is right, in your estimation, and we will accept it. Every man here says he wishes to do something for silver. Now is your accepted time. Arrange some bill if not pleased with this one, and show your faith by your deeds. "Actions speak louder than words"; hence I beg you to act for the interest of silver, and not merely talk sweetly, promise much, and do nothing.

Mr. DINGLEY—no; I beg pardon; I believe that it is proper to say the gentleman from Maine. My friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] says the proper way is to keep still and do nothing; that time will work out its own solution; that relief will come by waiting, as I understand it. Perhaps it will; but you all remember, and permit me to call attention to the fact, that when the Dutchman undertook to teach his horse to live on nothing he said that no sooner had he succeeded in getting the animal down to one straw a day than the fool up and died. [Laughter.] So it is with this country. You cut us down to a straw a day, and that straw a mere promise to do something for silver; and the first thing you know we will be in very great trouble, almost financial death, and you will then have to supply some sort of a remedy, that can be much easier and safer administered to-day.

You say that this bill is not right. You listened for two hours yesterday to the remarks of the eloquent and distinguished gentleman from Maine, which I suppose from your standpoint were convincing. Did you tender us, I ask the gentleman, anything at all as a remedy? You said the medicine was bad that we wanted when you took the chalice from our lips, but you tendered us nothing in its stead. This is not right. We silver people are entitled to something; we silver Republicans are entitled to something. Give it to us. No, you reserved simply the right to object, as I have heard gentlemen say frequently upon this floor. That is all you did. Is that the way to treat this question? You said it was our duty to convince you, or rather the people who sympathize with you, in reference to this silver question, that something was needed to be done for silver, and that the demonetization of silver was wrong.

We say no. We say that the gold men began this war; that they caused all the trouble; they disarranged matters, and must explain why satisfactorily or be forever estopped from denying our position. We say that they began it in 1873. In that year times and people were reasonably prosperous. Silver was at a premium, as you yourself have stated, in 1873. The records of United States history may be searched in vain for the utterance of any man or any set of men, for a single word in any paper or pamphlet or magazine; may be searched in vain for any meeting or assemblage or convention, for any resolution or any platform, for any public speech or private utterance, in favor of the demonetization of silver in 1873. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask unanimous consent to continue my remarks.

Mr. BOWERS. I ask that the gentleman have fifteen minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will consent to an extension of the gentleman's time if I can have the floor when we commence the session to-morrow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not make that promise, as the time is already parceled out.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. Chairman, I am entitled, as a member of the committee——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I believe I have been recognized as entitled to the floor, to speak immediately. If I can have my time I shall not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman from California be extended fifteen minutes?

Mr. SETTLE. If this arrangement is to deprive me of the very limited time which has been allotted to me, I shall have to object.

The CHAIRMAN. It certainly will.

Mr. SETTLE. Then I object.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I am entitled to fifty minutes as a member of the committee, and I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. It can not be done under objection.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe I am entitled to that time, as I understand it, as a member of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not recognize the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. MCLAURIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I should like to know if the objection of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SETTLE] extended to my granting a portion of my time to the gentleman from California?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN] that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SETTLE] had been promised recognition at the end of the half hour accorded to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]. If the time of the gentleman from California is now extended, of course that will take away the time of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SETTLE].

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Why, no; it will not. We have got all day to-morrow and all day Saturday.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this question is out of order. Objection has been made. [Cries of "Regular order."]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman rather than have this discussion go on all night.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] yields to me, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is not in order. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] desire to be recognized?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] has yielded to me.

The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I desire to have thirty minutes to discuss this question. If I can not have it at any other time, I want it now.

Mr. MCLAURIN. I will yield time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] myself.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will yield all my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON], with the understanding that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN] is to give me his time. [Applause.]

Mr. MCLAURIN. Yes; I will give the gentleman my time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. What portion of his time does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] yield?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. All of it—thirty minutes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MCLAURIN. And I will return the same amount to the gentleman from Massachusetts out of my time. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] is recognized for thirty minutes longer.

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Chairman, during this debate the silver Republicans, as they are called, have unanimously been willing to extend the time for debate asked for by any member upon this floor. When the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asked for further time he was given an hour; and yet these men who call themselves Republicans and who want to disrupt the party upon this question, refused one of their own members an opportunity to close his remarks. I thank the gentleman from Massachusetts for his courtesy in giving me his time, and I will assure him that is something that neither my friends nor myself will forget; and I want to say to the other gentleman that I never forget a favor and never forget an injury. [Applause.] And if it means war, and they want war, I want to say, for one, that the silver Republicans of this House are willing to take up the gauntlet at any time and set the lance in rest with any of them upon this question. [Loud applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was saying at this time, in 1873, when silver was demonetized, no human being asked for it. You can search the records of the United States in vain to find one solitary utterance in favor of the demonetization of silver. The pages of history are absolutely barren in that regard. No mortal man at that time had the hardihood to advocate the demonitization of silver. But it was accomplished. It is a fixed fact; and we have had to meet it and face it ever since. Now, all that the silver men want, speaking so far as I understand the voice of the silver Republicans, and speaking so far as I understand the voice of the silver Democrats, all that we silver men want is to put the United States back in the same position it occupied in 1873, when silver was coined in the mints of the United States without let or hindrance. [Applause.]

This is all that this bill proposes to do. If you think that is too much, change it, amend it, and we will accept it for the time. Ever since 1873 times have been hard; labor has been unemployed; strikes have been frequent in the United States. Wheat—notwithstanding the claim of my friend and namesake from North Dakota—wheat has sunk so low that it needs the sound of the trumpet of some financial archangel Gabriel or the statistics of MARTIN N. JOHNSON to bring it up to a fair price. [Laughter and applause.] The United States has been a constant borrower of money since 1873. The United States borrowed $162,000,000 last year, in time of profound peace. The United States has just recently offered a loan of $100,000,000 more; and right here, Mr. Chairman, let me interject a remark: If ever I was proud of the United States of America; if I ever felt proud to be an American; if ever I felt proud that the Stars and Stripes float over a reunited country, a common American country, it was when I read in the papers this morning of the offering from the people of the United States, North and South, East and West, of $500,000,000 to take a loan of $100,000,000. [Loud applause.] It spoke volumes in favor of our nation and its wealth and stability, and it made me proud to be an American. [Applause.]

Now, this money has been borrowed by the United States since 1873, for what? To keep up a gold reserve, not to keep up any silver reserve. No such borrowing of money was needed prior to the demonetization of silver. No such bond issue was then needed. They have continued to borrow money ever since to keep up this gold reserve. We are borrowing it every day, but nobody is happy. The country is not doing well, and we say that the principal cause of it is silver demonetization. Perhaps silver demonetization is not entirely the cause, but silver demonetization is admitted by all to be one of the causes, and I believe all will also admit it is the main cause of the trouble now upon the country. Now we ask you to put this country back to where it was in 1873, nothing more. It is not an unreasonable request. It is made by many millions of voters. It should be heeded. We need those votes next November.

We ask you to quit trying the Keeley cure upon the United States. [Laughter.] We ask you to go back to silver. We ask you to put the nation back to where it was before you got to doctoring the United States with a single gold standard. Why, in 1873 Uncle Sam was healthy and was doing well in all particulars. The country was prosperous. We did not need to borrow money in time of peace. You commenced doctoring him in that year with your vaunted gold standard, and I am afraid if you keep up with your gold cure and your gold bonds you will find that the epitaph that was placed upon the tombstone of the man who died in Maine many years ago, and which reads—

I was well; I wanted to be better; I took physic and died—will apply to the people of the United States under your financial management. [Great laughter and applause.]

So we say now that we want you to quit doctoring in that way; we want you to adopt the same rule for the nation that you would adopt for your own family. If your family physician failed to effect a cure or to benefit the patient, you would discharge him and try another doctor. You have tried Dr. Gold for this nation for twenty-three years, and the result has been trouble. Try Dr. Silver now. Give him a chance and see if the condition of the patient does not improve; at least take him into consultation with the other physician; let him assist. Every man understands the condition which existed in our nation in 1873, and we simply ask you to go back to that condition.

Gentlemen say they are in favor of bimetallism, but that they are opposed to free silver; that they are in favor of bimetallism, but they are opposed to the coining of silver. They remind me of a man who was a candidate for the legislature in the State of New York at a time when the question of the adoption of the Maine liquor law was before the people. He said:

Fellow-citizens, I am in favor of the Maine liquor law; I believe it is a good law; I believe it would promote temperance; but, fellow-citizens, I am opposed to the enforcement of the Maine liquor law because it interferes with personal liberty.

[Laughter.]

You gentlemen who say that you are in favor of bimetallism and yet refuse to vote any relief to silver are like that man. You are in favor of the law but opposed to its execution. You are in favor of silver but opposed to doing anything for it. [Laughter and applause.] If you think that the free and unlimited coinage of silver is too much, give us less. Amend the bill. Provide that the silver of the United States alone shall be coined in the mints of the United States and put a prohibitory tariff upon foreign silver and I will gladly accept that and thank you in behalf of the people for it. It will not be enough, but it will be something, and will do good and keep our promises to the people.

Give us some relief in this matter and we shall be content. But do not turn a deaf ear to, as we think, the wishes of the majority of the people of the United States. Do not turn a deaf ear to, as we think, the opinions of nine-tenths of the farmers of the United States. Do not turn a deaf ear to, as we think, the opinions of three-fourths of the people of this country, as exemplified in party platforms. Do not turn a deaf ear to the opinion of three-fourths of the Republican party of the United States, as exemplified in the Republican party platform. Do not refuse to do something for silver. Silver and gold are the money metals recognized by the Constitution. Silver was once the unit of money in the United States. Silver was once coined in the mints of the United States. Silver and gold both were, prior to 1873, the money metals of the United States, and we ask you to restore that condition of things.

In the history of Rome, one of the legends of that old empire and republic was that at the battle of Lake Regillis, when the Romans were nearly driven to defeat and when it seemed as though the republic must go down before the power of their invaders, the spirits of Castor and Pollux, the deities that ruled over the fate of Rome, came down from heaven, drew swords in behalf of the Roman army, and led it to victory. So to-day we can say to you, If you give relief to silver, on the one hand the spirit of the gold mines of the United States will come forward, bearing the rich and yellow metal that enables the world to move, and on the other hand will come the spirit of the silver mines, bearing the white metal so necessary to the world, and, like the shades of Castor and Pollux, that carried the Romans to victory, these two spirits, these two metals, working hand in hand, will make this nation strong, prosperous, and forever happy, united, homogeneous, and free. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. SETTLE. Mr. Chairman, I listened throughout the remarks of the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and was highly entertained from the beginning until the end. I understood him to say at the start that he proposed to give the House some information on the subject of the coinage of silver and to deprecate the fact that too many of the discussions upon this floor did not deal with the true inwardness of the question. I expected him, therefore, to answer the question of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] who, in his remarks yesterday, asked those gentlemen who think as does the gentleman from California—

Can we, by the action of the United States Government alone, independent of all foreign countries, put the world's product of silver in the attitude of a yokefellow with gold?

I expected, I say, that the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] would have answered that question, and his great ability warranted me in entertaining the expectation that he would keep his promise and would offer some argument showing how that could be done. But the gentleman's answer has been mere rhetoric, mere assertion, filled with a great deal of denunciation of those who differ from him.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am not in favor of the gold standard. I am in favor of just as much use of silver in the money of this country as it is possible to maintain under existing conditions, holding the silver coin upon a parity, equal in purchasing and in debt-paying power with gold, but I do not believe that this country, by its individual, independent action, can assimilate into the currency that we have the world's product of silver, either at the ratio of 16 to 1 or at a larger ratio. I favor the use of silver in our system, but I agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that under existing conditions it is not possible for the United States to adopt a policy other than that of the limited coinage of silver until we can reach an international agreement among the commercial nations of the earth.

What limit would I favor placing upon the coinage of silver? I would like to see a measure offered which would assimilate the entire product of the American mines. I do not believe that that can be done without auxiliary legislation. I do not believe it can be done and silver maintained upon a parity with gold unless means are adopted which will give this Government a regular gold revenue, and on that line I should like to have an opportunity to vote for a proposition requiring the payment of not less than 50 per cent of the customs dues in gold.

Representing in part the State of North Carolina, let me say to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON], in response to his remark that he does not pin any faith upon the idea that one single Southern State will give its vote to the Republican candidate for President at the next election—let me say to him that if he represents a constituency and a people who think and talk as he does, North Carolina and other States of the South will be found more loyal to the cause of the Republican party than he or his people. [Applause.] Professing to be a Republican, professing love for the organization of the party, the utterances we have heard from his lips, if carried to their legitimate conclusions, mean nothing more nor less than that while professing loyalty, love, and affection he is strangling the very life out of the organization for whose success he declares himself so anxious.

I recognize the fact that in North Carolina, and in every other State of this Union, perhaps, there are wide differences of opinion among citizens with regard to this question of the coinage of silver. As to this substitute from the Senate, I agree with the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that the Senate should have made some specific response to the proposition which was offered by the House. There are some things in this substitute with which I am in full sympathy. I should like to see the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury restricted and limited. I voted in the last Congress for the coinage of the seigniorage; and I should like to see such a measure as that passed. I would like, under the other proposition, to see an amendment offered which would limit the coinage of silver to the production of mines located within the borders of the United States; and I should like to see an additional amendment which would provide this Government with a gold revenue, so as to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain these coins upon a parity with our other coins. Every child in this country knows that the commercial value of gold and silver is wide apart from their coinage value.

We hear much said about the union in political battles between the West and the South. It is urged that they have a joint interest in these questions. I know of no silver mine operated within the borders of any Southern State that is producing a sufficient amount of silver to make it an item worthy of consideration by the Southern people or the nation. When we say that the Southern people want free coinage of silver, I understand that they are not actuated by any sentimental attachment to silver as a metal. The breadth, the length, and the scope of our demand is that we want the volume of money increased; but, for one, I do not want to see the volume of money increased by the substitution of a fluctuating and depreciating currency; for I concur with those eminent statesmen who have declared the idea that of all curses that ever befell the laboring class of our people none is greater than that of an unstable and fluctuating currency. Always the cheaper money finds a resting place in the pockets of the laboring and agricultural classes of our people.

The South, therefore, having no silver mines, is not interested in the cause of silver personally or directly as are the gentleman from California and his constituency. He has mines in his State. There are mines of silver in the West; and I can well understand how it is to his benefit and to the benefit of his people that the Government of the United States should by law be compelled to accept every ounce of silver which is mined in his State or other Western States at double its value, receive 50 cents of bullion and stamp it as $1, and allow him and them to make their purchases with it as such.

The Southern people have no such direct interest as have the Western people in this coinage question. Therefore I say the South in this controversy is not an ally of the West. Hence all this talk of a union between the South and the West in political battles is farfetched and has nothing in it. So far from being allied, the South and the West stand to-day in the attitude of rivals. The West is a largely agricultural country; the South is an agricultural country. The West therefore is, in the markets of our own country, not our ally but our rival. We of these two sections have no union in point of interest by virtue of being agricultural countries and communities. I believe that the future prosperity of the South lies not in the direction of the future prosperity of the West, in agriculture and in mining, except so far as iron ore and coal are mined in the South. Our future lies in the direction of stimulating and encouraging the growth of manufacturing establishments.

Thus much in reference to the talk of a union between the South and the West in behalf of labor. I prophesy that so far as my own immediate country is concerned never will such a union be brought about. In North Carolina and other Southern States there are thousands and thousands of intelligent and patriotic people who believe that the Republican party is broad enough and able enough to solve this question, not on sectional lines, but with a patriotic intelligence that has regard for the welfare and the prosperity of every section, North, South, East, or West. The Republican party, which was originated in a spirit friendly to the laboring classes, stands to-day unwilling to commit itself to a financial scheme or theory which would inflate the currency by the substitution of depreciated money, which would be the greatest curse to the American laborers and farmers that ever befell them, not even excepting Democratic rule.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the cause of our depression is not the refusal to open the mints of the United States to the free and unlimited coinage of silver. Some Democrats say that it is; some Republicans say so, and almost all the Populists make that claim. The President of the United States sends a message to Congress in which he says that the condition of our country is due to the existence of the greenbacks in our circulation, and advises their retirement. If the President is right, if the greenbacks are a threatening menace to our country's prosperity, pray tell me why it is that that evil which exists and which you say is inherent in the greenback lay dormant until the Democratic party came into power in this country? [Applause.]

If there is an evil which is inherent in the greenback, and which lay dormant throughout all the Republican Administrations, never did you discover it until the Democratic party came into control in the Government. Under Republican rule, when our revenues were equal to our expenditures, when the credit of the Government was unassailed and unassailable, the greenbacks performed an important function in the finances of the country. They passed at par, and we never heard a word against them. But when the Democratic party came into power disaster followed, and they hunted around for some excuse to account for it. The Administration says that the greenback is the cause of it. I believe with the Republicans, who say that the cause of our trouble is that our revenues are insufficient to meet the expenditures of the Government. [Applause.]

I am, Mr. Chairman, therefore opposed to the retirement of the greenbacks according to the suggestion of the President of the United States. I am in full sympathy with the measure which passed the House, and is now pending in the Senate, for the increase of the revenues of the Government by raising the tariff duties; and I believe that should the Senate prove patriotic enough to pass that bill, and the President of the United States himself give an exhibition of that patriotism to which he has invited the House so frequently, and rise above party and approve the bill, or allow it to become a law, that the atmosphere will be so cleared that prosperity will return immediately to our country. [Applause.]

One other word I desire to submit in this connection. Since this Administration came into power we have sold $162,000,000 of United States interest-bearing bonds running for thirty years. We closed out the first deal with a syndicate, and but for the agitation in this House I believe, but for the provision in the bill reported by the Ways and Means Committee, and promptly passed here, which directed the President when he issued bonds to offer them first as a popular loan, the subscription to the second lot would have been closed out, as was the first, at a rate of about 104. Reluctantly, after much discussion and dissatisfaction, and against his will, finally the President offered the bonds as a popular subscription.

The Administration papers, from one end of the country to the other, and Democratic officials began to prophesy that the loan asked for would be a failure; and yet we are informed in the papers that the bids for these bonds aggregate $558,000,000 and over, and that the bids for them are not at 104, but that they range from 110 to 120, the average saving to the Government by this popular loan being estimated on this issue of bonds of $100,000,000 at between seven and ten millions of dollars. I say, Mr. Chairman, that the bidding upon these bonds is a confirmation of the wisdom of the Ways and Means Committee of the House. I repeat it is a confirmation of the wisdom of the Ways and Means Committee as well as of the House in requiring the Secretary of the Treasury not to be allowed to close out the bids or deal with a syndicate, but that he should be compelled to offer the bonds to the people as a popular subscription.

Now, Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself only, I propose to vote against the Senate substitute unless it can be amended in conformity with the suggestions that I have thrown out in my remarks. Unless we can restrict the coinage under this bill to the American product, unless we can at the same time provide the Government with a revenue enabling it to maintain a parity between these coins, it is my purpose to vote against the substitute. I am not an enemy of silver. I am a friend to the metal, and I want to see it coined to the very fullest extent consistent with safety. But never will I consent to or vote for the free coinage of silver except under an international agreement or unless we can have limited coinage of the American product alone. [Applause.]

Mr. BREWSTER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to very briefly call the attention of this House to one feature of this bill that in my opinion is not receiving sufficient attention, and that is that by its provisions there does not appear to be any intention of using these silver dollars when coined. They are to go into the Treasury along with all the other silver dollars, and certificates are to be issued.

Why buy all this silver that no one wants? Why not print fiat money and have done with it? It is pure inflation anyway, and the more there is of it the less is its purchasing value. I believe to-day the worst feature of our monetary system or lack of system is these certificates.

If silver is desirable to be coined into money, by all means let us use it to the fullest extent that it can be absorbed in the channels of trade. But do not let us deceive ourselves into thinking that we are assisting the silver industry or promoting the use of that metal or increasing its value by purchasing it to the amount of hundreds of millions of dollars and storing it up in the United States Treasury.

These certificates which we issue against this silver pass as money by virtue of an act of Congress. They would just as readily pass if there was not a dollar of silver in the Treasury. In their present use they take the place which should be filled by our legal-tender notes. They thus drive these notes out of use and place them in a position where they are the more readily available to draw gold from the Treasury.

If there was not a superabundance of paper notes in circulation greenbacks would be in constant use and could not be spared from daily use for a run on the Treasury.

These so-called certificates, actually warehouse receipts, whether issued for gold, silver, or currency, should be called in and canceled, and that for which they were issued paid out.

If silver is such a good thing, there can not be the least objection to its use in daily transactions, and I am satisfied that its use in this way would very soon convince the most enthusiastic silver advocate that quite enough of it had been coined. [Applause.]

Under the consent given, Mr. LONG submitted the following as an amendment to be proposed to the bill:

At the end of section 1 of the Senate substitute add the following:
"Provided, That this section shall apply to the coinage of the silver mined in the United States of America only."

Mr. McCALL of Tennessee submitted the following amendment:

At the end of section 1 add the following:
"Provided, however, That this section shall apply to the coinage of the silver mined in the United States of America only."

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, unless some gentleman desires to be recognized, I will move that the committee do now rise.

The CHAIRMAN. If any gentleman desires to be recognized for five minutes, the Chair will recognize him. [After a pause.] The gentleman from Maine moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The Speaker accordingly resumed the chair; and Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House, having had under consideration House bill No. 2904, had come to no resolution thereon.

GAINESVILLE, M'ALESTER AND ST. LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk (S. 879), to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory."

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the provisions of section 9 of the act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory," approved March 1, 1893, be, and the same hereby are, extended for a further period of three years.

SEC. 2. That section 1 of said act be so amended as to make the city of Fort Smith the terminus of said road on the western border of the State of Arkansas.

The Committee on Indian Affairs recommended the following amendments:

SEC. 3. That section 3 of said act be amended to read as follows:
"SEC. 3. That a right of way of 100 feet in width through said Indian Territory is hereby granted to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railway Company, and a strip of land 100 feet in width, with a length of 2,000 feet, in addition to the right of way, is granted for such stations as may be established, but such grant shall be allowed but once for every 10 miles of the road, no portion of which shall be sold or leased by the company, with the right to use such additional grounds where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 50 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein granted shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone line, and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used, such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken."

SEC. 4. That section 6 of said act be amended by striking out all after the word "Provided" and inserting the following: "That a map of definite location showing the entire route of said road through the Indian Territory shall be filed and approved by the Secretary of the Interior before any part of the said road shall be constructed."

Mr. FISCHER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas whether this bill has been considered by the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. BAILEY. It has, and it has been favorably reported.

Mr. FISCHER. Certain amendments have been suggested. Have they all been adopted?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes; the amendments are indicated in the bill and in the report.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. This is not a bill for a new railroad through the Indian Territory, as I understand it, but it is simply to grant an extension of time to a company already possessing a right of way through the Indian Territory.

Mr. BAILEY. Simply to extend the time.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I doubt whether there is room in the Indian Territory for any more new railroad rights of way.

Mr. BAILEY. There might be some question about that. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands, the amendments proposed are House amendments to a Senate bill?

Mr. BAILEY. This is a Senate bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs. The committee have reported it back with a favorable recommendation, and with the amendments which are printed in italics in the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BAILEY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

IMMIGRATION SERVICE.

Mr. LONG. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Accounts to present a privileged resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization be, and the same is hereby, authorized and directed to visit Ellis Island, in New York Harbor, for the purpose of inspecting the immigration service and of ascertaining in what respect any existing laws or methods may be so amended as to fairly carry out the objects and purposes of such laws; and that the sum of $560, or so much thereof as may be necessary to carry out the objects of this resolution, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated from the contingent fund of the House to defray the expense of this inspection and investigation, and the Clerk of the House is hereby directed to advance said sum to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. I desire in this connection, if the gentleman will yield to me for a moment, to obtain leave to print in the RECORD a statement of the relative force of the last House and of the present House, inasmuch as there was some confusion in the minds of several gentlemen the other day, perhaps, in respect to the matter. This statement is prepared by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I do not know that I shall object, but I think we ought to see the paper.

Mr. DOCKERY. Very well; let it go over.

The resolution reported by Mr. LONG was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LONG, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 173) to provide American registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig; and Joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to authorize the Attorney-General to transfer to William Henry Clifford a portrait of the late Mr. Justice Clifford, now in the Department of Justice.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. HULING, for four days, on account of important business.

To Mr. TYLER, for three days, on account of sickness in his family.

ORDER OF MEETING.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House may now take a recess until 7.30 o'clock this evening, the House to continue in session until 10.30 o'clock; that at 10.30 o'clock this evening another recess be taken until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning, the time to be occupied exclusively in debate upon the bill under consideration.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asks unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until half past 7, the evening session to continue until half past 10; that then a recess be taken until half past 10 to-morrow morning, for debate only upon the bill now before the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DINGLEY. And in connection with that I ask that the bill may be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. And the gentleman further asks that during that time the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] to act as Speaker pro tempore this evening.

LEAVE TO SIT DURING THE SESSION OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WANGER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WANGER. I ask unanimous consent that committees having meetings to-morrow at half past 10 may sit from that hour until 12.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WANGER] that committees may be allowed to sit during the session of the House to-morrow morning. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

And then, in accordance with the order adopted by unanimous consent (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.), the House took a recess until 7.30 p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by Mr. HEPBURN as Speaker pro tempore at 7.30 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is in order upon House bill 2904, to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Mr. ARNOLD of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, gain by any individual or any nation at the expense of honor is irretrievable loss. It is well, I believe, to keep this in mind as we consider the proposition of free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. To such a proposition I am unalterably opposed for many reasons. I am opposed to it because I have the honor to represent a district in which reside many thousands of laboring men, and I demand that when any one of them earns a dollar he shall not be paid with 50 cents; we must remember that the drops of sweat which gather on the honest brow of toil are of much greater value than the very best dollars that we can make.

I am opposed to it because it would very soon bring financial disaster to the large commercial interests of my district and the country at large. It can well be stated, in the light of experience, that fiat money is certain to be followed quickly by the fieri facias of the sheriff. As domestic money the free coinage of silver means not only a change, but an abandonment of the standard recognized by this country and all the great commercial nations of the world. And it means more; it means the adoption of a fluctuating base by which all home commerce will be measured, and with it would follow such an unending train of financial disaster and ruin as we have never witnessed. Were the American Congress to accede to such a proposition and embody such doctrince in a statute, every creditor would at once demand payment of all debts due him.

The depositors in all our banks would quickly withdraw their balances, and the banks would be compelled to collect their loans rapidly to meet such demands. In turn, the great active business class of men, the intermediate class between the capitalist and laborer, a class of men who are often borrowers, and who are, in fact, the live, active, really valuable business men of this country, the merchant, the manufacturer, the coal operator, and such others, could not meet the immediate demands of the banks and would go down to financial ruin, thus throwing out of employment hundreds of thousands of laboring men. Who can measure the ruin, distress, and suffering that would be entailed? I feel sure that this House of Representatives, which has become and certainly is to-day the thoughtful and conservative body of the American Congress, will not follow the wild and visionary views of the United States Senate.

The great business interests of this country to-day have seen and learned that they must look to the House and not to the Senate for protection and for honest money, and they are to-day watching us with intense anxiety. Do any of us fear the disapproval of some of our constituents, and, thus fearing, will we adopt the tactics of the timeserver and demagogue by evading or remaining silent on the issue confronting us? I well know tha there are in my district some so-called free-silver men. By my remarks I can not expect their favor, but they shall know that upon this important question I have the courage of my convictions. Like all of you, I care for my political future, but I care very much more that this nation be honest; honest with itself and honest with all its people of every class; that this country, the heritage of a mighty people, shall be prosperous; that my people and your people and all the people shall be contented and happy; that soon again we shall emerge from out the cold shadow of adversity into the warm sunlight of prosperity. [Applause.]

Let us address ourselves now and here to the great task before us, and demonstrate to our own people and to the world at large that by our act we will not agree with that radical body known as the United States Senate, and that by this House no financial dishonor shall blacken the pages of our glorious history.

That there is great business depression, that there are many who are unemployed, and that wages are too low will be readily admitted. High wages is always proof of general prosperity. If we were enjoying the prosperous condition of a few years ago, we would hear much less of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. Adversity is the fertile parent of wild theories, and with every period of business depression the speculative or incompetent or indolent citizen who fails is prompt to attack the financial system of the Government as the cause of his misfortune. Congress is powerful, but it has not the power to make 50 cents worth a dollar or legislate money into the people's pockets directly; neither can we produce crops and control markets by statute. There are business principles, practices, and laws higher than any statute we can enact; and you may pass laws enough to fill the Congressional Library, but no amount of talk, theory, or legislation can change the conditions of human life.

But, Mr. Speaker, the currency question, as I view it, is in no sense the cause of our financial troubles. A few years ago, when we were enjoying great prosperity, we had about the same quantity and just the same kind and quality of currency that we have to-day. We must look deeper for the cause; and in doing so let us keep in mind this truism—that any individual or any nation whose expenditures exceed the income will, sooner or later, meet with financial disaster. Is not this true as proven by all business experience; and will we not apply the same business principles to our Governmental affairs as we do to the general business of everyday life? If we will, then will we be able to discover the cause of our financial troubles, and having discovered the cause we can remove it.

Let me give you a few statistics:

IMPORTS FROM EUROPE.

During year 1895	$383,686,842
During year 1894	295,077,865
Increase, 1895	88,608,977

Thus it appears that during the year 1895, since the Gorman-Wilson tariff went into effect, we bought from European countries foreign goods worth $88,608,977 more than we bought in 1894. Now, having seen how we increased our purchases by this large sum in a single year, let us look at our exports or sales and learn what kind and manner of business we have been doing. Here are the figures.

EXPORTS TO EUROPE.

During the year 1894	$700,870,822
During the year 1895	627,975,133
Decrease, 1895	72,895,689

Thus it is clear that during the year 1895 we sold to European countries $72,895,689 worth less of our American products and manufactures than we did during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1894. And in the year 1895 we spent $88,608,977 more money in European countries, and they spent $72,895,689 less money in this country. So our loss for the year's deal, under the Gorman-Wilson bill, exceeded $160,000,000. Is it not, then, apparent to the most casual observer that the cause of our trouble is the so-called tariff measure passed by the Democracy in the Fifty-third Congress? That measure largely increased our purchases or imports and decreased our sales or exports, thus spending more than our income, which, as we have seen, always brings disaster. Not only this, but it has destroyed our industries, almost ruined the farmer, caused the loss of over $100,000,000 in wool growing alone, and, worse than all else, it has turned out upon the highways hundreds of thousands of honest laborers who are begging for bread because the opportunity to earn it has been denied them.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, this is not a party question, it is a business question, and one of common humanity. The laboring men of this land care not for your fine-spun theories of finance, or your treatise on political economy by college professors, but they do care for the opportunity to earn fair wages by honest labor; and they not only care for it, but demand it, as citizens of this great Republic.

Are we, indeed, so blind to our interests that we can not "see ourselves as others see us"? Let me read you an article taken from the London Financial News, of October 8, 1895:

Once more the board of trade returns are of a gratifying character, and the improvement has, fortunately, occurred all around. The imports of the month were worth £30,618,854, an increase of £378,393, or one twenty-fifth of 1 per cent. There still remains a deficiency on the nine months, but the figure has been reduced to £662,301. Had it not been for the lower prices ruling for wheat and cotton throughout the greater portion of the year this decrease would not have to be recorded, for in bulk the import trade of the nine months has exceeded that of 1894. Luckily, our exports have been advancing by such leaps and bounds that the lower range of prices has not affected their monetary value to the same extent as it has the imports. For the month the gain is £1,862,620, or ten fifty-eighths of 1 per cent, and for the nine months the augmentation reaches £5,157,866, or three-nineteenths of 1 per cent.

One rather odd feature about these figures is the fact that one-half of the increase comes under the head of yarns and textile fabrics, although one department of our textile industries has been very hardly hit. The great prosperity of the wool trades has, fortunately, more than offset the retrogression in cotton, though that reflection brings small consolation to Lancashire. The total gain for the nine months under yarn and textiles is £3,297,675, and as the value of woolen tissues taken by the United States has been about £950,000 and of worsted tissues nearly £3,000,000 greater than in 1894, no further search for the origin of the improvement in the trade returns need be made. The lowering of the American tariff has been our salvation and it can not be said that we have shown much reciprocity, for, instead of taking the increased value of our shipments across the Atlantic in kind, we seem to have bought less American produce. It is needless to go beyond our own board of trade returns to find an explanation of a good deal of the monetary trouble in the United States.

Practically every penny that was subscribed here toward the recent American loan has been got back through the expansion in the exports of woolens and worsteds, but the United States has not confined her increased purchases to those articles. Last month she bought less raw wool than in September, 1894, but had to pay more for it. She took more cotton pieces, more iron, more alkali, and more of sundry articles which need not be specified. In some instances the rapid growth of the preceding months resulted in a slight check in September, but in all these cases the figures of the nine months show a big advance on 1894. On the other hand, we have paid a good deal less for American wheat, flour, bacon, hams, cheese, tallow, and cotton, to mention only those articles in which the contraction is almost apparent. The fact that the Argentine Republic heads the United States in respect of maize is not without significance.

Thus the trade balance between the States and this country is moving rap idly against the former, and it would require a large and regular transference of securities from New York to London to redress this tendency and restore the former position. And with India, Argentina, and Australia keeping up and even improving their positions as purveyors of wheat to this country, with Argentina sending more as the United States sends less tallow, it will not be easy for the Americans to regain their old footing in our market. Last month India and Argentina sent us more wheat than the United States, and Russia and Roumania together also topped the American figures. These are all factors that must be borne in mind in judging the outlook in the United States, and it is unfortunate that they are so consistently overlooked in that country itself. The increase in the purchase of British manufactures may not be maintained; but, on the other hand, the United States must count on the competition in wheat and maize becoming more and more intense as time goes on.

The movements in the imports last month were not of a nature to call for much comment, but we must note with interest the substantial increase in the arrivals of sugar and guano from Peru, the larger purchases of goats' wool, due to the briskness of business in mohair goods, and the fact that South Africa has sent us more, while Australia has sent less, sheep's wool. In the exports spirits have gone up considerably, and mining would seem to be thirsty work, for nearly all the increase has gone to South Africa and Australia. We have already referred briefly to cotton piece goods, which continue to decline both in quantity and in value. Central and South America, with the sole exception of Brazil, are buying more freely, and so is Japan, to which country we are sending more yarn, also, thanks, no doubt, to the disorganization of native industry by the recent war. India is, of course, reducing her purchases, though Bengal and Burmah constitute exceptions in the case of yarn. To Brazil we owe a satisfactory increase in jute, yarn and pieces, while Germany joins with the United States in absorbing more woolen and worsted yarn. It is rather odd to find that iron is going to America in larger quantities.

Let us now, Mr. Speaker, notice how, in another direction, our financial affairs have been managed by the present Democratic Administration, and also make some comparisons:

Between August 31, 1865, the date upon which the national debt reached its highest point, and March 1, 1893, the amount of the Government's outstanding obligations was reduced by $1,881,367,873. To accomplish this remarkable feat of debt paying, bonds were purchased before their maturity and canceled to the amount of $770,809,750. The reduction of the national debt by four-year periods, is given on March 1 of each fourth year, as follows, cents omitted:

March 1, 1869	$280,430,492
March 1, 1873	403,948,484
March 1, 1877	65,204,017
March 1, 1881	73,646,781
March 1, 1885	480,161,982
March 1, 1889	341,448,449
March 1, 1893	236,527,666
Total reduction	1,881,367,873

On March 1, 1895, the national debt had been increased by $105,323,774, and on December 1, 1895, by $57,273,470, making the total increase under the present (Democratic) Administration $162,602,245.—New York World.

To this frank avowal of Democratic deficiency and imcompetency, we must now add another $100,000,000 of debt, authorized by the Democratic Secretary of the Treasury on January 6, 1896, making the total Democratic debt $262,602,245 within thirty-five months, as compared with the Republican decrease of debt of $1,881,367,873 within three hundred and thirty months, the monthly averages being:

Republican monthly decrease of debt 1865–1893	$5,701,114.77
Democratic monthly increase of debt, 1893–1896	7,502,921.28

Mr. Speaker, I confidently believe that the great masses of the American people at this time fully realize that because of the incompetency of the present Administration there must be a change, so that full power in all the departments of the Government may be given to the Republican party to enact such legislation, as they surely will, as will again give us prosperity in our business, comfort in all our homes, and contentment at every fireside. God speed the day when again the honest laborer shall have full employment at honest wages paid in honest money. [Loud applause.]

I do not abuse, and will not attack, the present Administration, The facts and figures which I have given speak in louder and more emphatic tones than I can utter. If it were cruel to sneer at its impotence, then the feeble must be pitied. As to the Republican party, its financial views and specific financial doctrine, I am not authorized to speak, but as a Republican I have my own opinion, and I believe I am in accord with very many Republicans.

I favor as money gold, silver, and paper, interchangeable on equality, each dollar as good as every other dollar. I favor bimetallism and free coinage based on international agreement. If this can not be had, then I favor the coinage of silver limited only by the ability of our Government to make and keep each silver dollar as good as every and any other dollar and maintain the honor and integrity of the nation. [Applause.]

Let us not be deceived by the cry of our free-silver friends, that the great debtor class has interests which free silver will protect. We must not forget that for every dollar owing by any debtor there is a dollar due to a creditor. Simple justice demands that the creditor should receive from the debtor the same kind of money in value which he advanced, and common honesty demands that the debtor should return to the creditor just as good money as he received from him.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, that, in my judgment, the financial question will speedily settle itself, when by a wise system of protective tariff we shall have sufficient revenues to pay our expenses; when by such system our great business and manufacturing interests are protected and thus employ our laborers and protect them against the low wages of foreign labor. Let us again see the smoke continually ascend from the iron furnace, the coke oven, the tannery; let us again hear the happy melody of the loom and the factory, again listen to the clicking of the reaper in the fields of grain which will yield the farmer profit and not loss, and then we shall not need to issue more bonds and shall hear no more of deficits and depleted Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration by the House is a bill "to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet a temporary deficiency of revenue."

As it originally passed this House the bill in effect provided that the Secretary of the Treasury should be authorized from time to time, at his own discretion, to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, coupon or registered bonds of the United States, to bear not to exceed 3 per cent per annum interest, payable semiannually, and redeemable by the United States in coin after five years, and payable in fifteen years from their date.

For the purposes of this discussion I do not care to enter into a consideration of section 2 of said House bill, inasmuch as the objections to the first section are conclusive.

The bill as passed by the House went to the Senate and was there considered by its Finance Committee, which reported back a substitute, the main point of which is that it provides for the coinage of silver by the United States as provided by the act of January 18, 1837, or, in other words, opens the mints of the United States to the unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

I did not have the honor, sir, of holding a seat in this House as a Representative of the State of Utah when the original House bill was here considered and passed. Therefore I think it fit that I should not only give my reasons in support of the passage of the Senate amendment, but should also give my reasons why we should accept it in preference to the bill which originally passed this House.

The people of the United States are opposed, and opposed on safe economic grounds, to the creation of bonded debt in time of peace. It has been said by those who own money and seek investment for it in such ways that it will be absolutely safe and beyond the reach of the tax collector, that great public debts are a source of safety, stability, and strength to the nation. The statement has no foundation in fact, and when the theory is carried into the practice of government it is fraught with direful consequences to the people who adopt it. Anything which adds to the burdens of the producing classes of a nation can be nothing but hindrance to them in the race of life. They are those who in the final analysis carry all the burdens of taxation and of private and public debt. How, then, can a nation be strengthened by increasing the burdens of those who create wealth? Useless debt incurred in times of peace is an economic crime, a crime for which not only that generation which incurs it must be punished, but a crime which affects even the children of the third and fourth generations.

And yet to one who studies the financial history of this nation there can be no escape from the conclusion that the men who own and practically control the money of this nation have been laboring for the past twenty-five years steadily, persistently, and cruelly to increase the indebtedness of the nation, that they might find a source from which they could draw additional revenues and additional gains.

The first attempt was to retire the greenback absolutely and completely from circulation. Under the distress which was thus caused came such an upheaval of public sentiment that those who had initiated this movement were forced to give way and a law was passed that the greenback, whenever taken into the Treasury of the United States, should be canceled and reissued.

By the demonetization of silver in 1873, done, as I believe, in the dark by stealth, without the desire of the people and against their present welfare and their future prosperity, a blow was struck at the integrity of the United States, under which it has reeled and staggered for the last twenty-three years. In spite of continued discussion in the Congress of the United States, in spite of Congresses elected pledged to the restoration of the white metal to its use as money, in spite of the growing distress of the agriculturists of the nation and the narrowing profit in all business, in spite of all true principles of monetary science this economic evil has been persisted in, and now, more than twenty years after the great wrong against the people of the United States was wrought, it is sought to take another step which inevitably must stifle industry and overwhelm our people with greater indebtedness.

Though the first attempt to retire the greenbacks had failed, those who had sought to compel their retirement had not yielded their point. The advocates of the coinage of silver have heretofore asserted that the next step in this conspiracy of the money owners against the producers of the United States and the world would be to force the destruction of the national paper currency. Citizens of the Republic have not realized this until within the last few months, but now the purpose is boldly declared and we are confronted with the proposition that the greenback and silver certificate must be retired from our circulation. And when this shall be done there will be left to us nothing but our gold, our token silver, and such national-bank currency as the owners of bonds and money in their self-interest may allow to be issued to the people of the United States. Then it will be discovered that silver, the silver that we have coined or have held as bullion within our Treasury, is a further menace to the gold standard, and the third and last step in this series of contractions will be taken, and silver, if the scheme can be carried to its ultimate end, will be retired from use, except in so far as it may be utilized as small change by the people. It is well that this purpose of the gold monometallists at last stands revealed, since men more and more will realize the cost to the nation of this futile and foolish attempt to do its business on a money basis which is constantly decreasing as compared with the increase of population and the opportunities which will arise thereunder for the use of money.

If the House stand by the proposition which it made to the Senate and refuse to concur in the amendment made by that body, and the Senate should recede from its position as declared in the amendment presented to us, there would be given to the President and the Secretary of the Treasury the right to issue bonds in times of peace; and for what? To maintain a gold reserve. It is thereby confessed that gold monometallism is a failure; it is thereby confessed that we can not maintain it under the practice of the executive department, unless from time to time we increase our national indebtedness, put greater burdens of interest upon our people and the far greater and farther-reaching burden of a continued fall in prices, and the consequent diminution of the ability of the people to pay the burdens which are thus heaped upon them. When is this purchase of gold to cease?

No one will dispute that there is distress abroad in the land; no man in this House has the temerity, sir, to arise here and claim that the United States are prosperous. In 1893, sitting in the galleries of this Chamber and those of the Senate, I heard men declaim on the great prosperity that would come to America if the purchasing clause of the so-called Sherman Act were repealed. The President of the United States said, in effect, that the purchase of silver by the Government had produced the financial distress which was prevailing in our land, and he called upon the Congress of the United States to pass in a day a bill which would relieve the Government from the necessity of purchasing 4,500,000 ounces, or any amount at all, of the white metal. The bill was passed, the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act was repealed, and no relief came. Instead of that which had been fondly pictured, came the necessity of supplying from time to time gold to maintain the so-called reserve—gold purchased with bonds of the people, purchased sometimes under the terms of a secret contract for less than their market value.

The President and his Secretary of the Treasury have had at all times their means of relief at hand. If they thought it necessary to maintain in the Treasury a given amount of gold, it was at their option at any time to pay out silver upon the obligation of the Government. The people would have been benefited, the bondholders and the gold speculators would have been stopped in their raid upon the Government Treasury. But these high officials refused to exercise this option, and under a law which conveys no authority to them for this purpose purchased gold and used it to pay the running expenses of this Government.

Now, sir, it is proposed to give to these officials, and to those who may succeed them, the right, under cover of law, to issue bonds at any time with which to buy gold in order to maintain the gold reserve. Why does gold leave the Treasury? Simply because it is more valuable for export than it is for use within the United States, and because under the low prices which exist we are unable to export of all of our other products sufficient to pay the demand against us of foreign countries. This would be equally and increasingly true had we no greenbacks, no Treasury notes, no silver dollars.

Mr. Speaker, there is a sound economic reason why bonds should not be issued at such a time as this—a reason which lies at the foundation of monetary science. The people of the United States are suffering from a contraction of their real-money volume. They now have as their real money, money of ultimate redemption, according to the estimates of the Treasury Department, about $550,000,000 of gold. No doubt this estimate is far beyond what the facts will warrant. In order to account for this sum of gold within the United States it is necessary to assume that outside of the $175,000,000 which are in the vaults of the banks, and the $50,000,000 which it is estimated are in daily circulation among the people of the mountain and Pacific Coast States, there are $310,000,000 in circulation among the people of the East, or hidden away by them. What man of intelligence believes that the people of the East have hoarded any such sum of gold as this? It is not in active circulation. Gold, as we all well know, is not in daily circulation among the people of the North, South, and old West. If they have this enormous sum it must be hoarded by them, withdrawn from active use as money by the people themselves. And every time that the Government steps into the market and buys $100,000,000 of gold it contracts the money market in so far and produces an evil effect upon business and production. All men acknowledge that the effect of contraction is to depreciate the price of products; that the expansion of the money volume increases the price of products. By contraction business is hampered, credit must be withdrawn, and failures may ensue. Therefore, instead of easing monetary conditions, the sale of bonds and the purchase of gold with the proceeds must inevitably have the effect of contracting the volume of money in circulation and of forcing down the price of all the products which we produce and offer for sale.

[NOTE.—Since the above speech was made I have received a circular from Dimock & Co., of New York, bankers and brokers, which, in commenting upon the bond issue, confirms my statement above. Extracts from the circular are as follows:

The work necessary to the preservation of a gold standard, so auspiciously begun, is far from complete. During the last five years the Government banks of Europe have added nearly six hundred millions of gold to their reserves. In the same period the New York banks and the United States Treasury have together reduced their gold reserves nearly one hundred millions. Yet all natural conditions were incomparably favorable to the United States. The trouble is unpalatably stated in a recent issue of a well-known politico-economic publication: "The history of our national economic and financial policy since the civil war is an almost unbroken record of fatuous ignorance and empirical experimentation, and insolent disregard of the best established inductions of science." It is of small use to take up one form of Government note, if another ultimately redeemable by the Government is to be issued in its place. The original issue of national-bank notes was monumental folly, and without support from any sound principle of economic or financial science. Gold can only be drawn to this country and kept here by sufficient contraction of the circulation to create the vacuum necessary.

The sentimental advance in stocks which followed the favorable developments of the bond call was even more than we anticipated, but the reaction must soon set in. The pyrotechnics are over and we have now to face for months the most serious contraction of recent times.]

Mr. Speaker, it is claimed upon one side that the source of this difficulty is the lack of revenue, and upon the other side of the Chamber that there is no lack of revenue. The question of revenue does not enter into the consideration of the question before us. In my opinion, at no time and under no conditions should the executive department of our Government have the right to issue and sell the bonds of its people in time of peace. To give the right to the Executive is to grant a power which will be used for the benefit of the few and add burdens to the many. No power except the Representatives of the people sitting in Congress should be granted the opportunity of creating or increasing such indebtedness. Therefore I shall vote to concur in the Senate amendment, because it does not confer upon the Executive the right to sell the bonds of the people in time of peace, while the original bill does grant this power.

It is not my purpose, in what I shall say upon this occasion, to go into any extended discussion of the question presented to us by the Senate amendment. The reasons for and against the free and unlimited coinage of silver, irrespective of the action of other nations, and at the ratio which existed under the law of 1837, have, for the most part, been presented again and again. But the rapid march of events has brought more distinctly into view within the past two years the extent of the evil which is being brought upon the United States by its adherence to the views of the gold monometallists. As briefly as may be, I shall view the question from the standpoint alone of our debtor relations to the nations of Europe and the new trade relations which must inevitably spring up and have arisen between ourselves and the silver-using nations of the world if our present financial policy be maintained.

The United States can not protect her citizens against low prices and maintain a monometallic gold standard so long as she is a debtor to the nations of the world. The people of the United States must pay abroad annually upon the interest of their debts, public and private, in the expenses of their traveling citizens, and to the nations which carry their commerce upon the seas about $250,000,000 over and above the excess of their exports over imports. This amount, which by some is made even greater, must be paid year by year, or else our foreign indebtedness must increase and must be paid either with the other products of toil or with our gold. We have not produced, and will not produce in the future, gold sufficient to pay this demand upon our resources. During the last year we produced about one-fifth of this sum. Therefore we must pay the balance either with the gold which has accumulated in the United States during the period when silver was continuously coined, or we must pay it with our products, or increase our foreign debts as we have done continuously since 1862.

We can not say to the nations of the world that we demand such or such a price for those products which we send abroad to pay this balance, but we must go into their markets and offer them for such a price that foreign nations will purchase, or we must pay the annual demand upon us by means of the gold which we produce or have accumulated. Therefore, to meet this drain which never ceases, if we would maintain the supply of gold which we have we must force the price of the product which we export down to a point where we shall be able to meet or undersell the products of other nations.

Since the first blow was aimed at silver, year by year, almost month by month, there has been a steady and persistent decline in the price of our great products which enter into competition in the world's markets with those of other nations, and the effect has been to not only reduce the price of that which we sell abroad, but also to reduce the price of that which we sell at home. The decline in the price of our chief exports has not yet ceased and is shown for 1895 as follows:

About three-fourths of our exports in value consist of the following-named items: Cotton, wheat, wheat flour, bacon and hams, lard, corn, pork, beef, tobacco, and cheese. The value of our exports of the above-named articles in 1894 was $510,012,686. In 1895 the value of our exports of the same product was only $452,719,941, a decrease of $57,292,745, a decrease amounting to 11⅛ per cent. As compared with the prices of these exports in 1894 there was so great an average fall in their value that had we obtained the prices for these exports which we received in 1894 there would have been placed to our credit by their sale $552,486,345 instead of the $452,719,941 which we actually received; so that in 1895, as compared with 1894, upon these ten articles our total loss was $99,766,404.

Therefore the statement which the Secretary of the Treasury makes wherein, to account for the decrease in the value of our exports, he says that this decrease is due to "the improved crop conditions in other countries" which, he writes, "account largely for the diminished exports of domestic produce in 1895," is without foundation and utterly misleading. The inference to be drawn from the language of the Secretary is that we shipped less of these products abroad in 1895 than we did in 1894, and therefore received less money for them, while the statistics prepared in his own Department and under his own direction show that there was an increase in the amount of the above-named products exported to foreign countries from the United States in 1895 as compared with the year 1894, amounting to 8⅛ per cent.

Nor will this fall in the price of our chief exports cease with the year 1895. Prices must go lower and lower until the level made necessary by the single gold standard is reached, and when that shall have been done we will be upon the level, not of Mexico, but of China.

The gentleman from Maine in opening this debate with dramatic fervor asked if we wished to Mexicanize the United States. This gentleman, with the adroitness for which he is distinguished, did not pursue the subject further. Other gentlemen upon this floor have undertaken to show that the people of Mexico are indolent, uneducated, oftentimes slaves to their masters, and, generally speaking, utterly unfit to be compared with the citizens of this great Republic. For the sake of argument I will admit that what has been said by the adherents of gold monometallism upon this floor during this debate is true. What follows? If such a people at a time when every gold-using nation in the world, nations which boast themselves as being superior in intelligence and business ability, finds itself upon the verge of bankruptcy and looks with dismay into the future—I say if such a people at such a time are found prosperous and business of all kinds within the limits and under the laws of that people is flourishing, failures are rare, and dividends are large, surely they must have some great advantage which enables them to thrive and prosper when other nations are increasing their debts and the burdens of taxation. It can not be found, according to these gentlemen, in their blood, because they are Mexicans; it can not be found in their customs, because they are antiquated; it can not be found in their energy, because the people are lazy; it can not be their soil, since it is no more fertile than that of gold-using nations; it can not be their sunshine, because it contains no more life-giving power than the rays which fall upon our own people. There can be but one explanation of the continued and increasing prosperity of Mexico, and that is found in the fact that she uses silver as money and has the advantage of the difference in exchange over gold-using nations.

The following extract from the Mexican Herald will show the exact condition of affairs with relation to matters therein spoken of:

Mexico is now in position to invade the markets of the west coast of South America in competition with Germany, England, and all other countries on a gold basis. It is very significant that Mexican print works are now selling goods direct to ports on the Pacific coast of Mexico, and taking the market away from the gold-standard countries, which can only be done now because the west coast is quickly accessible.

One of the greatest merchants, forty years in business and a large importer from Europe, says it is no longer possible for the United States or Europe to compete with Mexican mills, which can turn out excellent cottons at $1.25 less per piece. Mexico is growing more cotton yearly, and will soon be able to supply itself without bringing in American cotton; and as the growing and manufacturing are done on the basis of cheap labor and silver money, Mexico should aspire to enter the lists as an exporter of cotton goods.

There is an ample field here for the investment of capital in cotton mills, also in paper and other products. Mexican woolens are now being turned out of superior quality, and thousands of people are refusing to buy expensive English goods. Tailors are supplying their growing demands at prices less than one-half those charged for European goods. For example, trousers are being sold at $5 per pair which if made of English goods would cost $14. Mexican manufacturers are very prosperous, and there is undoubtedly a chance for a modern shoe factory. The policy of the Government is to render Mexico independent as far as possible of the foreign gold-standard countries. This tends to give employment to railways, and the policy of the Mexican Central Railway in favoring every Mexican industry on its various lines is cordially commended in Government circles. The road has become thoroughly Mexican in policy, with resultant higher earnings.

Hundreds of Americans are here, among them many capitalists, and there is a great interest shown in coffee lands and lands for general agricultural purposes. Sugar planters were never more prosperous than now, and this industry can not easily be overdone, as the domestic demand is not filled, and the profits will be large for many years. The National Bank of Mexico will in May declare a dividend of 17 per cent and add heavily to its reserve. The active capital of the bank is $8,000,000, and the reserve $5,000,000.

I will also submit the following letter, written me by a gentleman of standing in the City of Mexico, and which bears out the statements made by the silver men upon this floor and elsewhere that under the vivifying effect of silver coinage Mexico has entered upon an era of prosperity like unto that which we enjoyed from 1850 to 1873 under the impulse given our nation by the increasing flow of gold from California and Australia:

CITY OF MEXICO, January 18, 1896.

DEAR SIR: Answering your favor of the 12th instant, I send you under separate cover some printed matter and data referring to Mexico, prepared by this office. In this country the silver question is not discussed, as it is a question which interests us very little, being already on a silver basis. The prosperity of this country has undoubtedly been greatly aided by our silver coinage, as we have been entirely exempt from panics and financial crises of all and every nature. And although within the last five years there have been two droughts, which have resulted in partial losses of the corn crop—the most important crop of this country—still the receipts of the Government from taxes have gone steadily on increasing, and this in spite of the fact that there has been no increase in taxation. In fact, taxes have been reduced during this period.

The effect of the silver basis on this country appears to be about as follows: Native capital now remains in the country and is invested in home industries and enterprises, instead of being sent to Europe for investment as formerly. Also, as the income of our more important or wealthy families is entirely in silver, the premium on gold has resulted in keeping their money in this country and now a larger proportion of them remain at home and spend their money here instead of throwing it away in Europe.

Another thing: The premium on gold has increased in a most wonderful manner the exports of Mexico. We now export and make large profits on various articles which in former years it was not profitable to export. At the same time prices in this country have been but little affected by the premium on gold. I have been a resident of this Republic twenty-six years, and during that time intimately connected with financial and mercantile houses. I would say that a Mexican dollar buys to-day as much in this city as it did when I came here, and at that time a Mexican dollar was worth $1.10 in gold in San Francisco. The price of corn, beans, flour, wearing apparel, etc., is almost exactly the same as in former years. Of course there are fluctuations due to good or bad crops, but the average cost of all the various articles which go to make up the expenses of a family are almost exactly the same as when gold was at par.

You will note by the printed matter sent you the wonderful increase in the income of the Government, and also of the Mexican Central Railway, which I think will compare favorably with that of governments or railroads on a gold basis. Also, the price of Mexican securities has steadily been advancing in spite of the increased premium on gold. The fact is that an abundant supply of good silver dollars, which everybody can get and everybody can spend, seems to make people more cheerful, harder workers, and induces the capitalist to go into new enterprises. Although there are bank notes in circulation in this country, they are represented by an actual store of silver dollars, so that at a moment's notice the same can be converted into coin. They are, in fact, like the gold certificates of the United States, except that ours are issued by incorporated banks. Mercantile failures are rare, and manufacturing establishments, especially those engaged in the manufacture of wool and cotton, are paying large dividends. Banks are also paying from 10 to 16 per cent a year on their capital stock. While the perfect peace and order which Mexico has enjoyed for the last twenty years has had a great effect on the development and prosperity of this country, I also believe that our silver basis has helped us prosper as much as any other cause. Also, another element which has helped this country greatly in all mercantile transactions is the stability of our currency. It obviates the necessity of an inverted pyramid of paper supported on a small gold basis, and there are none of those sudden fluctuations and variations in prices which result from a less sound financial system. The capitalist or the merchant knows that coin can always be procured, and that its value for purchasing purposes in this Republic has had but little, if any, change within the last century. The income of this company, which increased $1,070,000 in 1895 over its income in 1894, shows in a striking degree the constant development of the country. In other words, a sound currency and fixed value has stimulated in the past, and is stimulating to-day, all mercantile enterprises, and the results can be seen in the dividends paid by the banks and mercantile enterprises of the country.

The premium on gold also tends to bring it to this country. European investors, taking advantage of the premium on gold, are more willing to come here and make investments in mining, manufacturing, etc., than if this disparity between gold and silver did not exist. While doubling their capital on bringing it into Mexico they can go into production of articles for export which are sold for gold, as, for instance, coffee, rubber, hides, vanilla, and kindred products, so that practically they double their capital and yet receive a gold interest on their investment.

A silver basis seems to tend to the increase of a larger number of small incomes rather than a small number of larger ones.

Any further information or statistics you would like I will take pleasure in forwarding if you will indicate to me what you desire.

Yours, truly,

A. V. TEMPLE,
Manager Bureau of Information.

MR. CLARENCE E. ALLEN, M. C.,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

In Consular Reports No. 182, for November, 1895, the consul-general as Shanghai makes a statement which supports the position which I have here taken—that the effect of the demonetization of silver by European nations and by ourselves has been to force down the price of those products which we export. The statement is as follows:

Stability in the value of silver is the one desideratum of the foreign merchant in the far East; and it is pointed out that fluctuations in it must really affect the well-being of the entire population of the United Kingdom. * * * Under the influence of cheap silver the volume of exports continues to expand, and the European consumer reaps the benefit of their cheapness in gold prices. The fall in silver and low freights have combined to enable the majority of the stable exports of China to be laid down in Europe at about one-half the cost at which they could be sold twenty years ago.

At the time when the United States entered upon the suicidal policy of destroying one-half of our money of ultimate redemption she found a remunerative market for her products in the marts of Europe.

In spite of the efforts which had been made by England in years past to establish the cotton industry in and the export of wheat from India, the United States had been able to demand and command a fair price for her wheat and cotton. Since that period not only India but Russia and the Argentine Republic and all the States upon a silver or paper basis have been enabled, through the difference in exchange between gold and silver, to enter the markets of the world and to force down the price of the great products which we export, and must export to pay our foreign debt and the interest thereon, to such prices that to-day there is no adequate recompense in any part of the United States for the planter, the farmer, or the ranchman. This could result because in the countries which have continued to use silver silver has the same purchasing power that it had before we recklessly, improvidently, and criminally demonetized silver.

A silver dollar in these countries buys the same amount of labor, pays debts, and purchases equally the products of the country even as it did before the gold-using nations finally effected the demonetization of silver within their limits. Thereby silver-using nations have erected a barrier against imports from gold-using nations which amounts to an ad valorem protective tariff of 100 per cent upon all goods imported, or, to state it another way, they have given their own people an export duty. Every bushel of wheat, pound of cotton, or peck of corn which they send abroad, since their governments retain the full use of silver, can be sold for one-half the former price thereof as measured in gold, because that gold price of such exports will purchase in silver as much labor or as much of the products of such silver-using nations as it would before we placed our financial affairs and the welfare of our people in the hands of the British. And if we would sell in the nations of the world, we must meet this advantage which silver-using nations enjoy by lowering the price of our products until we can command, or at least share, in this foreign trade.

This burden hitherto has been borne by the farmers and planters of this nation because their products have been those which for the most part have been sent abroad to pay the demands against us, but not only has the difference in exchange value between gold and silver reduced to extremity our farmers and planters, by reducing the price of their products below that which would allow a reasonable recompense, but it has compelled the silver-using nations to begin to manufacture for themselves. Under these laws which have been passed by the gold-using nations, where once it took a dollar in silver to buy a certain product from them, it now takes two silver dollars to buy the same product at the same price. Hence the silver-producing nations were compelled or induced by the very force of circumstances to establish within their own borders factories and plants which would produce for themselves that which they had theretofore been accustomed to buy abroad. Thus has the yarn trade of England in the Orient been destroyed; thus year by year are the East Indians finding themselves driven to the wall by the competition which Chinese and Japanese manufacturers are forcing upon them. And now the people of China and Japan stand ready to contend with us, not only for the market of the world, but for our own better and greater market.

The Republican party is the party of protection. Since the foundation of the Republic it and its predecessors in governmental policy have steadily held that the toiler in America must be protected against the cheap labor of foreign countries. To that doctrine Republicans heartily subscribe who believe that the true policy of our nation is to produce and coin all the gold and silver possible to be obtained. They yield to no one in their allegiance to the fundamental principle of the Republican party. By their votes for the last twenty years the great Republican West has made it possible for their party to maintain control of the United States Senate. By their votes they have sustained the fundamental principles of the Republican party. By their votes year by year the Republican party has been assisted to victory, and because we now and at all times announce ourselves to be unreservedly in favor of the coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, with or without the consent of any nation, we do not give the right to any man to deny our Republicanism. And we of the West, who were called silver barons until it was suddenly discovered that we could produce gold cheaper than we could produce silver, say and believe that there can be no adequate protection to American industry until silver is restored to its rightful place as a money metal, with coinage privileges equal with those of gold.

Already, by madly holding to gold monometallism, the manufacturers of the East, whom many of you represent, have so reduced the purchasing power of the agriculturists of the nation that their best market, the only great market of the world, has been circumscribed and constricted instead of growing and expanding as it might have grown and expanded had silver retained its constitutional prerogative.

But now another danger confronts these manufacturers, who have put their trust in the golden calf and blindly followed the behest of the English owners of money. Not only is the home market weakened and depressed by the contraction in the world's supply of metallic money, but no longer are Americans to control that market, let alone to extend the sale of their wares to sister nations which use the white metal, as our Constitution declares we shall do.

In support of the position which I have here taken, and which rests upon the eternal principles of monetary science, I wish to submit the following observations of one of the keenest and brightest newspaper men of the United States, Mr. J. P. Young, and some of the quotations from leading newspapers which he published in the San Francisco Chronicle December 13, 1895:

On the 15th of June last the Japan Weekly Gazette published a memorial drawn up by the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, in which the fact was pointed out "that Japan is becoming a great manufacturing country and rapidly advancing to a position of marked prominence in many branches of the Eastern trade." Figures furnished by the agricultural department show that the first cotton-spinning mill was erected in Japan in 1863, but twenty years later there were only 16 mills in operation, with 43,704 spindles. Since then the industry has advanced very rapidly. At the end of 1888 the number of spindles had increased to 88,140, and five years later there were 46 mills, running 600,000 spindles. The memorial above alluded to commenting on the department report, says that "there is a prospect of even more rapid development," and adds, "We think it unnecessary to refer in detail to the many other manufactures in which Japan is not only supplying home wants but is successfully competing with Europe in the markets of China, the Straits Settlements, and India."

Regarding Japanese trade with the United States and India, the memorial says:

We anticipate that if exchange with America remains at a very low level and the rupee continues to be held above its bullion value in India, China will eventually furnish to Japan all the cotton she needs, except such staples as can not be grown on Chinese soil. In evidence of this possibility the import of raw cotton from China into Japan increased from 61,328,021 pounds in 1891 to 95,115,180 pounds in 1893.

So, if the conclusion of these Eastern observers is correct, the fatuous monetary policy of Great Britain and the United States will make it impossible for either India or the United States to compete with China in the matter of supplying raw cotton to Japan. Thus we shall soon be deprived of the sorry satisfaction of furnishing the progressive inland Empire with the raw material for manufacturing the goods she promises to ultimately deluge us with.

The British Trade Journal of a recent date says:

Among the trades more recently introduced in Japan is the manufacture of watches. In 1893 Japan imported more than 103,000 watches from Switzerland, France, Germany, and the United States. The object of the new Japanese factory is to produce a watch of the cheaper kind. * * * But it seems not unlikely that the new concern will manufacture a better class of timekeeper if the demands should necessitate such a step.

There is no doubt about this latter point. Information from another source than that above quoted makes it clear that the American who is at the back of this new Japan enterprise is merely paving the way to the creation of a great industry in which he proposed to take advantage of the undoubted skill of the oriental workingmen, in order to turn out both high and low grade watches which will successfully compete with the best watches made in the Western World.

An English journal early in the present year remarked:

Japan has certainly prospered on cheap silver. Through the instrumentality of the white metal she has made large strides toward industrial independence, and has begun to be recognized by the older manufacturing nations as a formidable competitor. Japanese cotton and linen goods and other manufactured products are invading markets where a few years ago they were unknown, and it is interesting to note that the increased importation of such articles into the United States is beginning to cause uneasiness to American manufacturers.

If the latter statement is true, the American manufacturers have effectually succeeded in concealing their uneasiness. The manufacturing industry in the United States is a powerful one, and if those concerned in it once awaken to the disadvantages under which they are laboring in their competition with the East, they will speedily make their influence felt. But it is reasonable to assume that the American manufacturers are still in the dark, and agree with the Boston Herald that the people of silver-using countries are on a lower plane of civilization, and their efforts to develop manufacturing industries are therefore to be despised. Meanwhile Japan, one of the silver countries on a lower plane of civilization, is increasing her productions at a rate which seems rapid when compared with our own advantages. We have made some progress in the production of pottery, but we venture to say that the Japanese, who in 1884 employed 19,000 in turning out 73,500,000 pieces, and four years later employed 27,000 men, who produced 126,000,000 pieces, a rate of increase that has been well maintained since, have no reason to shrink from a comparison. The extension of their cotton and silk industry has already been noted as being on a threatening scale, menacing a competition which Western people will not be able to stand up against.

The Textile Mercury, an English trade publication, expressed the belief a few days ago that the mischief had already been accomplished, and remarked:

It is high time for the English cotton spinner and manufacturer to look out for suitable fields to which he may emigrate.

The writer added:

It really looks as if the growth of England's cotton industry at home had reached its limit, and that English capital engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods would hereafter be forced to seek locations in India and China in order to find profitable employment. * * * English manufacturers can only hope to maintain their supremacy in Eastern markets by producing the goods on the spot.

The question for American manufacturers to consider is whether they could maintain themselves against a competition which has nearly proved fatal to Lancashire. Should there be an exodus of English capital to the Orient for the purpose of establishing manufacturing industries in China and Japan, how could we in this country hope to successfully exclude the flood of cheap goods that would be poured into the United States? The present tariff scarcely offers any obstacle to the European manufacturer operating under all the disadvantages of the gold standard. How, then, could we hope to successfully compete with the same manufacturer after he has transferred his machinery to a country where labor is phenomenally cheap and is compensated in a metal which, when measured in terms of gold, is likewise cheap? The manufacturer, under such circumstances, would ask in vain for an increase of the protective tariff, for the enlightened opinion of the agriculturist would be against the granting of such a request while the producer is subjected to the destructive influence of a constantly decreasing measurer of values. When the money of the world was composed of gold and silver the farmer could afford to stand shoulder to shoulder with the manufacturer in the United States and assist in building up a great manufacturing industry. The achievement of such a result meant for him increasing markets near his own door, and that, translated into plain English, meant increased profits through the diminution of cost of transportation and the elimination of the middleman. But the changed conditions preclude the idea of agriculture making common cause with manufactures. The farmers are now perfectly aware that the tremendous fall in the price of their products is due to the appreciation of the value of gold, and they will not be so foolish as to consent to rivet their shackles more firmly by assisting in artificially raising the prices of manufactured products while no steps are taken to prevent the depreciation of the prices of the products of the soil.

If this view is correct, unless something is done to restore silver and thus put all nations on a plane of equality the gold-using countries must prepare to have their markets invaded by the manufacturer of the silver-using countries, not only by those of the Orient, but those of Russia as well. The Textile Mercury, in the same article in which it bewails the decadence of the English cotton industry, also describes the prosperity of the Russian cotton manufacturer. It says:

While the English cotton manufacturer is in dire distress, in Russia the trade is in a highly prosperous condition. The mills of Moscow and other cotton spinning and weaving districts are paying dividends of from 25 to 33 per cent. Spinners have all their productions bought up into the middle of next year. A manufacturer who wants yarn now can only purchase it at enhanced values from the middleman or speculator; it is not to be had from any other source.

Russia, according to the theories of the Boston Herald, should be on a still lower plane of civilization than the silver-using countries of the Orient and of Central and South America, for its chief currency is an inconvertible credit note, although the legal unit of money is the silver ruble of 100 kopecks. But instead of Russia being in a condition to excite the commiseration of philanthropists in gold-using countries she actually is enjoying a degree of manufacturing prosperity which fills with envy the ruined cotton manufacturers of England and the United States.

This advantage has also operated to deprive English shipbuilders of a share of trade. At a meeting of the China Mutual Steamship Company, Mr. Maitland, the president, remarked that—

The working expenses had been considerably reduced, almost entirely by the great fall of the gold price of silver. * * * For the repairs of their steamers very large amounts of money were annually needed, and they had already commenced to make repairs in Singapore, China, and Japan. With the dollar at 2 shillings the skilled Asiatic will work for a month for less than a skilled British subject will work for a week.

This testimony regarding the danger to the shipbuilding industry is supplemented by that of the chairman of the Peninsular and Oriental, the greatest steamship line plying between the Orient and Europe, who has not hesitated to predict that if the Chinese and Japanese continue to retain the advantage which the excessive appreciation of the value of gold gives them, the new vessels of the company will be built in those countries; and he adds that it is not at all improbable that the Chinese and the Japanese in the near future will build ships to be operated in Western waters.

On the 20th of September, 1894, the Hongkong Press published an article from the pen of H. Kopsch, F. R. G. S., in which he pointed out the reason why the English shipbuilding industry was suffering from the appreciation of gold. He enforced his views by practical illustrations.

Some years ago—

He said—

a mandarin sought to obtain estimates for a steamship launch in anticipation of his being permitted to introduce steam power on one of the lakes of the Empire. The tender submitted for the launch was £1,000, or 5,000 Mexican dollars. Subsequently the same officer renewed his inquiries and was amazed to find that the launch which he could have had built for 5,000 Mexican dollars when he first made his inquiries would cost him 10,000 Mexican dollars under the changed conditions. Permission has since been given to navigate certain inner waters of China, but owing to the high price of gold the Chinese are themselves making the boilers and engines instead of getting them from England.

This same writer also noted the fact that between 1884 and 1893 there were 399 steamers, aggregating 23,094 tons, built and engined in Hongkong, and he adds:

Twenty years ago had anyone prophesied that Chinese would ever compete with British shipwrights and engine makers, he would have been ridiculed; nevertheless the appreciation of gold has so reduced wages as to make it possible for China to compete with the West in the manufacture of articles for which the raw materials have to be imported.

If the Chinese are able to compete successfully, even when compelled to import the raw materials, as in the case of the manufacture of steam launches, what will they not be able to accomplish when, under the impetus which the planting of industries in a country naturally gives to production, they begin to pay attention to the development of their iron and coal mines and to the extension of the cotton-producing industry?

The extent and rapidity of this development should not be underrated or its significance misunderstood, as it seems to have been by some Englishmen and by our consul at Tientsin, who in a recent report to the United States Department of State, said that he had received information from a reliable source that the customs taotai at that port, representing officially and as an individual the big cotton mills then in course of erection at Shanghai and elsewhere in central Asia, had placed orders with a European firm in Tientsin for cotton-mill machinery amounting to nearly a million dollars (Mexican). Consul Reed, who gave this information, desired the attention of American manufacturers of such machinery to be called to the fact that many mills were springing up in various parts of China. This information was duly published in the consular reports issued by our Government and was reprinted in one or two trade journals. It excited no comment, however, and no doubt those under whose observations it came only looked upon the item as something concerning the manufacturing of machinery. They did not perceive its more important bearing and that the temporary advantage which might be derived from the sale of some cotton machinery would be followed by the loss of the American cotton-goods trade with China, which aggregated $2,851,957 in 1894, $2,772,065 of which consisted of uncolored cloths, which may be easily made by beginners enjoying the peculiar advantages which the appreciation of gold and the state of the labor market have given the Chinese.

What these advantages are may be inferred from a report of the board of directors of Boyd & Co., Limited, a ship repairing and machine manufacturing company doing business in Shanghai, made to stockholders on the 30th of April, 1894. The report, after remarking that "the general working for the past year shows a favorable result which has been largely contributed by the local industries which are springing up around us," goes on to predict still greater activity, provided certain restrictions which the Chinese have placed about manufacturers are removed. Discussing this phase of the subject, the North China Daily News says:

If this discouragement were only withdrawn and private capitalists and companies were allowed to undertake the business, Shanghai in two or three years would be a forest of chimney stacks, and the demand for machinery would startle the manufacturers in Lancashire. The cotton is to be had on the spot, labor is inexhaustible and very reliable; coal is cheap. There are no embarrassing factory acts, so that the machinery could be run twenty-four hours a day and seven days a week, and there is an unlimited market at a price for all that is produced. Once withdraw the present restrictions and there will be a wonderful outburst here [Shanghai] of industrial activity.

The Item, Philadelphia, Pa., in its issue of December 14, 1895, says:

The Japanese consul-general at New York says that he thinks Japan is on the eve of building up a large trade of Japanese products in the United States. He says Japan has an ample supply of low-cost coal and is buying and making the best machinery for a large export trade.

He adds that hemp and cotton carpets, wall paper, copper and bronze ware, crystal ware, silk handkerchiefs, raw silk, pongee, umbrellas, rags, beer, tobacco, coal, and matches are among the leaders.

Besides these, Japanese agents are now offering bicycles at $12.50; sashes, doors, and blinds, and wool carpets at astonishingly low prices; in fact, no line is now drawn limiting what that country proposes to do in selling to the United States, as well as to all gold-basis countries, so long as silver continues depreciated.

Take the above bicycle for an example of all the other goods. It is claimed equal to the best in this country, and at the price mentioned is delivered duty and freight free in San Francisco.

The $12.50 received for each bicycle is in gold. This is sold for silver, equaling $20 to the Japanese manufacturer. He pays $15 of his silver dollars for making, freight, duties, etc., and clears a net profit of $5 in silver.

This same method of profit is available to the Japanese for everything they are able to produce, as well as selling coal in the San Francisco market.

The consul-general says that coal would be so sold now if the ships had a return cargo.

The following is from the Chicago Evening Post:

When Japan entered the sisterhood of civilized nations no power gave her a warmer welcome than the American Republic. We extolled her energy, her ingenuity, and her enterprise, and hailed her as the "United States of the East."

To-day we are face to face with the fact that this young-old Empire—old in years and young with the vigor of a new civilization—is already proving a formidable rival to us in the market of the world and at our own doors. The conditions of Japanese labor are a standing menace to American labor and trade. The gravity of this danger was illustrated yesterday in a report presented to the National Association of Manufacturers at Central Music Hall. It was pointed out by the chairman of the committee on Oriental industries that articles of Japanese manufacture now appear in our Eastern cities rivaling and underselling American articles suitable for similar purposes. Japanese matting is now crowding out cheaper kinds of Philadelphia carpets. Japanese rugs, made in imitation of American patterns, are sold in large quantities in preference to American rugs of a higher value. Brushes are sold at retail in Eastern cities for about the American value of the unmanufactured bristles. American watch-case makers are selling to Japan cases for excellent movements, made there for this market. There are 46 cotton mills in Japan, with about 600,000 spindles. New mills are being erected, and Japan threatens to become a bold and large competitor for the trade of the world in cotton fabrics. The Japanese use the latest improved American and European machinery in this and other industries established by them. They begin with mechanical appliances that are superior to those found in some American mills.

There is no use blinking at the facts. Some of our manufacturing industries are gravely menaced by this rivalry of a country where skilled labor may be had at the cost of 10 cents or 15 cents a day, or less than one-tenth of the cost of such labor in our own country. To-day tens of thousands of our laborers are idle. Our markets are invaded and the American workman, like the American manufacturer, is the victim of an Oriental competitor, in whom rare skill and fine taste are joined with a simplicity of domestic habits which enables them to support life in comfort upon a tenth of what it costs to do this in the United States. This competition will grow keener and keener. Japan will not confine herself to her present efforts. Her people are introducing a great variety of manufacturing industries, all using improved machinery, and they are imitating the patterns and inventions of the Western nations with impunity, because there is no protection for either the patents or trade-marks of foreigners in Japan. The importance of this condition of things can not be overestimated.

Already the manufacturers of this country begin to appreciate this fact; already they see that while they have been sitting in fancied security, calmly viewing the distress of the farmer, a distress brought about simply and alone by the demonetization of silver, they have been preparing themselves for the same disaster through which their fellows were passing. The manufacturers of the United States can not compete with a silver-using nation, even when the conditions of labor are the same, because by the use of silver such a nation has a protective tariff against imports from the United States and has an export duty upon her own exports. To-day, into the port of San Francisco are coming goods manufactured in silver-using nations, with which our own people can not compete. Doors, sashes, all kinds of wood products, watches, bicycles, silks, and the finest quality of cotton goods in increasing quantities are being imported from China and Japan and sold at rates which make it impossible for American manufacturers to compete therewith.

We of the West feel the swell of the incoming tide. Soon with majestic sweep it will roll in with ever-increasing power and might, and wherever in its steady, onward, and growing volume it shall force its way American industry, based upon the quicksand of gold monometallism, will forever sink beneath its flood.

Onward through the grand canyons of our incomparable West; over the great highways of commerce designed and constructed by men who put not their trust in English greed nor in English finance for the American nation; across the plains which nurtured, educated, and made great a Grant and a Lincoln, that mighty tide of foreign industry, fostered, upheld, and become great by adherence to sound monetary laws, will force its way until the nation shall arouse itself and, employing every defense given it, stay and turn back the swelling wave of Asiatic industrial invasion by the coinage and use of silver money. [Applause.]

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a very brief portion of time this evening. We sent over to the Senate from this House in the early part of the session a bill entitled "An act to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue." As a matter personal to myself, I will state that I voted against that bill. I did not believe that it was in keeping with the doctrines of the Republican party. I believed that it was the business of the Republican party to raise revenue and not borrow money.

I am gratified, Mr. Speaker, that that bill has had the lines of the Senate drawn through every word of it. But they have sent back to us, in place and in lieu of the bill I just referred to, one entitled "An act to restore the coinage of silver, and for other purposes," and to that measure I am more opposed than to the bill that went from the House to the Senate. I take notice, Mr. Speaker, that the free-silver party, as they are termed in the country, demand nothing less than the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. In the convention that assembled in this city a few weeks ago to forward the silver interest, that was the one solitary feature of their party action—free and unlimited coinage of silver, 16 to 1. Nothing less than that will answer the purposes of those who are pressing this measure upon the country.

No proposition here to coin the American product; no proposition here to limit in any degree the free coinage of all the silver of the world. Mexico, Peru, wherever there may be an accumulation of 50, 60, or 70 cent silver—the attempt in this bill is to provide that it shall be coined by the Government of the United States, coined in our mints, and that we shall issue to the owner of the bullion a silver dollar, "In God we trust," backed by the credit of the American Government. Nothing short of that will answer the purpose of those who demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver in this country.

There is a section of this bill which demands the immediate coinage of what is known as the seigniorage. What that may be or what it is I am unable myself to tell. It is some supposed interest that the United States has in the silver bullion purchased under what is known as the Sherman purchasing act.

This seigniorage is said to amount to some sixty or sixty-five million dollars if coined. And that, Mr. Speaker, would represent the actual profit of those who sold this silver bullion to the Government, would be their gain, their clear profit over and above the value of their commodity in the market. The Government bought from them, during the life of that act, silver bullion at the market value. And it is said that there is in the free and unlimited coinage of silver a profit of sixty or sixty-five million dollars over and above the actual value of the bullion.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is something behind this free and unlimited coinage of silver that looks to the very great enhancement of the value of the silver mines. The owners of silver bullion, by having the Government put its stamp upon their commodity and turn it over to them with the guarantee of the Government stamp upon it, would of course realize a great advantage. It strikes me that the American people are not ready to say that the owners of silver bullion, which brings to-day in the market not more than 53 cents, shall have it coined and get the benefit of the credit of the Government for the other 47 cents. I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that there is any well-informed advocate of the free and unlimited coinage of silver in this country who believes that at the present time we can maintain what is termed the parity between gold and silver with free and unlimited coinage of the silver metal.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that while men talk about bimetallism, and about the use of both gold and silver as money metals, if we should pass this bill it would be practically silver monometallism, and it would be but a very short time before gold would disappear entirely from this country. There is gold in the country now. When the Treasury asks for the bids of the American people for the bonds of the Government, there proves to be more than five hundred millions of free gold that is offered for the bonds of the United States. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that if we should adopt this measure we should loose all this volume of gold, and we would at once take our place among the silver countries of the world.

There is nothing more sensitive than the money of ultimate redemption. I can remember very well that in the early fifties, after the discovery of gold in California, the bullion value of the silver in the "dollar of the fathers" became greater than its coin value. There was only a slight shade of difference—perhaps 2½ cents to the dollar; yet every dollar of six or seven millions that had been coined up to that time was bought up as a commodity and taken out of the country; and to take the place of the silver dollars thus taken out of the country we coined a little gold dollar about as big as your finger nail, which was to take the place of the silver dollar that, by reason of the 2½ cents excess in its bullion value as compared with its coin value, had passed out of the country, and passed out, let me say, forever.

I remember very well that when the resumption act was passed the subsidiary coin began to come out from its hiding places as early as 1878, and by the time the act took effect in 1879 the subsidiary silver coin was out in the pockets of the people, but never one of the standard dollars. Eight million of them, perhaps, had been coined up in 1873. They passed entirely away from the country and out of circulation. Somebody may have one as a keepsake or a pocket piece. I speak of this only to show that where the value of the metal is not maintained at a parity you can not maintain the coinage at parity.

Mr. Speaker, I voted in the Forty-fifth Congress for a bill similar to this. At that time we had no coin in circulation in the country. Gold and silver had been out of sight since 1862; and for fifteen years we had no coin in circulation. I believed at that time that the country could stand the free coinage of silver, and I voted for that measure. I believed that it would be a great aid to resumption; and we were aiming at resumption then, straining every nerve to reach a point where we should see again the money of ultimate redemption on the counters and in the hands of the people.

Mr. Speaker, that measure was passed by both the House and the Senate and was vetoed by President Hayes. Afterwards there was a compromise upon what is known as the Bland-Allison Act. I am free to say I think that vote of mine for free coinage of silver in 1877 was a mistake. I do not believe we could have maintained the parity between these metals even for a few years if the coinage had been free and unlimited.

Mr. Speaker, it is said in this House and in the country, and we hear it wherever there is an argument made by an advocate of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, that values have been shrinking ever since 1873; that farm lands have been going down; that the farmer is getting poor pay for his commodities. And all this is charged to the demonetization of silver in 1873. I shall not thrash over a bit of that old straw about the demonetization of silver in 1873. I only know that from 1873 down to 1892 this country enjoyed a season of great prosperity. I know that of the national debt of $2,160,000,000 in 1873 there remained at the close of the Administration of President Harrison less than $600,000,000. I know that during that period from 1873 down to 1892 we built a hundred thousand miles of railroad in this country. I know that we had prosperity almost unrivaled during all those years. And I believe, Mr. Speaker, that we must look in other directions to account for the shrinkage of values of farm lands and farm commodities.

If you will stop a moment and look around the world it strikes me that you can see some reason why the value of farm lands in this country should decrease—why the products of the farm should shrink in value. A good deal has been said here to-day about wheat. Why, sir, the time was, a third of a century ago, when the United States commanded the markets of the world, so far as that commodity was concerned.

We supplied the deficiency of western Europe. How is it to-day? Cheap labor is producing cheap wheat in India; cheap labor is producing cheap wheat in Russia, and the same is the case in South America. And the cheap production of that commodity around the world that we must compete with whenever we leave our own market here and go into the markets of western Europe is no doubt one of the causes that has had the effect of reducing largely the price of wheat in the last two years. We must remember that England, France, and Germany are looking around the world for cheap bread, England especially. She has been engaged for the last third of a century in hunting for cheap bread for her people wherever she can find it.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. DANFORD. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. The gentleman was speaking of the cheap wheat of India. Is it not bought with the silver bullion that they buy here so cheaply? If silver bullion here, in other words, had free mintage, would they not have to pay more for it, and does not that cheap bullion which they purchase from us come in competition with the cheap wheat of America through this medium of purchase in India?

Mr. DANFORD. I care nothing for the price of wheat in India. I am speaking of it when it comes to western Europe.

It was said here to-day that the value of wheat in India, or rather the average price last year, was, I believe, 68 cents a bushel. I think that was very greatly overestimated. My recollection is that the wheat of India when it comes into the market of western Europe is sold for about 48 to 50 cents a bushel, and one-half of that goes to the British ship that carries it from India to Liverpool. Not only the cheap wheat of India, but Russia, as I said a short time ago, is engaged in raising wheat, and so also is South America, and this cheap production comes in competition with American produce, and that has tended to bring down the price in the markets of the world. So also with wool, another commodity in which we in the West are very greatly interested. The price of wool has been going down gradually for years, not altogether since the repeal of the McKinley law, but even before the repeal of the McKinley law wool had been declining in price, and why? Because wool was being produced in Australia, in South America, and in South Africa—wool produced by cheap labor; and the competition of the American woolgrowers in the markets of the world from these cheap countries brought about this condition largely before the passage of the present tariff act putting wool on the free list. But that gave it a blow which was fatal to the interest.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that we are to look to the free and unlimited coinage of silver in this country to restore the value of farm lands or the value of farm products among our people. I do not believe that the free and unlimited coinage of silver will reach the trouble that the country is in. But we must prepare in some way, sir, to meet these conditions in the world, in Australia and in South America, as to cheap production of wool.

Now, if I believed that free and unlimited coinage of silver would benefit those who have been most affected in the last quarter of a century by the cheapening of farm lands and of farm products, I would vote cheerfully for the Senate measure. But I do not believe that there is any relief in that direction; I do not believe that there is any relief in debauching our currency. It has been my observation through life that men who deal in stocks, who deal in money, and men who control great enterprises, are men who, as a rule, are able in the main to take care of themselves. It is the plain man in this country who needs an honest Government more than any other, and it is the plain man before others that needs honest money. The men who manipulate stocks, who manipulate great moneyed transactions, can and will always take care of themselves in the great struggle of life; but, as was remarked a few moments ago, the man who has but a single dollar needs a good round dollar, not a 10-cent short dollar, but a full honest dollar.

Now, as to the quantity of money. It would seem from the second section of this bill, the one providing for the immediate coinage of the seigniorage, that those who advocate this bill advocate it from the belief that there is not a sufficient quantity of money in the country to-day to transact the business of the country with. Now, if you will look back to the condition of things as to money at the close of the civil war, you will find that we had in 1865 a little over $700,000,000 of money in circulation, a per capita of about $20.50 for each man, woman, and child in the land. With that volume of money we had paid off the soldiers; we paid them in the field; we had raised great armies; we had built railroads, built cities; we had progressed at the North here in the way of building up the country as we never had at any other period of our existence as a nation and a people. We have at this time, in the year 1896—we have near $23 per capita of actual money, near $800,000,000 being in the Treasury and something like $1,600,000,000 in circulation among the people. That sixteen hundred million dollars makes a per capita of nearly $23.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. DANFORD. Yes.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I do not wish to take the gentleman's time, but has not the gentleman made a mistake in his calculation of the per capita by not remembering that practically one-third of the population of the United States from 1861 to 1865 were in rebellion and did not use any part, practically speaking, of the money which we had?

Mr. DANFORD. I am giving the per capita of 1865, and I will publish a table prepared by the Comptroller of the Currency upon this point. It is as follows.

Specie and bank-note circulation of the United States in the years specified from 1800 to 1859.

[Prepared by Loans and Currency Division, Treasury Department.]

Year.	Number of banks and branches.	Estimated bank notes outstanding.	Estimated specie in United States.	Total money in United States.	Specie in Treasury.	Money in circulation.	Population.	Per capita.
1800	----------	$10,500,000	$17,500,000	$28,000,000	*$1,500,000	$26,500,000	5,308,483	$4.99
1810	----------	28,000,000	30,000,000	58,000,000	*3,000,000	55,000,000	7,239,881	7.60
1820	----------	44,800,000	24,300,000	69,100,000	*2,000,000	67,100,000	9,653,822	6.96
1830	----------	61,000,000	33,100,000	93,100,000	5,755,705	87,344,295	12,866,020	6.69
1831	----------	87,000,000	32,100,000	109,100,000	6,014,540	93,085,460	13,221,000	7.04
1832	----------	91,500,000	30,400,000	121,900,000	4,502,914	117,397,086	13,590,000	8.64
1833	----------	91,500,000	30,650,000	122,150,000	2,011,778	120,138,222	13,974,000	8.60
1834	506	94,839,570	41,000,000	135,839,570	11,702,905	124,136,665	14,373,000	8.64
1835	704	103,692,495	51,000,000	154,692,495	8,892,858	145,799,637	14,786,000	9.86
1836	713	140,301,038	65,000,000	205,301,038	*5,000,000	200,301,038	15,213,000	13.17
1837	788	149,185,890	73,000,000	222,185,890	*5,000,000	217,185,890	15,655,000	13.87
1838	829	116,138,910	87,500,000	203,638,910	5,000,000	198,638,910	16,112,000	12.33
1839	840	135,170,995	87,000,000	222,170,995	2,466,962	219,704,033	16,584,000	13.26

*Specie in Treasury estimated.

Specie and bank-note circulation of the United States in the years specified from 1800 to 1859—Continued.

[Prepared by Loans and Currency Division, Treasury Department.]

Year.	Number of banks and branches.	Estimated bank notes outstanding.	Estimated specie in United States.	Total money in United States.	Specie in Treasury.	Money in circulation.	Population.	Per capita.
1840	901	$106,968.572	$83,000,000	$189,968,572	$3,663,084	$186,305,488	17,069,453	$10.91
1841	784	107,290,214	80,000,000	187,290,214	987,345	186,302,869	17,591.000	10.59
1842	692	83,734,011	80,000,000	163,734,011	230,484	163,503,527	18,132,000	9.02
1843	691	58,563,608	90,000,000	148,563,608	1,449,472	147,114,136	18,694.000	7.87
1844	696	75,167,646	100,000,000	175,167,646	7,857,380	167,310,266	19,276,000	8.68
1845	707	89,608,711	96,000,000	185,608,711	7,658,306	177,950,405	19,878,000	8,95
1816	707	105,552,427	97,060,000	202,552,427	9,126,439	193,425,988	20,500,000	9.43
1847	715	105,519,766	120,000,000	225,519,766	1,701,251	223,818,515	21,143,000	10,59
1848	751	128,506,091	112,000,000	240,506,091	8,101,353	232,404,738	21,805,000	10.66
1849	782	114,743,415	120,000,000	234,743,415	2,184,964	232,558,451	22,489,000	10.34
1850	824	131,366,526	154,000,000	285,366,520	6,604,544	278,761,982	23,191,876	12.02
1851	879	155,165,251	186,000,000	341,165,251	10,911,646	330,253,605	23,995,000	13.76
1852	----------	171,673,000	204,000,000	375,673,000	14,632,136	361,040,864	24,802,000	14.63
1853	----------	188,181,000	236,000,000	424,181,000	21,942,893	402,238,107	25,615,000	15.80
1854	1,208	204,689,207	241,000,000	445,689,207	20,137,967	425,551,240	26,433,000	16.10
1855	1,307	186,952,223	250,000,000	436,952,223	18,931,976	418,020,247	27,256,000	15.34
1856	1,398	195,747,950	250,000,000	445,747,950	19,901,325	425,846,625	28,083,000	15.16
1857	1,416	214,778,822	260,000,000	474,778,822	17,710,114	457,068,708	28,916,000	15.81
1858	1,422	155,208,344	260,000,000	415,208,344	6,398,316	408,810,028	29,753,000	13.78
1859	1,476	193,306,818	250,000,000	443,306,818	4,339,276	438,967,542	30,596,000	14.35

Coin and paper circulation of the United States on June 30, from 1860 to 1895, inclusive.

[Prepared by Loans and Currency Division, Treasury Department.]

Year.	Coin in United States, including bullion in Treasury.	Paper money in United States.	Total money.	Coin, bullion, and paper money in Treasury.	Circulation.	Population.	Money in United States per capita.	Circulation per capita.
1860	$235,000,000	$207,102,477	$442,102.477	$6,695,225	$435,407,252	31,443,321	$14.06	$13.85
1861	250,000,000	202,005,767	452,005,767	3,600,000	448,405,767	32,064,000	14.09	13.98
1862	25,000,000	333,452,079	358,452,079	23,754,335	334,697,744	32,704,000	10.96	10.23
1863	25,000,000	649,867,283	674,867,283	79,473,245	595,394,038	33,365,000	20.23	17.84
1864	25,000,000	680,588,067	705,588,067	35,946,589	669,641,478	34,046,000	20.72	19.67
1865	25,000,000	745,129,755	770,129,755	55,426,760	714,702,995	34,748,000	22.16	20.57
1866	25,000,000	729,327,254	754,327,254	80,839,010	673,488,244	35,469,000	21.27	18.99
1867	25,000,000	703,200,612	728,200,612	66,208,543	661,992,069	36,211,000	20.11	18.28
1868	25,000,000	691,553,578	716,553,578	36,449,917	680,103,661	36,973,000	19.38	18.39
1869	25,000,000	690,351,180	715,351,180	50,898,289	664,452,891	37,756,000	18.95	17.60
1870	25,000,000	697,868,461	722,868,461	47,655,667	675,212,794	38,558,371	18.73	17.50
1871	25,000,000	716,812,174	741,812,174	25,923,169	715,889,005	39,555,000	18.75	18.10
1872	25,000,000	737,721,565	762,721,565	24,412,016	738,309,540	40,596,000	18.70	18.19
1873	25,000,000	749,445,610	774,445,610	22,563,801	751,881,809	41,677,000	18.58	18.04
1874	25,000,000	781,024,781	806,024,781	29,941,750	776,083,031	42,796,000	18.83	18.13
1875	25,000,000	773,273,509	798,273,509	44,171,562	754,101,947	43,951,000	18.16	17.16
1876	52,418,734	738,264,550	790,683,284	63,073,896	727,609,388	45,137,000	17.52	16.12
1877	65,837,506	697,216,341	763,053,847	40,738,964	722,314,883	46,353,000	16.46	15.58
1878	102,047,907	689,205,669	791,253,576	62,120,942	729,152,634	47,598,000	16.62	15.32
1879	357,268,178	694,253,363	1,051,521,541	232,889,748	818,631,793	48,866,000	21.52	16.75
1880	494,363,884	711,565,313	1,205,929,197	232,546,969	973,382,228	50,155,783	24.04	19.41
1881	647,868,682	758,673,141	1,406,541,823	292,303,704	1,114,238,119	51,316,000	27.41	21.71
1882	703,974,859	776,556,880	1,480,531,719	306,241,300	1,174,290,419	52,495,000	28.20	22.37
1883	769,740,048	873,749,768	1,643,489,816	413,184,120	1,230,305,696	53,693,000	30.60	22.91
1884	801,068,939	904,385,250	1,705,454,198	461,528,220	1,243,925,969	54,911,000	31.06	22.65
1885	872,175,823	945,482,513	1,817,658,336	525,089,721	1,292,568,615	56,148,000	32.37	23.02
1886	903,027,364	905,532,390	1,808,559,694	555,859,169	1,252,700,525	57,404,000	31.50	21.82
1887	1,007,513,901	892,928,771	1,900,442,672	582,903,529	1,317,539,143	58,680,000	32.39	22.45
1888	1,092,391,690	970,564,259	2,062,955,949	690,785,079	1,372,170,870	59,974,000	34.39	22.88
1889	1,100,612,434	947,738,277	2,075,350,711	694,989,062	1,380,361,649	61,289,000	33.86	22.52
1890	1,152,471,638	991,754,521	2,144,226,159	714,974,889	1,429,251,270	62,622,250	34.24	22.82
1891	1,163,185,054	1,032,039,021	2,195,224,075	697,783,368	1,497,440,707	63,975,000	34.31	23.41
1892	1,232,854,331	1,139,745,170	2,372,599,501	771,252,314	1,601,347,187	65,520,000	36.21	24.54
1893	1,213,413,584	1,109,988,808	2,323,402,392	726,701,147	1,596,701,245	66,946,000	34.70	23.85
1894	1,251,543,158	1,168,891,623	2,420,434,781	759,626,073	1,660,808,708	68,397,000	35.39	24.28
1895	1,260,987,506	1,137,619,914	2,398,607,420	796,638,947	1,601,968,473	69,878,000	34.33	22.93

NOTE 1.—Specie payments were suspended from January 1, 1862, to January 1, 1879. During the greater part of that period gold and silver coins were not in circulation except on the Pacific Coast, where, it is estimated, the specie circulation was generally about $25,000,000. This estimated amount is the only coin included in the above statement from 1862 to 1875, inclusive.

NOTE 2.—In 1876 subsidiary silver again came into use, and is included in this statement, beginning with that year.

NOTE 3.—The coinage of standard silver dollars began in 1878 under the act of February 28, 1878.

NOTE 4.—Specie payments were resumed January 1, 1879, and all gold and silver coins, as well as gold and silver bullion in the Treasury, are included in this statement from and after that date.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. The question I asked was, were not two-thirds of our thirty millions of people using that $700,000,000, which would bring up the per capita to over $30?

Mr. DANFORD. The war closed in 1865, and there never was greater prosperity in this land than during the next few years. The whole people of the country were using the money that we then had, which amounted to a per capita of about $20 or $21.

I speak of this, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of showing that it is not more money that we want, but more business. In those days a ten-dollar bill was busy from early morning until late at night. It did a great many errands in the course of a day. Now, in these last two years the money that we have, amounting to a per capita of nearly $23, has been idle a great portion of the time. We have not been doing business. The remedy which I propose is that we should return to the policy of the Republican party as expressed in the McKinley schedules of the tariff bill, that we should return to the policy of protection, which built up this country from 1862 to 1892. The great progress that we made in those years I attribute to the fact that we were taking care of the American markets for the American people.

Mr. COOPER of Texas. Mr. Speaker, there are times in the life of every individual when he is perplexed by the necessity of accepting or rejecting a policy because the good which it contains is blended in varying proportions with evil.

There are other times in the life of each individual and of each nation when the choice is between absolute good and unmixed evil—when all the convictions of reason, all the teachings of history, all the suggestions of experience, unite with all the generous impulses of man's highest and best nature to influence and lead his action in one particular direction. In such cases duty is plain and choice is easy. And this, Mr. Speaker, is my attitude to-day in reference to this bill.

We are called upon, as the people's representatives, to decide whether we shall, by insisting on House bill 2904—the bond bill—authorize the executive branch of this Government to burden the people of this country with a debt which the present Administration admits to be unnecessary except for the purpose of retiring and eliminating from our circulation the "greenbacks" and Treasury notes issued under the law of 1890; or whether we shall, by returning to bimetallism, adopt a course which will remove the causes whose existence has been pointed to as an argument for the authorization by this Congress of the issue of bonds. In order intelligently to apply a remedy in any particular case it is always of the highest importance to clearly understand the exact nature of the ailment for which it is necessary to prescribe. In this case we have three distinct and different diagnoses and, naturally, three distinct and different prescriptions.

THE PRESIDETN'S DIAGNOSIS AND REMEDY.

1. The President and those who agree with him on financial questions claim that the true cause of all our woes is the circulation of greenbacks and United States Treasury notes in the channels of business and the danger to our gold reserve arising from the possibility of their being used to draw gold from the Treasury. To remedy this state of affairs (in which they conceive the whole danger to lie) we are asked to authorize the final retirement and cancellation of these noninterest-bearing obligations of the Government payable by law in coin and the substitution in lieu thereof of an equivalent amount of interest-bearing bonded indebtedness payable in gold.

However much I may differ with the President in my financial views, I heartily accord to him that same sincerity, honesty, and purity of purpose (no less and no more), that I claim for myself. Now, if we accept the President's view of our financial troubles, it is our manifest duty, in all sincerity, to lend to his financial policy all the legislative aid that he asks at our hands.

THE REPUBLICAN DIAGNOSIS AND REMEDY.

2. In the second place, our Republican friends claim that the greenbacks are not the cause of the trouble; and in support of their position they can point to the fact that during the fourteen years between the resumption of specie payments in 1879 and the retirement of the Republican party from power in 1893 no such trouble arose through the existence and circulation of the greenbacks as that which the President is now trying to lay at their door.

They claim that the true cause of the derangement of our financial system consists in an inadequacy of revenue to meet the necessities of the Government. In support of this contention they point out that if the Administration had not issued and sold $162,500,000 of bonds, and put the proceeds thereof into the Treasury, there would not be a dollar in that Treasury to day had the same payments been made that have been made.

In pursuance of and in harmony with this claim that the real trouble arises from an insufficient revenue the Republican majority on this floor has, by the passage of House bill No. 2904, provided for the issue and sale, by the Secretary of the Treasury, of bonds to meet any temporary deficiency that now exists, or that may hereafter arise, in the Government's revenues.

It is necessary to a just statement of their position to add that they do not look to this as the normal method—the permanent method—of meeting such deficiencies. They offer this as a temporary or emergency scheme, which will be found necessary only until the amendments which they have proposed to the present tariff law shall have become operative, when, they assert, the tariff itself will produce a sufficient revenue to render a further resort to this bond law unnecessary. This assertion I deny, and in this denial I am supported by the history of this country; but such is the Republican view of the situation. If this view be the correct one, then it only remains for us to consider the wisdom of the remedy proposed by our Republican friends.

THE PRESIDENT'S PLAN CONSIDERED.

Before I proceed to a statement of the third view of the situation, and the remedy offered by those who take that view, I wish to say a word as to the President's plan of relief. As I can not accept his view of the causes of our present unfortunate situation, I can not, of course, assent to his mode of relief. I do not believe that there is too much money in the country to-day; I do not believe that the evils with which the country is afflicted are properly chargeable to an "inflation of the currency"—either at present or at any time hitherto. I do not believe that our troubles are caused by the presence in our circulation of our greenbacks and Treasury notes. I do believe, however, that our greenbacks are a redeemable currency which, sooner or later, it is our solemn duty to redeem and retire; but this should not be done until we return to a bimetallic basis. I believe that the system which prevailed in this country from 1792 to 1873—a system of gold and silver coin, standing upon an exactly equal legal footing, and the coexistence of a paper currency issued by the Government, redeemable in coin, and a full legal tender for all public and private demands—was and is the best system of finance that could be devised for this country; and could I be assured that that system could be restored, I would readily consent to the retirement of the greenbacks and Treasury notes. But in the absence of any such assurance I am opposed to the plan of retiring all United States (greenback) notes and the Treasury notes of 1890, and allowing the national banks, if they will, to issue nonlegal-tender bank notes in lieu of as many or as few of said retired notes as they wish. My objections are as follows:

OBJECTIONS TO THIS PLAN.

Its first sure effect would be a ruinous contraction of the currency of the country, for the bankers have made no secret of their claim that there is too much money in the country. Their orators, their newspaper organs, their apologists and defenders in both Houses of Congress, and all the literature they have so industriously disseminated throughout the country in their campaign of "education," have all preached the evils of an "excessive currency," an "inflated currency," and elaborated upon the glowing beauties of an "elastic" currency, a currency which can "come forth when needed, and when not needed in the course of business can withdraw itself from circulation." By this they evidently mean a currency that can be completely controlled by themselves, a currency which they can let out or take in as they may deem prices too high or too low.

2. In the second place, I oppose the President's plan because it would take from the Government (the people, for the people are and ought to be the Government) the power of regulating the currency, and it would place that imperial power, that highest and most distinctive mark of sovereignty, in the hands of a syndicate of national banks, responsible neither to God nor to man for the abuse of that power.

The friends of the Administration policy seem afraid to trust the American people, through their Government, to exercise this sovereign power, but prefer to take it from the people, in whose collective wisdom democracy is founded, and to centralize it in the hands of a few who appear to favor the subjection of this great country to the sway of European ideas of finance.

3. I object to the President's plan, in the third place, because, as a natural result of the policy of contraction, the burden of every debt, every mortgage, every fixed charge of every kind whatever would be still more increased and made still more difficult to be borne.

4. I am opposed to it, in the fourth place, because it would be an extension of the power, and consequently a further legislative recognition of national banks. If democracy means anything at all, it means the most uncompromising hostility to national banks in any form whatever. Whenever the question has been at issue before the American people, the Democratic party has declared its position on this question in no uncertain tones.

In January, 1836, the New York State Democracy gave the first platform utterance on this subject that was ever heard in American politics. That utterance was: "We declare unqualified hostility to bank notes and paper money as a circulating medium (notice why), because gold and silver is the only safe and constitutional currency." Notice that the language is "gold and silver is (not are) the only money" (not moneys). In the eyes of these early Democrats the two metals were indissolubly married—were treated as one—were spoken of as one. For the purposes of the Government, gold was silver and silver was gold. The Administrations of those days just went right ahead receiving both and paying out which ever they had on hand, without branding either of them as "dishonest" money, "unsound" money, "depreciated" money, etc., and, naturally, under this parity of opportunity, this parity of treatment, the two metals maintained a parity of value in commerce.

Again, the national Democratic platform of 1840, the first national platform that contained an utterance on the subject, delivered itself in clear and ringing terms: "Congress has no power to charter a United States bank." I wonder what the Democrats of those days would think if they could rise again long enough to learn that the Democratic (?) party was silently acquiescing in the existence of 3,715 of these institutions; that high alleged Democrats were denouncing as "wild-eyed fanatics" and "hare-brained enthusiasts" and silver "lunatics" the men who declare their loyalty to the doctrines of the fathers of Democracy, and to learn that Democrats were asking Congress to turn over the whole business of issuing paper money and regulating the volume (and consequently the value thereof) to these same national banks.

But let us read the remainder of the declaration of the national Democracy in 1840 on this subject:

> We believe such an institution (a national bank) one of deadly hostility to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and to the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power and above the laws and the will of the people.

This resolution or plank was expressly readopted by the national Democratic party in its platform of 1844.

In the year 1848 new and overshadowing issues had arisen, national banks were not an issue, as they had been exterminated by the veto of a Democratic President, and so the party platform of that year said nothing on the subject.

In 1852 the question had again come to the front, and the party again declared its position in its national platform, as follows:

Congress has no power to charter a national bank; we believe such an institution one of deadly hostility to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our republican institutions and to the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power and that above the laws and will of the people.

In 1856 this identical language was readopted.

In 1860 the platform of 1856 was expressly readopted, and Democratic opposition to national banks was thus again officially placed on record.

In 1864 other issues crowded all reference to money out of all the national platforms.

In 1868 the platform declared that—

Where the obligations of the Government do not expressly state upon their face, or the law under which they were issued does not provide, that they shall be paid in coin, they ought, in right and justice, to be paid in the lawful money of the United States.

It makes a further declaration that now sounds strange, in view of the position now taken by Democrats and Republicans high in authority, that while silver and paper may be good enough for the uses of the ordinary American citizen, the bonds which we sell to bankers and speculators, foreign and domestic, ought to be made payable in gold only. It is this:

One currency for the Government and the people, the laborer and the office-holder, the pensioner and the soldier, the producer and the bondholder.

In 1872 the Democratic party abandoned all its principles temporarily by accepting the Liberal Republican platform of that year.

In 1876 it declared for a system—well devised, and, above all, intrusted to competent hands for execution, creating at no time an artificial scarcity of currency, at no time alarming the public mind into the withdrawal of that vaster machinery of credit by which 95 per cent of all business transactions are performed—a system open, public, and inspiring general confidence.

Could this have referred to our present system, controlled and operated by men who make a specialty of producing panics to order for the purpose of furnishing "object lessons" to influence legislation?

In 1880 the party declared for "honest money—consisting of gold and silver, and paper convertible into coin on demand." Thus we see that the Democratic idea of "honest money" was "gold and silver, and paper convertible into coin"—into either.

In 1884, the year when the Democratic party first nominated Mr. Cleveland, and when it first elected its candidate for President since the war, it declared—

We believe in honest money—

And then it proceeds to tell what the Democratic idea of "honest money" is—

The gold and silver coinage of the Constitution, and a circulation convertible into such coin—

Not into gold only.

In 1888 this very platform was expressly adopted as Democratic faith.

What it declared in 1892, its last authoritative utterance on this subject, is still fresh in the minds of all:

We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discrimination against either metal or charge for mintage.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the record of Democratic faith on this question. The score stands:

For national banks, 0.

Against national banks, 5 express declarations.

For gold and silver and coin paper, 4 plain declarations.

For gold only, 0.

Thus, standing in the light of the decalogue of Democracy, imbibing my faith from the aggregated wisdom of the fathers and forefathers of the school of political doctrine to which I belong, I oppose the President's plan because it gives additional power and opportunity to a set of institutions which my party has declared and their own history has proved to be—

Deadly hostile to the best interests of the country, dangerous to our Republican institutions, dangerous to the liberties of the people, and calculated to place the business of the country within the control of a concentrated money power and above the laws and the will of the people.

THE REPUBLICAN VIEW.

Let us now turn to the remedy proposed by our Republican friends. They propose to issue $50,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness to help the Government out when it has no money and to authorize the Government to issue and sell an indefinite amount of 3 per cent coin bonds to enable it to raise any amount of gold that may be needed to protect the gold reserve. This, with a permanent increase of revenue from an amended tariff—a high protective tariff—they propose as a solution of all our financial difficulties.

Within certain limits it can not be denied that there has been and is now an insufficiency of revenue to meet the expenditures of the Government. This deficiency, however, is not properly chargeable to Democratic administration or to Democratic legislation. Four months before Mr. Cleveland's inauguration and nine months before the Democratic Fifty-third Congress met, the disastrous effects of the improvident and reckless legislation of the Republican Fifty-first Congress had begun to manifest themselves in a Treasury deficit. At the end of Mr. Cleveland's first term he turned over to his Republican successor, in addition to the one-hundred-million-dollar gold reserve, the sum of $83,827,190 available cash assets, together with a fund of $54,207,975, which up to that time had been held sacredly in trust for the security of the holders of national-bank notes.

This fund of more than $137,000,000 for a time served as a breakwater to withstand the reckless onslaughts upon it, but it had to yield at last, and when the Republican party retired from power on March 4, 1893, the gold reserve had dwindled down to a point nearer the danger line than it had ever reached before. Preparations had been made, in part, to issue bonds, the $137,000,000 of cash assets had all disappeared except about $24,000,000 of subsidiary coin and fractional currency, and for the last four months of that régime the receipts had fallen more than $4,000,000 below the expenditures. Not even an absolute control of every branch of the Government had enabled the Republican party to stay the tide of national bankruptcy and panic which had set in through and because of improvident Republican policies, and which, gathering force from its onward movement like an avalanche descending the Alpine slopes, has continued its dire and disastrous course to this day, unchecked by the most strenuous exercise of economy by this Democratic Administration that was possible in view of the legacy of growing indebtedness, maturing obligations, and improvident appropriations inherited from the preceding Republican Administration.

It is true that there is now, and has been ever since the last days of the last Republican Administration, an inadequacy of receipts to meet the expenditures of the Government. This deficiency, however, has been largely caused by the decision of the United States Supreme Court that the income-tax feature of the present tariff law was unconstitutional, for this decision reduced the receipts of the Government more than $30,000,000 a year.

But, however caused, the deficit is with us, and, under present conditions, it bids fair to become a permanent feature of our financial system, and the question now is how to dispose of it. Our Republican friends say that it must be met by selling "coin" bonds. Were this the only way, or the best way, to meet the evil, no consideration of the political origin of this bill would have the slightest influence in preventing me from accepting it and giving it my most cordial support. But, even in that case, I should wish to see these bonds issued as a popular loan in the true sense of that word.

Let it be a people's loan; let it be in the form of United States Treasury notes, like the seven-thirties issued during the civil war; let it be in denominations of $5 and multiples of $5; let these Treasury notes bear a low rate of interest (say 2 or 3 per cent;) let them be redeemable in lawful money of the United States, in the order of their issue, at the pleasure of the Government, at any time after the end of one year and before the end of thirty years; and above all, let them be a legal tender for all public and private debts and demands. With a loan of this character authorized I would be willing to retire all the greenbacks and Treasury notes of 1890 (provided, as I said above, that some form of loan was an absolute necessity, which I do not believe at all), for then the "endless chain," which has entangled our President and Secretary of the Treasury in its inexorable folds, like Laocoon of old, would be broken beyond the power to harm. Not only this, but we would have a legal-tender currency equal in amount to the United States Treasury notes and greenbacks displaced, and these securities would be held by the American people, and would not from time to time be thrown upon the London market to create a panic and influence financial legislation by Congress and to shape and control the financial policies of our Administrations. The "object lesson" thus taught would not be a great and disastrous panic, but would be the happy spectacle of a busy people, blessed with sufficient currency, supporting their Government in its financial straits, never "apprehensive," but always strong in their confidence in its ultimate financial solvency and triumph.

But while this is one way in which the present financial difficulties of the Government can be met, and while I regard it as having many advantages over the coin bonds provided for in the House bill 2904, yet it occurs to me, Mr. Speaker, that there is

A FAR BETTER WAY.

Before entering into the consideration of that "better way," let us be sure that we have a thorough and comprehensive idea of the situation that confronts us as the representatives of the American people, charged with the high responsibility of securing for them the freest and the widest opportunity for successful effort in whatever sphere of activity they may severally be engaged. Mr. Speaker, this is no ordinary occasion. A proper consideration of the whole subject-matter fairly involved in the scope of this bill and the Senate amendments thereto will bring into review our whole financial system, with all its patchwork of incongruities, its temporary makeshifts, its time-serving expedients, and the disgraceful marks of its manipulation by the most selfish, the most unscrupulous, the most conscienceless, and the most audacious body of shylocks that ever insisted on the pound of flesh that lay nearest the nation's heart and life. It is not my purpose, however, Mr. Speaker, to attempt such a review. It would proceed more properly from those of deeper knowledge, wider experience, and a greater degree of familiarity with the sinuous processes of this unseen hand which for thirty years has, by hook and crook, imposed upon this nation as law its own code of gain and greed.

I do propose, however, to state with the utmost frankness and with a bluntness which I feel is demanded by a sense of fidelity to my constituents and to the whole people of the country what I honestly conceive to be the exact trouble with the Treasury today, and what remedy is demanded.

The trouble with the views of the present situation which have been expressed both by the President and by the Republican leaders on this floor is that they are too narrow—that they look at only a part of the case. Both are intently watching the outbreak of a poisonous blood disease and regarding the pimple on the surface as the sole and entire extent of the malady, while the deadly virus is eating its way through the vitals and sapping the very foundations of the patient's life. The Republican party, with its eyes focused on the bare bottom of the Treasury vaults and it hand on the pulse of the avaricious manufacturer, reads in that aching void the conclusion that the Treasury does not take in enough money and feels their "sinews of war" demanding more protection, more favoritism, and larger bank accounts. The President, with his eyes focused on the far East, sees that the great bankers and speculators are "apprehensive"—that they are "solicitous about our future fiscal policy," that they have a feeling of "distrust," etc. But, Mr. Speaker, the eye of true statesmanship looks beyond the empty Treasury vaults, and beyond the "distrustful" speculators of Wall street. To the eye of the honest student of present conditions there is a wider and more suggestive field.

THE TRUE SITUATION.

He sees that times are hard. Money is scarce and difficult to obtain. Business is depressed. Bankruptcy stalks abroad in the land. Prices are constantly falling, and those who buy stocks today must sell them for less to-morrow. Enterprises are languishing. The laborer, already inadequately paid, finds his wages reduced with a periodical and painful regularity. Coal miners in the East hungering for bread which they can not find money to buy, and shivering farmers in the West burning precious corn because they can not find money to buy coal; Eastern mill operatives unable to obtain money to buy Western food products, and Western people unable to obtain money to buy Eastern mill goods—and yet we hear preached the gospel of currency contraction and all our woes attributed to an excess of money.

These money contractionists and gold redemptionists ignore these features of the situation, but evince deep concern for the speculators who have "lost confidence" in the gullibility of the American people and their willingness to be fleeced. They seem deeply moved because of "those who are apprehensive" that the American people can not and will not pay coin obligations in gold.

Mr. Speaker, I am not concerned for this class. It is the cor ner stone of their gospel that "business knows no sentiment," and hence their "apprehensions" can arouse no sympathy in my bosom. They bought our securities as a speculation and for profit. Whether they gain or lose is no concern of the American people. If this Government pays its own governmental obligations in "coin"—in the money of the contract—the American people are not "apprehensive" whether European bankers and their unnaturalized American representatives make more or less than they had figured out as a desirable profit.

There is not a man within the sound of my voice who will deny the proposition that every dollar of the bonded indebtedness of this Government is payable, not in gold, not in silver, but in coin, which means either gold or silver, as the Government prefers. In fact, the American Congress, only last year, when asked by the President to authorize the issue of bonds payable in gold only, flatly but wisely, I think, refused to do so, although they knew that by doing so the burden of interest on the bond issue then contemplated, and which was made soon after, would thereby have been reduced $16,000,000. A Democratic Congress very sensibly refused to slap silver in the face and discredit it in the eyes of the financial world in full view of the fact that bimetallism has ever been one of the foundation pillars of the structure of Democratic faith in this country. An American Congress refused to spit upon silver while there remained on the statute books of the country (the act of 1879) a declaration that gold and silver must be maintained at a parity. The Fifty-third Congress sensibly concluded that that was not just exactly the way to maintain the parity of the two metals. So they disregarded the importunities of bond syndicates; they turned a deaf ear to a gold-standard Administration's appeal in behalf of gold bonds; they ignored those who were "apprehensive" that we would not pay coin obligations in gold, and said by their votes, "No; we may pay these bonds in gold if it should be convenient, but not for $16,000,000 will we sell the American people's right to pay its lawful debts in the lawful coin of the realm."

I am solicitous, Mr. Speaker, for those American citizens who are suffering and struggling. My heart goes out not to Wall street, but to the great West and to the great South and to the great East and to the great North—to every part of this great country where men toil and trouble and where women and children work and want. And it is our duty to consider not what will refill the empty Treasury, not what will quiet the "apprehensions" of the immeasurably wealthy syndicates that want to become more wealthy at the expense of the toilers of this country, but what will unclog the wheels of trade and commerce, pour the rich lifeblood of a safe, sound, and abundant currency into the veins and arteries of business, and usher in an era of commercial and industrial peace. What will do this? Will increased taxation do it? Will issuing more bonds for the people to pay do it? Will retiring half the active money of the country do it? Will increasing the value of all money by increasing the difficulty of getting it—will this send a ray of sunlight into the homes of the suffering toilers and those who want to be but can not get the opportunity to be toilers in this land? By that test should we weigh and measure the fitness of every measure that comes before us.

THE TRUE DIAGNOSIS.

My view of the situation, then, is, Mr. Speaker, that the country in all its industries and in every class of its population is suffering from an insufficiency of primary or redemption money.

The constant fall of prices ever since the campaign against silver was begun in 1873 has greatly reduced, where it has not completely destroyed, the ability of our people to consume manufactured products. This has led to depression in manufacturing industries, to reductions of wages, to the shutting down of factories, to strikes, lockouts, etc.

This is the situation in all its breadth and length and depth. This is the state of affairs we should consider. True statesmanship will look over the shoulders of the "apprehensive" gold syndicates and the demands of the selfish manufacturers to the fears and tears, the wants and woes, of the great masses of willing but worn, weary, and disheartened workers who look piteously here for relief.

THE TRUE REMEDY.

This, then, being the situation, what is the remedy?

I conceive the proper remedy is set forth in the provisions of the substitute offered by the Senate for the House coin bond bill. The Senate proposes:

1. To reestablish the free and unlimited coinage of silver as it existed in this country prior to 1873.
2. To coin the seigniorage and use it in payment of current expenses.
3. To retire national-bank notes of less than $10 in favor of the wider use of silver and its certificates.
4. To have the Government resume its option to redeem greenbacks and Treasury notes of 1890 in either gold or silver, according to the condition or convenience of the Treasury.

Such is the Senate's plan of remodeling our financial system, and to each and every one of the foregoing propositions I give my unhesitating and unqualified assent, believing that nothing short of this will give that general and permanent relief which the condition of the country demands, and which it is our duty to extend.

It might seem presumption in me to undertake to make any arguments in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, since they have been presented by the friends of bimetallism on this floor and elsewhere in such great profusion and variety and have been supported by so many known facts and by such plain and convincing logic that it would be impossible, save by some new mode of arrangement or statement, to increase the strength of the contention in favor of equal and indiscriminating bimetallism. Nevertheless, I shall vote to accept the Senate amendments; and my action in the matter will be the result of a deep-seated conviction that not until these amendments, or some other propositions embodying the same principles, are enacted into law and honestly enforced by an administration in full sympathy with them can we hope for any permanent return of prosperity to this country or of sound financial health to our Treasury. I believe in free silver coinage on terms of exact legal equality with gold, because—

FREE COINAGE WOULD PREVENT PANICS.

1. Free coinage of silver will increase the volume of primary money in the country, and thus prevent the panics we have so often experienced under the gold standard by reason of the "apprehensions" of speculators that, on account of the limited supply of gold in the country, we could not, or would not, redeem our securities in gold. The restoration of free coinage will be an unmistakable notice to those shylocks and to all the world that all coin obligations of this Government will be redeemed in "coin," as provided in the contract, and not in gold alone. This announcement may produce a temporary panic among the few hundred English and semi-American speculators, in fact they may produce an artificial panic themselves as an "object lesson" to this Congress in order to influence it to repeal the law authorizing free coinage of silver. But the law will cause no apprehension on the part of the great masses of our people; but, on the contrary, it will be welcomed by them as a means of escape from the disastrous evils of the panics which are naturally expected and regularly experienced under any financial system where the stock of money of ultimate redemption is insufficient to perform the work of redemption. Should there be, under the restored system of bimetallism, a scarcity of one metal, there will at once be an increased demand for the other, for their money functions being identical, the more abundant or more easily obtainable metal, or its paper representatives, will answer any purpose or demand as well as the other. And this shifting of the demand from the one to the other, according to the relative supply of the two, will remove all incentive to hoard either; and it will obviate the possibility of either going to a premium, and will thus insure absolute commercial parity at the mint ratio.

WOULD INSURE SUFFICIENT CIRCULATION.

2. Free and unlimited coinage of silver will, by increasing the stock of primary money or redemption money, increase in the same proportion the stock of credit money based upon the primary money, and will thus insure at all times a sufficient circulation to transact the business of the country.

GOLD SUPPLY DECREASING.

The annual production of gold in this country is slowly but surely decreasing, and, sooner or later, it will become impossible for the Government or the people to find the gold to redeem outstanding obligations if payment in gold only be insisted upon. In 1853 the gold production of this country, with all the crudity and inefficiency of the apparatus and methods then employed, was $65,000,000. In 1893, forty years later, with the full benefit of all the wonderful discoveries and inventions of nearly half a century of the most rapid progress the world has ever made, with a wider experience in mining, with a more abundant capital, with an infinitely extended and improved transportation service, with better and cheaper machinery and supplies, and, above all, with a demand for gold greater than had ever been known in all the centuries before by reason of the demonetization of silver and the increased need of gold thereby created—with all these causes working together to increase the output, the production of gold in this country had dropped from $65,000,000 to less than $36,000,000, a decline of 45 per cent. And when we take into consideration the increased population of the country, the decline in production becomes still more marked.

In the ten years between 1850 and 1860 the production was $1.29 per head of population. In the ten years between 1884 and 1893 the production was $0.53 per head. Our population has increased from 25,000,000 to 70,000,000—a growth of 180 per cent. Our home and foreign commerce has increased twentyfold; new enterprises have been inaugurated; new lines of business have been opened; new inventions have appeared; new discoveries have been made; the new force of electricity, with its countless applications, has revolutionized the industrial world; new forces and new substances and materials have been brought to light, with new uses and applications for old substances and materials, all calling for a vast increase in the volume of money; and yet our gold production has fallen off nearly one-half. And still we are told by the apostle of the gold standard that it is the most perfect standard; that it is absolutely without variableness or shadow of turning.

The merest exercise of common sense and common honesty in discussion is sufficient to show that the charge of "an inflated currency," and "a currency far beyond the needs of commerce," so often advanced to explain our present troubles, is false. It requires some honesty toward oneself, but no astuteness whatever, to understand that the use of silver as primary money having been discontinued, by the interpretation put on a statute of Congress, silver dollars at once passed from the domain of primary or redemption money. This very fact, this very saddling upon gold all the redemption functions formerly exercised by both metals, naturally led to "apprehensions" that there was an insufficient supply of gold in the country to do this work, and, as silver is not allowed free coinage in Europe, holders of our securities naturally feared they would be paid in that metal which, even in this country, under present administrative policies, is regarded as a mere commodity.

In this way we can see that the partial demonetization of silver has been the cause of that want of confidence which is now pointed to as a convincing argument in favor of the completion of the demonetization of silver. But restore the free and unlimited coinage of silver and the result they fear will be quite different. They may be paid in silver, but it will not be silver the commodity, outlawed as a money metal, and therefore worth but 50 cents on the dollar, but they will be paid in a metal which throughout all the length and breadth of this vast country and among all its busy and increasing millions, will answer every monetary purpose that gold will answer. Then the commodity silver can be converted into current money, coequal in all its functions with gold, and therefore of equal value. The "50-cent dollar" of the gold-bug orators will have disappeared forever. Then, silver and gold both being primary money, or money of ultimate redemption. the ability of the nation to redeem its coin obligations will have been doubled, the medium of redemption will either be gold or the monetary equal of gold, confidence will return, apprehension will cease from troubling, and even the distrustful speculator will be at rest.

WOULD PREVENT APPRECIATION IN VALUE OF GOLD.

3. Free coinage of silver would prevent the injustice of requiring the debtor to pay his debts in a constantly appreciating currency. Prices have been falling with remarkable uniformity since 1873 in most of the products of labor. But debts, interest, taxes, and many other things calling for the laborer's money have either remained stationary or, as in the case of interest, have actually advanced. In this way the burdens of the debtor, instead of becoming lighter with each succeeding year of toil and self-denial and gradual payment, have been actually increased.

I submit here a table, taken from the Bimetallist, a British publication, showing the great appreciation in the value of gold in Great Britain since the demonetization of silver in this country in 1873. Any given amount of gold will purchase more than it would in 1873 by the following amounts:

More wheat by 108 per cent.
More flour by 76 per cent.
More sugar by 60 per cent.
More iron by 64 per cent.
More cotton by 95 per cent.
More lead by 110 per cent.
More wool by 93 per cent.
More leather by 24 per cent.
Average increase on these articles, 78¼ per cent.

A still more startling statement of this great appreciation of the value of gold is made by President Andrews, of Brown University, in a recent article on this subject, "An honest dollar." He says that on September 1, 1865, our public debt, then amounting to $2,750,000,000, could have been paid by 18,000,000 bales of cotton, but that now, after that debt had been reduced 55 per cent by the payment of $1,500,000,000, it will take 30,000,000 bales of cotton. In other words, it will take 12,000,000 more bales of cotton to pay the debt after it has been reduced $1,500,000,000 than it would have required at first—66⅔ per cent more cotton to pay 45 per cent of the debt now, under the gold standard, than it would have required to pay the whole debt under bimetallism. And yet, when the producer of cotton, or corn, or wheat, or wool, or leather, or iron, or sugar complains that by this appreciation the meaning of the word "dollar" (and consequently the meaning of the contract itself) has been changed to his prejudice in all his notes and mortgages, and asks that the original meaning of the word "dollar," and the meaning of the contract, be retained, and that no new meaning shall be added to the word which will double the burden of his obligation, he is denounced as a repudiationist, a wild-eyed socialist, a silver lunatic. He is told that he wants something for nothing; that the dollar which would mean the same now that it would have meant and did mean a few years ago when the contract was written would be a "dishonest" dollar, an "unsound" dollar.

Mr. Speaker, I resent the imputation or insinuation, from those high in authority or any other misguided idolaters of the gold standard, that my people are dishonest or want anything that is not rightfully their own. To them a dollar means something. To them it means much long, hard toil in the blazing heat of a southern sun. To them it means many of the comforts of life that are indispensable necessities to us, but which are unattainable luxuries to them.

The restoration of silver to its former legal status of perfect legal equality with gold would at once prevent any further appreciation in the value of gold, for the demand for gold would be at once transferred to silver, and the pressure on gold thus removed. The gold corner would be broken, the combine would be "busted," and the great masses of the common people throughout America and all the world would breathe easier.

WOULD STIMULATE BUSINESS.

4. In the fourth place, free coinage will give us a more abundant supply of money, and thus give a much-needed stimulus to every branch of business that makes use of money, excepting, perhaps, that of the pawnbroker and other usurers. There is no doubt in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that there is an inadequate supply of money in this country to properly serve the demands of its great and growing trade and commerce. The fact that the country's business is transacted with the limited supply of money at its command is no argument whatever that the supply is sufficient. A large family can get along somehow by eating off one plate by taking turns; but from that fact no one would infer that one plate constitutes an abundant supply of tableware for a family. So the fact that, in some sort of way, amid suffering, depression, and bankruptcy, we are getting along with our present supply of primary money does not prove that that supply is adequate for the demands of the country. With a sufficient money stock there would be no appreciation in the value of any part of our currency; the money of payment would be, as it ought to be, the money of the contract—that is, money of the same exchangeable value as that in circulation at the time of the making of the contract. This sufficient supply of money can never come through gold. It can not and ought not to come through fiatism. It should come, as it did for the first eighty years of our national life, through and from the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold.

But the restoration of bimetallism will immediately and permanently stimulate all the industries of this country, except those of the shylock and the sheriff. It will lead to the inauguration of many new enterprises. It will fill the mountains of the West with a busy and joyous host of miners, now wholly or partially idle, but then provided with steady and remunerative employment, digging the gold, silver, and lead from those venerable mountains, and furnishing a new and profitable market for the agricultural and horticultural products of the great West, and for the machinery, tools, and other mining appliances manufactured in the East and the North.

The great West would again spring to its feet full of financial and industrial strength. Towns and cities would spring up among its valleys. New railroads would thread its canyons and surmount its lofty passes; a silver and gold stream would trickle down those lofty mountain sides and find its welcome way into the financial circulation and the business and industrial life of the nation; and a great people would arise from the hideous nightmare of gold monometallism and, with their faces turned to the dawn of a newer and brighter day, address themselves to the great task of restoring that prosperity to which this country has so long been a stranger. Here and there—yes, in too many cases, as experience has shown—the development of mines would prove unprofitable, and the investor would lose vast sums, for silver is not to be had without money and without price or toil or effort, as the gold bug claims to believe; but the investor's loss would be the people's gain, for it would involve the distribution among the armies of labor of vast sums of money that had hitherto been hoarded.

But in other cases a fair profit would reward the progressive capitalist and the net profits of his enterprise would be added to the active capital of the country. New fields would be sought for investment. New enterprises North and South and East and West would be the natural sequence of profitable mining ventures, and those enterprises would each and all call for more men, more material, and more supplies and would thus give employment to the idle, business to the manufacturer, profitable custom to all that purvey to the toiler, and by increasing the number of profitably employed laboring men and by increasing the laborer's capacity to purchase the manufactured products of other labor it would stimulate every line of manufacturing and revivify every department of production and distribution.

Gradually the demand for labor would furnish opportunities for employment to all that would work. The armies of the unemployed could then be mustered out of service, for the war of the Government and its syndicate allies against the business and the industries and trade and commerce of the country—against the comfort and prosperity of the American people—would be over, and peace and plenty would again prevail in the homes of the poor toilers throughout the land. Thus, and thus only, can we fully meet and adequately provide for the situation that confronts us to-day.

WOULD HELP INTERNATIONAL BIMETALLISM.

5. But the beneficial effects of free coinage would not be confined to this country. The example of the greatest nation on earth deserting gold monometallism, on mature deliberation, and taking a bold stand for absolute bimetallism—the immediate transfer of one-fourth of the enlightened people of the world, and that the most progressive and enterprising part, from the single gold standard to the double standard—would wonderfully encourage the advocates and friends of bimetallism throughout the world, and would go far toward inducing France and Germany, and ultimately all Europe except England, to return to bimetallism. Nearly all the single gold standard men in this country, except a few new converts (always the most zealous champions of any cause), claim to favor the free and unlimited coinage of silver provided it be done by international agreement; that means that they admit that bimetallism would be beneficial if we could have it, but they say we can not bring it about ourselves. If they are sincere in this profession I know of no better way to secure an international agreement than for this imperial nation—the strongest, the most enterprising, the most influential, and the most populous of all the enlightened nations of the earth—to take the lead and invite the others to follow. But her influence would do more than to invite, it would compel the adoption of free coinage by all other nations except England herself, and possibly by England too, after she had once fairly experienced the disadvantages and the losses imposed by her financial isolation.

WOULD GIVE US THE TRADE OF SILVER NATIONS.

6. Evidently the effect of this country's putting itself on a bimetallic basis would be the establishment, to England's prejudice, of closer commercial relations between the United States and the 900,000,000 of people composing the silver nations of the world. The needs of trade would ultimately lead, no doubt, to the establishment of a common or international unit of value, for the purposes of international commerce between these silver countries; and this commercial bond, in connection with the fact that we stood ready to receive their silver currency, as we did prior to 1857, in payment of trade balances due us, would give us a decided advantage over gold-standard nations in dealing with nations that recognize silver as money.

WOULD RAISE THE PRICE OF FARM PRODUCTS.

7. Again, the opening of our mints to the free and unlimited coinage of silver would at once advance its price all over the world to the price in this country, less the cost of transportation to this country. One beneficent effect of this result would be an immediate advance in the price of wheat and cotton and all other American products that now come into competition at Liverpool with the products of cooly labor in India. Under present conditions England buys our discredited silver at 63 or 64 cents per ounce, takes it to India, and with it there buys cotton and wheat and other Indian products at about the same price she has paid for them heretofore, for the demonetization of silver in this country did not affect prices in silver countries. The silver price paid for those articles in India, plus the cost of transportation thence to Liverpool, becomes the silver price of the same articles in Liverpool, and as silver in Liverpool is worth only about 50 cents on the dollar in gold, the gold price of these products in Liverpool is thus fixed at about one-half their silver price in India.

As Liverpool fixes the price for our surplus of agricultural products, and thus indirectly fixes or determines the price in America of our home-sold products, it becomes apparent that the present depreciated price of silver is the chief cause of the ruinously low prices our wheat, cotton, and such of our other products as come into competition with Indian products command. Let free coinage be adopted by this country, and England, no longer able to buy silver for her India trade at 48 cents on the dollar, but being required to pay its full mint value, will no longer be able to dictate a price to our farmers which they can not afford to accept, but which they are nevertheless helpless to reject. The benefits accruing to our farmers each year under such a system would amount to hundreds of millions of dollars.

During the year 1894 we exported the following farm products, worth in Liverpool the following sums:

Product.	Amount exported.	Price.	Value.
		Cents.
Corn.....bushels..	66,489,529	45.7	$30,385,714
Wheat.....do.....	164,283,129	49.1	80,663,016
Cotton.....pounds..	3,769,391,478	6.94	261,595,074
Total value of these three exports ..			372,643,804

Since the production for 1894 may fairly be taken as an averge, it will be seen that the advance in the value of silver caused by the demand free coinage would create would cause our exports of those three farm products alone to advance in value in the Liverpool market not less than $372,000,000, to say nothing of the vast increase in the value of those portions of the same products which would be sold for consumption in this country. If we consider the home-sold products as equal to the part sold abroad, the benefits accruing to the producers from free coinage would amount to nearly or quite $700,000,000 per year on those three products alone.

And when we add to these three crops the general advance in the value of all other farm products, we can begin to have some conception of the benefits of free coinage.

It is true the price of farmers' supplies and all other articles bought by the farmer will be increased; but the farmer will then be in a condition to pay higher prices, and these higher prices that he pays will redound to the benefit of the operatives and manufacturers engaged in producing these articles. But the debts, interest, and other fixed charges which our people must meet will not be increased, and can thus be more easily met.

WOULD ENABLE US TO MEET JAPANESE COMPETITION.

8. One other great advantage will result to the people (more particularly to the manufacturers and operatives) of this country from the adoption of free coinage. The cheapness of silver in its present demonetized condition not only enables the Indian agriculturist, without loss to himself, to force down our competing farm products to almost half the price they would command under free coinage, but it also enables the Japanese manufacturer to sell his products in this country at such prices as absolutely defy American competition.

The Japanese laborer, by inherited aptitude, by an inexorable life-long apprenticeship to one calling, and that the calling of his fathers for centuries before him, and by the possession of an instinct trained and developed through a thousand years of unrelenting battle for existence, has solved the problem of finding the minimum of human necessity. He has been inured to self-denial till he has deadened natural human desires; he has, by immemorial abstinence and self-abnegation, thrown himself outside the pale of temptation; he has familiarized himself with the contented use of those means of existence which would mean starvation to other men; and he has thus developed himself into the cheapest, the most ingenious, the most patient, the most willing, and the most profitable laborer in all the industrial world. To him a thin cotton garment is rainent, a few morsels of rice are food, and a shed, an awning, or a goods box is shelter. To him strikes and boycotts are unknown. His manufacturing employer can command such labor in unlimited supply for a few cents a day, and pay those few cents in silver depreciated one-half by our demonetization of it in this country. The products of such labor can be and are to-day sold in our markets for less money than they can be actually produced for in this country.

They have already entered the field of competition in many lines of industry, and, exulting in their easily obtained success in those fields, they will undoubtedly enter others. What is to be the outcome of this new invasion of the western world—an invasion which, if unchecked, threatens to result in a greater measure of human suffering and calamity than was ever produced by any invasion of Europe by Goth or Hun or Vandal or Turk? When, as soon will be the case, all the heretofore pent-up energies of that wonderful nation are directed to our industrial overthrow, we shall be compelled to abdicate our proud position of the world's purveyor and descend to the level of a civilization in which the conditions of life are so hard that to the vast majority of our people bare existence will be the summation of all human hope—the ne plus ultra of human aspiration.

And let us not flatter ourselves that the Japanese will be without allies in this momentous struggle. Almost in sight of the shores of Japan lies a sleeping giant with dormant powers whose magnitude has never been tested, but who holds in his hands the key to the future progress and happiness of the human race on this globe. The Chinese Empire has just been waked by its war with Japan to a consciousness that its methods belong to the past, and that it must align itself with the progress of the present if it would rise to the true level of its opportunity. It is now rapidly shaking off the sleep of centuries, opening its eyes to the grand opportunities of the present, and girding on its armor to meet us in the industrial wars of the future.

With a population equal to that of the United States and all Europe combined—a population whose faculties have been sharpened into inherited instincts by forty centuries of untiring exercise under the relentless laws of necessity—a population with which toil is the normal condition of existence, unrestricted by legal limitations and unrelieved by the restful oasis of the Christian Sabbath—with such a population thrown into the scale against us, paid in the silver our own greed and folly have depreciated, our industrial fate is inexorably fixed unless we resort to the only avenue of escape left us. Either we must give up to them the markets of this great country (the most remunerative markets in the world) and all our markets for manufactured products in other countries or we must struggle to retain them. The "most favored nation" clause in our treaties with those countries would prevent our discriminating against them in our tariff schedules, and thus protecting our manufacturers and operatives. But even if we resort to the exclusion policy of a high tariff, it would not only impose unjust burdens on our own people in the effort to protect our own people, but it would be powerless to save for us our foreign markets.

There remains, then, the one hope—restore the free coinage of silver in this country. Raise thereby the price of silver throughout the world at one stroke, as such a step would do, to commercial parity in this country and in every country where American commerce finds its way, and by that same act you double the value of the silver constituting the wages paid to the Hindoo farmer and to the Chinese and the Japanese operative, and thus practically place a protective duty of 100 per cent on their products. This would not only protect the American operative and the American manufacturer, but it would also increase the lowest possible price of Chinese and Japanese products in all the markets of the world, and would thus be the wisest step this country could take toward retaining the share we now have of foreign trade in articles of American manufacture, and in saving our people from being degraded from the highest to the lowest civilization in the world of to-day.

In conclusion, then, it is clear that, as the theory of the Republican party is wrong as to the malady that afflicts our people to-day, it must be wrong as to the remedy—higher duties and more bonds. It is clear that, as the President's theory of the disease is at fault, we can not accept his suggested remedy of retiring the greenbacks and abdicating to the national banks the high function of regulating the volume and the value of our entire circulation of paper money. It is as clear to my mind as any proposition involving the exercise of human reason can be made to appear that our financial troubles and the present deplorable condition of the masses of our people have their origin in the lack of sufficient primary money properly to discharge the business of the country and in the low price of silver throughout the world.

Reasoning from this undoubted premise, I can not resist the conclusion that the sure remedy for our financial and economic troubles lies in such legislation as will give us a larger volume of money and raise the price of silver throughout the world by creating an unlimited demand for its limited supply, and that these twin results can be accomplished by the incorporation into our national statutes of the principles embodied in the Senate amendments to this bill. Believing thus, I shall gladly cast my vote in favor of the minority report of the Ways and Means Committee, which recommends concurrence in the Senate amendments.

Believing that the free and unlimited coinage of silver as provided in the Senate amendments will prevent the panics which we have so regularly experienced under the single gold standard, believing that free coinage will furnish sufficient circulation to prevent the evils which an inadequate money supply has imposed upon us, believing it would prevent appreciation in the valne or purchasing power of gold, that it would secure greater stability of prices, stimulate business, promote the cause of international bimetallism, improve our trade with silver nations, raise the price of farm products, ease the burden of every debt in the land, enable us to meet Asiatic competition, and assure to our people prosperity at home and a more commanding financial and commercial position among the nations of the earth, I should be untrue to the interests of the people and to my convictions of duty were I not to cast my vote in favor of the cause of free-silver coinage.

Mr. TURNER of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I have no intention, of course, of undertaking to discuss in detail the Senate substitute now under consideration by this committee in the brief limit of the five minutes which have been allowed me; but not knowing whether I shall have an opportunity to vote upon the sections of this substitute separately, or whether I shall have to vote to concur or to nonconcur in the substitute as a whole, I desire to say that this substitute has four sections, which are wholly distinct and independent. Neither of them depends upon the other. Each contains an independent proposition so distinct that members of this committee may very well be in favor of some and opposed to others. I find myself in just that predicament. I think the sections ought to be voted on separately. Being thus situated, I desire to express my position upon the substitute, as my vote would not express it if I should be compelled to vote upon the substitute as a whole.

I am in favor of the second section of this substitute, which reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall coin into standard silver dollars, as soon as practicable, from the silver bullion purchased under authority of the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," that portion of said silver bullion which represents the seigniorage or profit to the Government, to wit, the difference between the cost of the silver purchased under said act and its coinage value, and said silver dollars so coined shall be used in the payment of the current expenses of the Government; and for the purpose of making the said seigniorage immediately available for use as money, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue silver certificates against it, as if it was already coined and in the Treasury.

I voted for this same proposition in the last Congress, and I see no reason why these millions lying idle in the Treasury, bought and paid for by the Government, now its property, but as worthless as bricks in its present position, should continue to lie there idle, when so much needed for the uses of the Government.

In the next place, I am in favor of the third section of this substitute, which reads:

SEC. 3. That no national-bank note shall be hereafter issued of a denomination less than $10, and all notes of such banks now outstanding of denominations less than that sum shall be, as rapidly as practicable, taken up, redeemed, and canceled, and notes of $10 and larger denominations shall be issued in their stead under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

I should prefer to substitute five dollars for the ten mentioned in that section, simply for the reason that I am afraid that if the entire circulating medium of the country below ten dollars in denomination is changed into silver it will be cumbrous and not easily handled; but as I shall not have the opportunity of voting for that modification, I am prepared, if given the opportunity, to vote for this section as a whole.

I am in favor of that part of the fourth section which provides as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, when presented for redemption, in standard silver dollars or in gold coin, using for redemption of said notes either gold or silver coins, or both, not at the option of the holder, but exclusively at the option of the Treasury Department.

The time of Mr. TURNER of Virginia having expired, by unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. COOPER of Texas, it was extended five minutes.

Mr. TURNER of Virginia. I am in favor of this provision which I have just read, sir, because I believe the language of this section was the purpose and intent of the original act, and I see no possible wrong in paying in silver notes that were given for silver.

Now, sir, I will say as to the balance of this section, I will be in favor of the same provision with reference to the greenbacks provided that I can satisfy myself that it can be done without any bad faith on the part of the Government, as to which I am not entirely satisfied. I think it ought to be done, if it can be done with honor.

I can not support the first section of the substitute, which provides that all the silver bullion of the world, wherever and by whoever owned, when presented at the mints of the United States, shall be coined for the owner free of cost to him, the owner to receive a standard silver dollar for every 412½ grains of standard silver bullion nine-tenths fine so presented at the mint, and when these coins are received in the Treasury silver certificates to be issued therefor. Thus in effect a silver-dollar certificate going into circulation and becoming an obligation of the Government for an amount of silver which, without the passage of this section, the Government can buy in open market for a sum about one-half that which the owner will get for it from the Government under the operation of this section if enacted into law.

There are other grave reasons, but this is sufficient and controlling to me, so much so that if I am not permitted to vote upon these distinct and independent sections separately, and am compelled to vote upon them as a whole, my understanding of my duty will compel me to vote to nonconcur in the substitute, though I sincerely hope we may be given the opportunity to vote separately on these distinct sections, standing independent of and having no connection with each other—each upon its own merits.

And it does seem to me that if the extreme advocates for free coinage persist in holding they will have all or none, and refuse an opportunity to pass that which I believe we may get, viz, the great benefits and immensely enlarged circulation of silver to result from the second, third, and fourth sections with the first left out, with the incident relief to the gold reserve, the loss to the people will be owing to them, and they will have "lost the substance by grabbing at the shadow."

Mr. KIRKPATRICK. Mr. Speaker, the only excuse I have for burdening the House with any remarks upon this question is that I expect to be called away and shall not have an opportunity to vote upon the several propositions under discussion, and for that reason it is but just to myself as well as to my constituents that I should define my position upon these various questions. Now, as I understand it, when the discussion ceases a motion will be made to concur in the Senate substitute. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, on that proposition, that if present I shall not vote to concur. I am not in favor of the unlimited coinage of silver in this country; I am not in favor of throwing our ports open to the commerce of the world without any restrictions; nor am I in favor of throwing our mints open to the free coinage of silver of the world without restriction. Therefore if present I shall cast my vote, as I have suggested, against concurring in the Senate substitute.

I am further informed that the next question that will be submitted to the House will be on a motion to nonconcur in the Senate substitute, and insist upon the House bill. If present I will cast my vote against this proposition also, for I did not believe, and do not now believe, that the bill passed by the House should become a law. I can not see the necessity of enacting that law at this time. While perhaps some amendment of the law of 1875 should be made, I can not see the necessity for the House bond bill leaving the law of 1875 upon the statute books. I believe the power of the Secretary of the Treasury should be restricted with reference to the issuance of bonds. So, upon that proposition I would also vote no.

There is another proposition or two, separate and independent, that will doubtless come before this House in the way of an amendment to the Senate substitute, and that is with reference to retiring notes of less denominations than $10. Now, I believe in bimetallism, and I believe that we should do just as much as we can, with safety, toward bringing the two metals together. In other words, if we continue to discriminate against silver always we may never hope to see the two metals come nearer together, and the breach will continually widen from day to day and from month to month. It seems to me we have an excellent opportunity of placing in circulation all the silver that is produced by our own mines by adopting this method of retiring all the notes less than $10 in denomination and substituting therefor silver dollars or silver certificates. Now, I am not advised as to the number of these notes, but they must run into the millions, and if we retire these notes and substitute silver therefor we thereby then find an opportunity of placing in circulation a large amount of silver money, equal, in my judgment, to the output of our American mines, and by doing this we will show a disposition to aid silver and prove to the country that we are in fact friends of silver; therefore I should favor that proposition, if I were permitted to vote upon it alone.

I am also inclined to believe that we could safely coin the seigniorage in the Treasury and put that in circulation, and I should vote for that proposition.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if we continue to discriminate against silver always, if we fail to put in circulation that part of our silver product which we can safely put in circulation, we need never hope to see the commercial price of silver advance. Therefore I believe it is the duty of the American people with reference to the product of their silver mines to take the same care that they take of our other commodities. In other words, I am a protectionist. I believe in protecting our own industries; I believe in discriminating in our own favor and against the outside world, and I believe in applying that doctrine to silver. We can take care of our own product and let the rest of the world take care of its own. By so doing we succeed in finding an opportunity to circulate every silver dollar coming from our own mines, and certainly we are under no obligation to Mexico or to any other country on the face of the earth to take care of its product. [Applause.]

Mr. DE WITT Mr. Speaker, it has been asserted on the floor of this House that to remonetize silver would at once restore the commercial parity of 1 to 16. This proposition, in the light of such information as I have upon the monetary question, I can not accept as being correct. The commercial ratio existing to-day between silver and gold stands 1 to 32, so that bringing it to 1 to 16 would double the price of silver bullion or cut in two the price of gold bullion. There is nothing in the history of the two metals to warrant this assertion of the advocates of the free coinage of silver. Silver when compared with gold has always fluctuated in value. Julius Cæsar on one occasion exchanged gold and silver at the ratio of 1 to 9. Livy mentions that in the year 189 before the Christian era the two metals were exchanged at the ratio of 1 to 10. Under the early Roman Emperors the ratio was 1 to 12. From Constantine, A. D. 306, to Justinian, A. D. 565, the ratio was 1 to 14 and 1 to 15. This shows, Mr. Speaker, that such mints as they had in the Roman Empire were open during this long period to the free coinage of the two metals, yet notwithstanding that fact the metals drifted apart in relative values and no ratio was steadily maintained. The history of our own country shows very conclusively that these two metals vary in value, each to the other, when cast upon the bosom of commerce.

The laws of commerce are far more powerful in regulating the value of bullions than the acts of Parliament or the acts of the American Congress. In 1717 Great Britain called upon the keeper of the mints for a statement as to the commercial ratio existing between silver and gold. Newton, the master of the mint, made a report to Parliament of 1 to 15½. Parliament desired that more silver should be coined, establishing a legal ratio of 1 to 15⅛, thus discriminating by law as against commerce in favor of silver three-tenths of 1 per cent. What was the result? A ratio was established in Holland and in France of 1 to 14, and the silver went from England into the commercial exchanges of France and Holland, where it found a better market than the mint market of England. The ratio which was established by the British Parliament in 1717 of 1 to 15½ was never changed, but remained upon the statutes for ninety-nine years. It remained statutory until 1816, when Parliament abandoned the idea of establishing any legal ratio of the two metals which would be supported by a commercial parity, repealed the act of 1717, and thereby demonetized silver forever in Great Britain. What is true of England and Italy in the variation of values of these metals comes with equal force from the history of Greece; exchanges were noted as early as Herodotus in the fifth century before Christ.

The Senate substitute under consideration, Mr. Speaker, which provides for the free coinage of silver on a ratio with gold of 16 to 1, contains no provision which in any way attempts to maintain a commercial parity of these two metallic moneys so that gold would not be driven out of circulation and out of the country. I am opposed to the substitute.

Silver fluctuates in value in the markets of the world from day to day and year to year. How to maintain the commercial parity of these two metals on a given ratio when both are coined and used as money is a question which has puzzled many ages. It can be done in one way. A gentleman asserted on this floor yesterday that it could be done by an international agreement. Such an international agreement can never be had. Why? From the simple fact that in order to make it effective Great Britain would have to become a party to it, and she never will become a party to any such international agreement. Great Britain, according to a statement current in the public newspapers a few months ago, had at that time within her dominions $1,300,000,000 of gold coin and gold bullion, and according to the statement of Gladstone the people of Great Britain hold in credits, which are payable, principal and interest, in gold, upon people of foreign countries and foreign nations, $10,000,000,000. Under these circumstances, Great Britain, being a gold country, will never unite with the other nations of the earth in an agreement to coin and use silver in any given ratio. No, never; it is an utter impossibility. She is caring for Great Britain, and appears to be doing quite well on a gold monometallic basis.

The people of America who desire the further coinage of silver must abandon the idea of an international agreement; such an agreement can never be had. The European nations—France, Greece, Belgium, Italy, and Switzerland—which formed what was known as the Latin Union, agreed to coin and use silver upon the ratio of 15½ to 1. Great Britain did not join with those nations in that agreement, and she broke down the Latin Union; so that each of those nations was compelled in turn to recede from the agreements made in that combination. I ask how, then, can we coin more silver and maintain the parity of silver and gold on any established ratio? I will tell you, first reading a passage from Professor Perry's work on the Elements of Political Economy, published in 1866, when money was discussed for the benefit of the American students in American colleges upon sound principles. This book was written prior to this great flood of silver bullion upon the American market. What does this author say upon this question of a double metallic currency?

When, however, it is designed that both metals shall circulate in the same currency, then it becomes necessary that government shall determine, as well as it can, not the absolute value of either, but the relative value of each in each; and the value of each, estimated in the other, regulates itself independently of edicts or enactments. If the legislators can ascertain in what proportions they are exchanging for each other in a free market, they may mark that as the legal relative value of the two, but they must not suppose that their work will not require revision from time to time.

Taking the old established principles laid down by this eminent author, which permeate the pages of all authors upon the science of money, but which have never been formulated into an enactment to perpetually maintain the parity of silver and gold where both are coined, I here submit a formulation in accordance with those indisputable principles of a frequent revision by which, if enacted into law, stating an unchangeable ratio, the revision being not in the coins, but in the reserves at the foundation of and back of the coins, to correspond with the ever-shifting commercial value of silver bullion, the commercial parity of the two metals can be perpetually maintained at the legal ratio. It is as follows:

First. That the United States of America shall admit silver bullion to coinage in its mints upon the surrender by the owners to the Government of the difference between the market price of the bullion and its face value when coined.

Second. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall set apart, to be governed by the provisions of this act, any silver bullion the property of the Government of 2,000,000 ounces, which fund shall be replenished from said sources so that the same shall not fall below 2,000,000 ounces of silver bullion, and shall be known and designated as the secondary silver reserve fund.

Third. That the aforesaid difference in bullion surrendered to the Government under section 1 of this act shall be held by the Government in trust, subject to the provisions of this act, and known and designated as the primary silver reserve fund.

Fourth. That on the first Monday in each calendar month the Secretary of the Treasury shall transfer from the primary to the secondary silver reserve fund, or from the secondary silver reserve fund to the primary silver reserve fund, as the case may require, silver bullion in such amount as shall be necessary to make the primary silver reserve fund, and all of the coins under this act, equal in bullion value to the face value of all of the coins under this act.

Fifth. That 371¼ grains fineness of pure silver shall constitute $1 face value under this act.

Sixth. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required, when demanded by the holder of any coins under this act, to receive and retain said coins and issue to the holder in return thereof the silver certificates of the Government in denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $50, and $100.

Seventh. That the coins and certificates under this act shall be legal tender (unless otherwise provided by contract) in any sum for any debt or obligation, both private and public.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required when demanded by the holder of any coins under this act who desires to have the same redeemed to receive said coins when presented in the sum of $100 or any multiple thereof, and place the same in the primary silver reserve fund as bullion, and surrender as pay therefor, and in lieu thereof, to such holder from the primary silver reserve fund silver bullion of the bullion value of that day in the face sum of said coins so surrendered and redeemed.

It will readily be seen that under this proposition silver would be remonetized. The party, for illustration, who should present $1,000 worth of silver bullion at the mint would receive 1,000 legal-tender silver dollars. The balance of the bullion, commonly called seigniorage, would pass to the primary silver reserve fund.

That which fails to be in the silver dollar to make it intrinsically worth $1 in gold is in the primary reserve fund held in trust for that dollar. This primary reserve fund is increased or diminished, as the case may require, every thirty days, so that there shall be just that amount, no more, no less.

I submit this proposition for consideration to go in the RECORD because the gentleman from Maine discussed the international agreement plan, which is impracticable and has been exploded, as the remedy for the silver question and the proper method for the further coinage of silver. Should silver be remonetized under this plan, it would not disturb gold, but would aid in taking the strain from gold and would furnish a mint market for silver bullion. This would give it two competitive markets, the mint market and art market, which would, at least to some extent, enhance the bullion value of silver. Should silver bullion advance under this proposition, the Government would gain through the reserve; should it decline, the Government would loose. It is fair to make this deduction in political economy. A metal used as money and demonetized depreciates in its bullion value; remonetized it appreciates in value.

The Republican national platform of 1892 favors the coinage of silver "under such restrictions and such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal." The Democratic national platform of 1892 is exactly the same, only differing in the phraseology of the sentence in the resolution. I believe in the further coinage of silver on a safe, conservative, and enduring plan. The two great parties are together by their last national declarations.

Why not this Congress devise the way to coin silver under safeguards and redeem our pledges to the people of the whole country? Silver is an American product. It is a source of great national wealth. Why not utilize it and let the mines yield their wealth to the American people? [Applause.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware that nothing that can be said upon this floor can affect the result of the vote which will be taken upon the report of the committee, and that no amount of discussion will change the settled purpose of the large majority of gold monometallists or Pickwickian bimetallists to prevent the enactment of any legislation looking to the recognition of silver. But this discussion extends beyond these walls and reaches the great body of the people of this country who are vitally interested in the results and critically weighing the sentiments that control this body.

THE REPUBLICAN PARTY ON TRIAL.

The last campaign was a remarkable one in the political history of the Union. It was an off year. No Presidential election was pending. Nevertheless, the Democratic party was arraigned throughout the length and breadth of this land as hopelessly incompetent to manage the finances of the country; that although in full control of the executive and legislative departments, it had entirely failed to give any relief to the suffering millions of our citizens and our languishing industries. And the people believed the charge. The party in power was held responsible for the unfortunate and distressed condition of the nation; how unjustly, it is now beginning to realize. History declares the indisputable fact, of which this side of the House is justly proud, that during all the half century of the government of this country by the Democratic party there was never an act passed contracting the currency of the people or imposing upon them laws calculated or designed to enrich the few at the expense of the masses, making the rich richer and the poor poorer.

It has the enviable distinction of having been always true to the Constitution and its bed-rock principles; that the only justification for taxation is the necessity of it, and that its only virtue is in the equality of its burden upon all classes of citizens and all kinds of property. It has ever opposed robbery in all of its forms, whether directly by extravagant expenditures, or indirectly by tariff assessments upon the consumer for the benefit of the manufacturer, or insidiously by the contraction of the currency, and thereby depriving them of the opportunity to work, the means to pay their debts, and of fair values for their products. That is still the position of our party, judged, as it should be, by its platform and the votes of its representatives in Congress. It is essentially and by inheritance the party of the people. Its past record bespeaks its future, and it will yet, and at no distant day, resume business at the old stand as young and lusty as when ten years ago it emerged from its eclipse of a quarter of a century.

As I was stating, in the campaign of 1894 the Republican party proclaimed that it alone was capable of conducting the finances of the Government and of infusing life into the arteries of commerce, giving employment to labor, and restoring a general era of prosperity. The people took them at their word. That party is now in full possession of the Senate and House. Congress has been in session two months. The eyes of the people have already begun to open to the true situation. The recollection is now dawning upon them that this very party is the cause of all the financial ailments of the Government and of the ills of the country. That party has erected monuments to itself which will be as enduring as history. It has enacted every tariff law that has been passed for the benefit of the manufacturers rather than for revenue for the Government.

The act which destroyed silver as a mint money was enacted by you in 1873. From that date to this we have been trying to rehabilitate it, to restore it to the house of its fathers, while you have with equal persistency striven to prevent a resurrection. In November, 1877, Mr. Bland (Democrat) carried through the House a bill for the free and unlimited coinage of silver which should be legal tender at face value. In January, 1878, the Senate amended it by limiting the coinage to a minimum of $2,000,000 per month on Government account and providing for the exchange of silver coins for certificates of not less than $10 each. The bill passed as amended. President Hayes vetoed it "as an act of bad faith" to bondholders. It was passed over the veto. It was repealed July 14, 1890. In June, 1890, a bill authorizing the issue of Treasury notes upon deposit of silver bullion passed the House. The Senate substituted for it a bill for the free coinage of silver. The House rejected the substitute. The committee of conference agreed to what is known as the Sherman law. It became an act July 14, 1890. It provided for the monthly purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury of 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion, at not more than $1 for 371¼ grains of pure silver, and for the issuance of Treasury notes in payment, redeemable on demand in gold or silver, at the discretion of the Secretary. It made them legal tender except when otherwise stipulated in the contract, required the monthly coinage of the bulllon into standard silver dollars till the following July, after which he could coin only so much as should be necessary to provide for the redemption of the Treasury notes.

It may be well to state also in passing that it also declared it to be "the established policy of the United States to maintain the two metals on a parity with each other upon the present legal ratio as may be provided by law." Now the mask can only be taken from this miserable appearance of silver recognition when it is compared with the essentials or qualities constituting the stability as money of a metal. Those essentials are that the owner of it shall have free access to the mints for coinage and in unlimited quantity; that there shall be no charge for mintage beyond the actual cost to the Government; that the amount, by weight, of pure metal in the coin shall be exchangeable for its weight in the bullion, and that the coin shall at all times be a full legal tender. The hollowness of the pretense appears at once. It was indeed a "miserable makeshift." Its author has since justified, or rather excused it, by claiming that that was the only way to defeat the free coinage of silver. And, at last, the coup de grâce was given to aspiring silver by the act of November, 1893, which repealed that portion of the Sherman Act which allowed the purchase of silver. That is the story. All the glory for the demonetization of silver—whatever that glory may be—is yours. All of the wrongs done your countrymen by that act rest upon your head.

THE RESULT OF REPUBLICAN LEGISLATION.

With Sir Christopher Wren you may point to your own work as your monument. You may claim as your own particular production the long and continually lengthening list of tariff barons, manufacturing princes, trust-monopoly magnates. All the rivulets of a nation's toil and all the streams of her industry have, under the system of protection, paternalism, extravagance, and class favoritism, inaugurated and maintained by the Republican party during the past thirty-five years, been poured into the cavernous vaults of the favored few of her citizens and of the alien. That party has been the means of concentrating wealth to an extent never before known to any nation or people. Europe with her centuries of feudal despotism, class distinctions, and hereditary accumulations stands awestricken in the presence of the colossal fortunes which have risen in this Republic of freedom and equality within the past quarter of a century.

I need not dwell upon details. They are known of all men. Extreme wealth and extreme poverty have become the features of our civilization. One-half of 1 per cent of our population owns one-half of the total wealth of the country. The remaining 99½ per cent of the people must divide among them in all manner of proportions this unappropriated other half of the wealth of the nation. It is they who are vitally interested in this measure and who are keenly alive to the disposition to be made of it. They realize that within the past thirty-three years twenty thousand millions of wealth of this country, created and produced by its honest toilers, have passed into the hands and under the control of capital, and that that process is continuing at the rate of about one billion each year. The census of 1890 tells them further that from 1861 to 1890 the people of these United States were compelled to run into debt, public and private, twenty-eight thousand million dollars. Labor has been most vigorous and faithful, the soil has been most generous, the spirit of enterprise has been active, energy and boldness have characterized these closing years of this marvelous century in all departments of commerce, manufacturing, and development of all our resources. Yet, notwithstanding all this, the great mass of the people have steadily been growing poorer and poorer, and the wealth created by them has flowed into coffers already filled to overflowing.

The last census demonstrates the fearfully blighting effect of our financial system upon our agricultural and producing States and the corresponding benefits to the States where organized capital has taken its abode. One illustration will be sufficient. The 16 agricultural States of Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska, Kentucky, Virginia, West Virginia, Tennessee, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana have a combined area of about 800,000 square miles. The State of New York has about 50,000 square miles. The population of the 16 States was about 21,000,000 in 1880, and that of New York about 5,000,000. The assessed valuation of the property of the 16 States was a little over $4,000,000,000 in 1880, while that of New York was $2,650,000,000. Now, in the ten years the 16 producing States, with an area sixteen times as great as that of New York, increased in wealth eleven hundred and fifty millions, while that State alone gained eleven hundred and twenty-three millions. These silent figures tell more eloquently than I can the story of the great body of the people being made hewers of wood and drawers of water for the favored few. If any further evidence is desired, it can easily be found in the comparison of the values of our two great export crops, cotton and wheat, in the years 1881 and 1893, which has been compiled as follows:

In 1881 the wheat crop of the United States was 383,000,000 bushels. It realized $456,000,000.

The cotton crop of the United States for the same period, estimated at 6,000,000 bales, at 470 pounds per bale, at 10 cents per pound, would amount to $282,000,000; the same weight of cotton in 1893, at the selling price of 6 cents per pound, realized only $169,200,000, or a difference in the price of the crop, estimating the quantity the same, of $112,800,000.

The difference in the price of wheat for the same period, 1881 and 1893, was $243,000,000 less than 1881, so that we have a shrinkage of values in the two staple crops of the country of $355,800,000, which, together with the other staple crops, will make at least a shrinkage in farm products alone of more than $1,000,000,000 per year.

We have for the past twelve years lost in the material wealth, the product of the soil from which the wealth of the country is derived, $12,000,000,000. With this vast sum of money in the country we should never have been in the pitiable condition we are to-day—a sum so large that it would purchase all the railroad stocks and bonds, watered or unwatered, besides leaving a surplus.

THE ACT OF 1873 CHIEFLY RESPONSIBLE.

That this robbery of the producing and laboring classes has been chiefly accomplished through the instrumentality of the demonetizing act of 1873 has never been successfully denied and has been conceded by the greatest of Republican statesmen and politicians. It would indeed be a bootless task to enter upon the discussion of that subject at this late date. Those that are not now convinced of the fact would scarce believe though one came from the dead.

In 1880 Secretary of State James G. Blaine said:

On the much-vexed and long-mooted question as to bimetallic or monometallic standard my own views are sufficiently indicated in the remarks I have made. I believe the struggle now going on in this country and in other countries for a single gold standard would, if successful, produce widespread disaster in and throughout the commercial world. The destruction of silver as money and establishing gold as the sole unit of value must have a ruinous effect on all forms of property except those investments which yield a fixed return in money. These would be enormously enhanced in value and would gain a disproportionate and unfair advantage over every other species of property. If, as the most reliable statistics affirm, there are nearly $7,000,000,000 of coin or bullion in the world, very equally divided between gold and silver, it is impossible to strike silver out of existence as money without results which will prove distressing to millions and utterly disastrous to tens of thousands.

I believe gold and silver coin to be the money of the Constitution; indeed, the money of the American people anterior to the Constitution, which the great organic law recognized as quite independent of its own existence. No power was conferred on Congress to declare either metal should not be money. Congress has, therefore, in my judgment, no power to demonetize either. If, therefore, silver has been demonetized, I am in favor of remonetizing it. If its coinage has been prohibited, I am in favor of ordering it to be resumed; I am in favor of having it enlarged.

Prof. Francis A. Walker said in an article in the North American Review:

The abandonment of silver will result in the enhancement of the burden of all debts and fixed charges, acting as a drag upon production; and suffocation, strangulation, are words hardly too strong to express the agony of the industrial body when embraced in the fatal coils of a contracting money.

Dr. Giffen, of England, chief of the statistical department of trade and an authority with monometallists, has admitted:

If the test of prophecy be the event, there was never surely a better forecast. The fall of prices in such a general way as to amount to what is known as a rise in the purchasing power of gold is generally, I might almost say universally, admitted. Measured by any commodity or group of commodities usually taken as the measure for such a purpose, gold is undoubtedly possessed of more purchasing power than was the case fifteen or twenty years ago, and this high purchasing power has been continued over a long enough period to allow for all minor oscillations.

President Andrews, of Brown University, a member of the International Monetary Commission, concedes all that I have asserted: That the underlying cause for the financial and industrial depression is the fact of ever-falling values produced by the contraction of the currency and the displacement of silver from its position in the world's money circulation; that it was "the hardest, sadest blow to human welfare ever delivered by the action of the States; that so long as gold is the sole standard of money these wrongs and sufferings must continue—to abate them, silver must be monetized."

Hear what Senator JOHN SHERMAN, at present the high priest of gold monometallism, says in a letter written by him in 1878:

During the monetary conference in Paris, when silver in our country was excluded from circulation by being undervalued, I was strongly in favor of the single standard of gold, and wrote a letter, which you will find in the proceedings of that conference, stating briefly my view. At that time the wisest of us did not anticipate the sudden fall of silver or the rise of gold that has occurred. The uncertainty of the relation between the two metals is one of the chief arguments in favor of a monometallic system, but other arguments, showing the dangerous effect upon industry by dropping one of the precious metals from the standard of value, outweigh in my mind all theoretical objections to the bimetallic system.

There should be yoked to this opinion of one so high in Republican councils and of such undoubted authority in finance the maiden and unbiased judgment of his twin brother in economics, the present Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Carlisle, who a few months previously sounded this clarion note to his countrymen, who even that early appreciated his remarkable abilities:

I shall not enter into an examination of the causes which have combined to depreciate the relative value of silver and to appreciate the value of gold since 1873, but I am one of those who believe that they are transient and temporary in their nature, and that when they have passed away or have been removed by the separate or united actions of the nations most deeply interested in the subject, the old ratio of actual and relative value will be reestablished on a firmer foundation than ever. I know that the world's stock of precious metals is none too large, and I see no reason to apprehend that it will ever become so. Mankind will be fortunate indeed if the annual production of gold and silver coin shall keep pace with the annual increase of population, commerce, and industry. According to my view of the subject, the conspiracy which seems to have been formed here and in Europe to destroy by legislation and otherwise from three-sevenths to one-half the metallic money of the world is the most gigantic crime of this or any other age.

The consummation of such a scheme would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilence, and famine that ever occurred in the history of the world. The absolute and instantaneous destruction of half the movable property of the world, including horses, ships, railroads, and all other appliances for carrying on commerce, while it would be felt more sensibly at the moment, would not produce anything like the prolonged distress and disorganization of society that must inevitably result from the permanent annihilation of one-half of the metallic money of the world.

One more object lesson from statistics, and I shall leave this subject In 1873 wheat was $1.30 per bushel, cotton 19 cents a pound, and silver $1.30 an ounce. The farmer could then pay a debt of $100 with 77 bushels of wheat or with a bale of cotton weighing 526 pounds. To-day, with silver at 57 cents, for him to pay a debt of $100 it would require 220 bushels of wheat, or 3 bales of cotton weighing 450 pounds each. And it is the unavoidable result of the demonetization act of 1873. It can not be explained upon the theory of overproduction. The statistics already produced in this debate demonstrate that there has been no fixed ratio upon the basis of production. The ordinary law of supply and demand has been overridden by the higher law, that an insufficient currency reduces all commodities to beggars upon the market, be the production great or small.

It is equally futile to attempt to ascribe this disastrous condition to improvements in machinery appliances. The tabulated statements appearing in the London Economist show that the decline in values is greatest in the raw materials and in which there is the lowest minimum of the application or employment of such improvements. There is no escape from it. The conclusion is irresistible.

The one great cause of the depression which is resting like a nightmare upon the people of this broad land—the producers, the laborer, the merchant, the manufacturer; upon all save the money lender and the security owner, benumbing their energies and paralyzing their industries, as they measure a future which can only promise further decline in values—is the statute law of this Government, which, with ruthless purpose, has deprived the veins and arteries of the business of the country of the sufficiency of the money which is its lifeblood. Let not gentlemen delude themselves. The issue confronts you. The people are intensely in earnest. The limit of the tether has been reached. You made the law. You must unmake it. The country expects Congress to act. Almost every agricultural journal and every labor organization in the country is demanding the repeal of that iniquitous law. Manufacturing industries, seeing the impending ruinous consequences of an Asiatic competition which it is fostering, are joining in the demand. Commerce has long felt its chilling hand and is eager to rid itself of its grasp. The one cheerful voice, bidding you stay your hand from interference with that lovely act, is that of your old friends, the bondholder and the capitalist. They will never get enough, even though it comes from the hearts of the poor, struggling masses, who have made you and made this country.

BONDS CAN GIVE NO RELIEF.

You have met this demand of the people by introducing and passing through this House a bill which is a masquerading farce, a meaningless nothingness, a vapid, airy, unsubstantial appearance of relief.

It simply proposes these changes in existing laws: It provides for the issue of bonds, the reduction of the interest to 3 per cent and of the length of them to fifteen years, and for the issue of three-year debenture certificates in the sum of $50,000,000, should it become necessary, in order to defray the expenses of the Government. That is all. Should it be passed, no possible relief could proceed from it other than now provided by the existing law authorizing the issue of bonds. A 3 per cent short-term bond will realize less than a 4 per cent long-term bond, and a larger issue would be required to raise the same amount of money. Nothing would be saved to the Government. By this bill not one dollar of gold will be kept in this country, not a dollar would be added to the circulation, not one single enterprise encouraged, not a day's employment given to labor.

The height of its aspiration is to improve upon and render more facile the present indefensible system of issuing bonds—more bonds! It simply echoes the policy of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury, adding by way of adornment a bay window and a few turrets. The "grand old party" has pinned itself to the policy of the President, and is content to solve the financial problem by the easy and primitive process of borrowing money. It has committed itself to the system, odious to American sentiment, and injurious to the interests of the people and of generations yet unborn, of levying tribute upon them in time of peace by the issue of bonds with which to borrow money to keep up a gold reserve whose only good purpose is to subserve the interests of bond investors by continually exhausting itself, only to be replenished by the sale of more bonds. Within two years we have issued one hundred and sixty-two millions, and yet the last condition of the Treasury is worse than the first. Another issue of one hundred millions will follow within a few days, and the end is not yet. The policy inaugurated by Secretary Sherman, continued by Secretary Carlisle, and now approved and indorsed by this bill has proved utterly unavailing, a delusion and a snare.

The original act of 1875 may have subserved the purpose of placing the greenback notes upon a par with our metal currency. The effort to maintain the reserve so authorized is productive of evils exceeding in their magnitude all the depreciation that those notes could have suffered had they not received the support afforded by that act. The remedy has proven worse than the disease, under the application of the ruinous construction given to the word "coin" in their redemption. One note redeemed in silver coin would have stopped the drain of gold from the Treasury and the reserve would to-day be intact. But the face of the Administration is set straight toward gold, and there is no hope for an early departure from that policy. It is very seriously questioned whether the reserve is any longer of service in sustaining the par value of the notes. When it has fallen as it is to-day to forty-six millions, there is no accompanying decline in their market value. Had it descended 50 per cent lower, the greenbacks would have scarcely depreciated one cent. The one hundred millions is at best but 10 per cent of the Government's indebtedness. It is asking too much of the public to believe that this small deposit in our national vaults is essential to the maintenance of the three hundred and forty-six millions of our greenbacks at par with our other currency. The majority in this House thinks differently and will commit your party to the position that it has done all that is necessary to relieve the country when it has provided for the issue of more bonds to create or sustain a reserve which at most is not admittedly essential or for the public good.

THE SENATE SUBSTITUTE THE REMEDY.

The Senate in its substitute to this bill proposes relief which is practical, substantial, clear-cut, and certain. It restores the status that existed prior to the demonetization of 1873 by opening the mints to the free coinage of silver at the old ratio of 16 to 1; provides for the coinage of the seigniorage accumulated under the act of 1890; requires bank notes under $10 to be redeemed and larger denominations substituted; and directs that the greenbacks and Treasury notes shall when presented for redemption be paid at the option of the Government and not of the holder in gold or silver, the greenbacks when so redeemed to be reissued as provided by the act of 1878.

That substitute, if adopted, will give relief. It presents squarely the issue that the only source of permanent relief to the country is in the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

WE CAN NOT HOLD GOLD UNDER PRESENT LAWS.

It is useless for the United States to attempt to hold gold. History proves it; the conditions now surrounding us demonstrate it beyond a question. Our mines have furnished about one-half of all the gold of the world. Seventeen hundred millions have passed through our mints. Of that vast sum we have to-day only about six hundred millions. The rest has gone over the waters. Other causes must be found than that the greenbacks and the Treasury notes have drained it from our vaults, for, as an evidence, from 1849 to 1879 there were no Treasury notes, and no gold was paid for greenbacks. Yet during those thirty years, the era of our great metal production, of the fourteen hundred millions of gold and silver produced, one thousand million were exported. Forced residence of gold in our Treasury can only be temporary and fleeting. The three last purchases of it with our bonds remove the fact from the domain of controversy. So long as we are burdened with our present heavy foreign indebtedness and continue our foreign expenditures, by which the balance of the trade is against us, just so long will it be impossible for us to retain the gold which is necessary or required to liquidate that balance.

Our indebtedness to Europe and foreign holders of our securities is variously estimated at from five to six billion. Upon this we must pay an annual interest of at least $200,000,000. As not over 8 per cent of our exports and imports are carried upon our own ships, we must pay an estimated expense for carriage of $100,000,000. In addition to this, it is estimated that the annual expenditures abroad of our tourists is about $100,000,000. These three items make a total annual outgo from the United States, roundly estimated, of $400,000,000. Against this we have upon our side of the account not more than one hundred and fifty millions, consisting of excess of exports over imports of products, manufactures, gold, and silver, leaving an annual balance against us of about two hundred and fifty millions. Under present conditions there is no reason to expect a reduction of this balance. Our gold must continue to settle, upon demand, these balances against us, so long as they continue to exist. We can not pay them by borrowing money. We can pay them by increasing the value of our products, which can only be done by increasing the value of our currency, and also by increasing the volume of our foreign trade, which can best be done by monetizing silver.

OUR ONLY HOPE IS IN MONETIZING SILVER.

It is a law of economics recognized by all that the prices of commodities rise or fall with the enlargement or the contraction of the currency. It is needless to hope for any appreciable increase in circulation from gold alone. All the gold in the world to-day would not pay one year's interest upon the bonded indebtedness of the world. Dr. Giffen, the monometallist whom I mentioned, gives it as his opinion that practically the whole annual production of gold is consumed in the arts and sciences, none of it adding to the supply of money. Our population is increasing at the rate of 3 per cent a year. The per capita supply of our metal coin must each succeeding year become less and less. Prices must continue to fall and debts become harder to pay. The result is as certain as the laws of Newton and Kepler, as sure and relentless as fate.

The value of all money is dependent upon the elements of value vested in it by the law, which are its legal-tender qualities and its debt-paying power, and the debt-paying power is measured by the quantity of the legal tenders. Under the act of 1873 the quantity of silver dollars was then and there fixed, and under the act of 1893 it is prevented from being further enlarged. Silver has been reduced from a money to a commodity. This country is now upon a single gold basis; as much so as England and Germany.

So, then, the fact confronts us in all of its fearful reality that under the laws upon our statute books the money of the people will year by year become scarcer and scarcer; commodities will grow less and less in value; all industry will be handicapped with the almost certain loss of a falling market. In a word, this fair country, with its boundless possibilities, which should be the home of millions of happy, contented, and prosperous people, will fall a helpless victim to blighting, merciless legislation. Our silver mines are ready and anxious to open their stores of wealth; but no! And why not? Because gold permits no rival, is jealous of its monopoly, and wishes not for its daily growing greatness to be curtailed. The less money there is the better for those who have it is a fact too strong to be resisted by those who are in position to profit by it.

WE CAN VENTURE ALONE UPON FREE COINAGE.

Now the question arises: Can the United States, without the cooperation of Europe, safely venture upon the free coinage of silver—as the Senate substitute proposes?

The great need of this Government is the infusion of some of the Monroe-doctrine courage into its financial policy. We boldly announce our fiat that no foreign hand shall lay hold of American soil or extend dominion already acquired, and we stand prepared to maintain it. The great heart of the nation beats responsive to the declaration. But when the proposition is suggested that we exercise our independence by establishing our own currency, we are seized with timidity and halted with dire forebodings and given visions of all the horrors of a debased and dishonored currency. We are told that we dare not run counter to the financial systems of the great powers of Europe. Prophecy is the last refuge of a defeated cause. The future is invoked, armed with all manner of dangers and calamities, and employed to induce us to take counsel of our fears. It is very effective. It is to-day restraining thousands of our citizens from declaring for the remonetization of silver. Their timidity is not justified by the conditions. If ever a people were in a position to work out their own financial salvation it is this people. We have 70,000,000 population, only a little less than the combined population of Great Britain and France. We have 3,000,000 square miles of territory. Our per capita indebtedness is less than that of any of the great powers, as this table shows:

Country.	Population.	Debt.	Per capita.
Austria-Hungary	41,827,700	$2,866,339,539	$70.84
France	38,218,903	4,446,793,398	116.35
Germany	49,421,064	1,956,217,017	39.58
Great Britain and Ireland	37,880,764	3,350,719,563	87.79
Italy	29,699,785	2,324,826,329	76.06
Russia	113,354,649	3,491,018,074	30.79
Spain	17,550,266	1,251,453,696	73.85
United States	69,000,000	915,962,112	14.63

In each of those countries, its per capita indebtedness largely exceeds its per capita of coin, whereas our per capita of coin exceeds our per capita of indebtedness by nearly $4. We furnish Europe nearly one-half of its breadstuffs and three-fourths of its cotton. Our supply of silver is only one-third of hers. It seems bold indeed to assert that this great country, so marvelously favored, so Titanic in its enterprise, the foremost nation of all the world, should not be able to keep at par its silver metal bearing the stamp of its mint. For more than a century it has done so, and at 16 to 1. The people of the United States are not afraid of it in their domestic affairs. The great bugaboo held up to us is the effect of free coinage upon foreign exchange. At best, foreign exchange amounts to scarcely more than 5 per cent of the business transactions of the world; and almost the only thing that would be accomplished by the impossible ignis fatuus of international bimetallic agreement is international exchange. In all other respects each country is free and independent to act for itself, as the almost infinitely varied coins and currency of Europe, Asia, and Africa to-day attest.

If there is any power on earth that can restore the old ratio between gold and silver as money it is the United States. The conditions to which I have already referred, and the urgent necessity for the relief of our people, certainly justify the effort. So soon as our mints are opened to the free and unlimited coinage of silver the demand for it will necessarily increase. The strength of our Government and national resources would nullify the effort of gold to depreciate the coin and to place itself at a premium. Gold would no longer be the master of the situation, but the Government. The demand for it would decrease as the demand for silver increased, and they would soon move along side by side, in friendly parity, at the old step of 16 to 1, as they should do, for that is the ratio of the stocks of the two metals in the world.

But let us suppose that, as claimed by the opponents of this substitute, gold would go to a premium and remain there. Then the result would simply be the difference in exchange between us and the single gold countries to the extent of the premium. There is nothing in that to frighten us. The ultimate results would be vastly in our favor. That very rate of exchange is to-day a mighty barrier in the way of the trade between Asia and South America on the one hand and Europe and ourselves on the other. The rate is continually changing. The Japanese merchant can only guess at what his goods will be worth in English or American gold at the time of arrival at their destination. The profits of the transactions are largely dependent upon the exchange fluctuations. Our trading relations with them can not prosper when thus hampered. The advantage in the difference in exchange is all with them.

China, Japan, and Mexico have the money they have always known and none other. Silver is to-day what it was. They are satisfied to receive it at its old valuation. If we are to compete with their manufacturers we must be content with silver on the same basis, and not at 100 per cent exchange. At the present bullion value of our silver and its exclusion from the mints it is on a gold basis, worth only one-half of its face value, and the only thing left us is the payment of the difference of that exchange before being placed in equal competition with our new Eastern rivals. Even the most ardent friend of protection can not hope for his old friend to cope with 100 per cent exchange. The extraordinary progress and development now being made in those countries, upon a silver basis, effectively chase away the dogmas, theories, and hobgoblins of the gold monometallists. The consular reports, which have already been so freely quoted in this debate, tell the story of the vast impetus given to the commiserated silver countries by this little matter of exchange. China and Japan's 1,000,000 spindles are alone sufficient to make anyone but a gold zealot stop and think a moment.

If there is no possibility of restoring the two metals to a parity, if the line now drawn between gold-standard and silver-standard countries is to be permanent, then it is the policy of this country to cast its lot with the silver-using people.

Hear what President Andrews again admits:

Should the United States begin free coinage alone, it would take its place as the one great manufacturing nation of the silver world, and derive from that position the immense gain which England has hitherto reaped, but largely lost, by the demonetization of silver. We should manufacture for Mexico, South America, China, and Japan, and England, owing to the lack of par exchange with them, would lose most or all of her custom. No doubt here is a splendid chance. We may effectually dish England as a manufacturing and commercial nation by the means suggested. I do not wonder that this prospect carries away so many, for it is indeed a glorious one.

The London Financial News, a very high authority in matters of finance, says:

There can be no doubt about it that if the United States were to adopt a silver basis to-morrow British trade would be ruined before the year was out. Every American industry would be protected, not only at home, but in every other market. Of course the States would suffer to a certain extent, through having to pay their obligations abroad in gold, but the loss on exchange under this head would be a mere drop in the bucket compared with the profits to be reaped from the markets of South America and Asia, to say nothing of Europe. The marvel is that the United States has not long ago seized the opportunity, and but for the belief that the way of England is necessarily the way to commercial success and prosperity undoubtedly it would have been done long ago.

The balance of trade in those silver-using countries is now strongly against us, that of China and Japan alone being for the last year $34,000,000 in their favor. It will continue to grow as it is doing to-day, at most rapid rates, to the increasing injury of our products and manufacturing industries and the labor which they employ.

It will be a glad day for the vast majority of the people of this industrious land when the shackles of money contraction are removed from the energies of our people, and they are given the opportunity to carve out the destiny of their Republic and the happiness of its citizens with the money of their constitution, and that day is not far distant. This substitute will be rejected by this House. Nevertheless it voices, as I believe, the sentiments of a large majority of the voters of this nation.

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, in the time at my disposal I shall not attempt to present in detail all the historical and statistical facts bearing upon the free coinage of silver. These phases of the subject have been presented exhaustively, time and again, upon this floor and in the prints of the country. Every nook and corner of history on financial and cognate lines have been closely scanned under the calcium light of the concentrated attention of the monetary world, and the results spread out as a common fund of information.

Hence, for the sake of brevity, I shall assume sufficient familiarity, both on the part of the House and on the part of the country, with the leading facts to warrant me in merely referring to them, though under different conditions I should prefer, for the sake of symmetry and completeness, to quote the authorities in full.

In the endeavor to adjust myself to the limitation of time I shall (1) bestow only a passing notice upon considerations of mere policy—considerations which, to my mind, have been accorded undue attention in the discussions of this subject here and elsewhere. Believing that public questions are never settled until they are settled right, I shall dispose of such considerations as have been accorded most attention, and having disposed of them, will (2) endeavor to present plainly and briefly the questions of principle and right lying beneath this turbulent surface discussion.

AS TO MERE QUESTIONS OF POLICY.

First, then, in discussing the questions of policy, I will follow the order of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], deservedly the leader of the opposition on this floor, in his argument before the House yesterday. I select his order because, as chairman of the leading House committee and leader of the opposition, it is to be presumed that he has presented the subject in the strongest possible aspect from the gold monometallist point of view. What, then, are the considerations of policy urged against the free coinage of silver by the able chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means?

1. First and foremost (and this is the stock argument of the other side, urged with more or less of vehemence), that the enactment of this or any bill providing for the free coinage of silver would create widespread alarm in business circles, an all-pervading distrust of the honesty of the Government, a disastrous shrinkage of values, and universal distress. This has been urged time and again in the same connection. It was urged with great vehemence at the other end of the Capitol last week, when this bill was on its passage in the Senate. It was urged then that even the agitation of the bill was a menace to the pending bond sale, and Senators who favored the bill were charged with conspiring to defeat the bond negotiation and destroy the confidence of the financial world in the integrity of our purposes. All this and more was iterated in the press of the country. And yet, Mr. Speaker, even while the distinguished gentleman was on this floor insisting with vehement iteration that such results would follow with the absolute certainty of doom, there was being enacted in the Treasury Department the most crushing, because the most practical, refutation of his argument.

The bids for the one-hundred-million-dollar popular loan then and there being opened demonstrated that 4,600 applications, aggregating $558,269,850, had been filed at prices ranging all the way from par to 119. Not only so, Mr. Speaker, but the big bankers were fairly treading on each other's toes and resorting to the disreputable practices of Wall street in their eagerness to get hold of these coin bonds; and offering to pay for these coin bonds in gold. Does this look like lack of confidence? Where was the distrust and alarm about which members and others have so vociferously declaimed? Surely, Mr. Speaker, after this practical object lesson, concurrent and contemporaneous with the passage of this free-coinage measure, I need not consume more time in refutation of this argument of the opposition—their strongest argument, if we are to judge by the frequency of its repetition. It is no answer to this crushing demonstration at the Treasury for the opposition to say that the President, as has been intimated, has given assurances of a veto in case this bill or any other free-coinage bill be passed. Without discussing the propriety of his conduct, or the necessity of some modification of the veto power given him by the Constitution, it is sufficient to say in regard to the case in hand, that Mr. Cleveland's power to interpose a veto upon the will of the people in the matter of silver legislation will expire next year, while these coin bonds run thirty years; and, to borrow a favorite expression of the other side, "you know capital is proverbially timid," even of remote contingencies.

2. The second argument, from the standpoint of pure policy, to which the gentleman from Maine devoted much attention, was in substance this: If this bill should pass, the Treasury notes would immediately become redeemable in silver dollars, while the silver dollars in the Treasury would not be free for the purpose of such redemption, being really the property of holders of silver certificates outstanding. Hence, he argued, no holder of a greenback could get a silver dollar out of the Treasury without getting somebody else's dollar, namely, the dollar of the holder of the corresponding silver certificate outstanding. Admitting the literal accuracy of this statement, in what respect does this condition differ from the existing condition as to the greenback in its relation to the gold redemption fund, which the gentleman seeks so ardently to perpetuate? What are the facts? There are in the neighborhood of $346,000,000 of greenbacks outstanding, which the gentleman, following the unwarranted construction of the Administration, desires to redeem exclusively in gold. There has not been at any time for several years exceeding $100,000,000 of gold in the Treasury for the redemption of these greenbacks. According to the Treasurer's statement for this date, there is only a little over $46,000,000 of such gold on hand. At times it has reached even a lower figure. How can $346,000,000 of greenbacks be redeemed with $46,000,000 or even $100,000,000 of gold? How can any holder of a greenback, under the condition which our opponents seek to perpetuate, get a gold dollar out of the Treasury without getting somebody else's dollar? If there is any force in the point raised against redeeming greenbacks in silver dollars, surely there is threefold more force in the point as applied to redemption of greenbacks in gold exclusively as proposed by our opponents and actually attempted by the Administration without warrant or the color of authority of law. If there be any force in the point that no holder of a greenback can get a silver dollar out of the Treasury without getting somebody else's dollar, then surely no holder of a greenback can get a gold dollar out of the Treasury to-day without getting a dollar to which at least three other people have an equal claim.

The condition so much feared by gentlemen on the other side is already with us, in more aggravated form, under their favorite method of an exclusive gold redemption. The difference between our proposition and theirs is, that theirs involves more bonds, more taxes, more monopoly; our proposition means a strict compliance with the contract, less taxes, no bonds, and death to gold monopoly.

3. The third consideration of policy urged against the free coinage of silver is, that its effect would inevitably be to drive this country to a silver basis, and the stock references to India and Mexico are cited here on this floor in style ranging from tame assertion to incoherent declamation—in no case supported by proofs of any sort, or the semblance of proofs. It might be sufficient to point again to that scene now progressing in the Treasury, and remind our "friends the enemy" that with so swift and palpable a refutation of their assertions on another point, in the shape of a fresh object lesson under our very eyes, we prefer to go a little slow in accepting their assertions on this point at their face value.

The cold facts in point are that the Government has been offered upward of six hundred millions of gold for an issue of one hundred millions of coin bonds at a rate of premium that would yield interest at 3½ per cent. Not gold bonds, mind you, but coin bonds, at a time when a free-silver bill has passed the Senate and is pending in the House! And there is nothing unusual about this. It is thoroughly in keeping with the financial history of our Government during the entire eighty years that silver coinage prevailed on equal terms with gold.

In other words, at the very storm center of the agitation for free coinage, a call for one hundred millions of gold is met by prompt responses to more than five times the amount called for. There is a scramble for the bonds, and the premium offered voluntarily is such as to yield on the investment only 3¼ per cent. This, too, in spite of the Executive dictum (when the private deal for these same bonds was pending at 104 or thereabouts) that there was doubt about floating a coin bond at all; but that a bond payable exclusively in gold might be floated at 3 per cent interest. There is absolutely no proof that we should go to a silver basis, and our experience so far teaches exactly the contrary.

4. Neither need I occupy the time of the House with the causes for the alleged decline of silver. It might be sufficient to deny any real decline in the value of that metal. The value of silver to-day as compared with the values of all staple commodities and forms of property is practically the same that it has always been, the slight difference being readily accounted for in the improved methods of production and manufacture of those commodities which are cheaper than formerly as compared with silver bullion.

It is only as compared with gold that silver has declined, and in that decline all other commodities have more or less shared. Is it not plain that to say silver and all other commodities have declined as compared with gold, is tantamount to saying that gold has risen in value as compared with all other values? Is it not more rational to say gold has risen in value as compared with everything else, than it is to say everything else has fallen in value as compared with gold? Is not the rise in gold an inevitable and necessary corollary of the fall of everything else?

But granting, for the sake of argument, that silver has fallen in value, is not a sufficient reason to be found for that decline in the legislation against silver? The act of 1873 dropped the silver dollar out as the measure of value, the unit of account, and substituted the gold dollar in its place. If there was no advantage in the position of unit of account, why did the gold combine seek to displace silver? Why did they seek to put gold in its stead? At the time the act was passed the silver in a silver dollar was worth a dollar and three cents in gold. As a result of that change, gold has appreciated until their holdings have doubled in value within twenty-three years, without their turning a spindle or plowing a furrow. They have amassed untold millions by a mere stroke of the Executive pen, unconsciously given, and the masses have been robbed by just so much. That legislation may affect the value of everything no sane man will doubt. If anyone doubts, let him procure the passage of a law against the use of pacing horses, and see where the price of pacing horses will go to.

So much for the considerations of mere policy which are relied upon to sustain the opposition. What are the real issues? What are the principles, upon which the question should be settled rather than upon questions of policy?

THE PRINCIPLES INVOLVED.

1. The free coinage of silver involves the integrity of all contracts, public and private, entered into for eighty years. For eighty years, from 1792 to 1873, every contract involving the measure of value and the payment of money was predicated upon the silver dollar of 371¼ grains of fine silver. During the period of the civil war alone the public contracts amounted to more than two thousand million dollars. The total, public and private, before and subsequent to that war, up to 1873, would defy conception, not to say computation. By the statute of 1792 every one of these contracts in plain terms provided for liquidation in coin upon the basis of 371¼ grains of fine silver as the measure of value. The act of 1873 changed all this. So long as that measure of value remained the same, every contract could be settled with equity and exact justice to both the creditor and the debtor. Increase that measure of value, and the debtor is robbed by just so much as the increase multiplied by the number of units; decrease the measure of value, and the creditor is robbed in the same ratio. Increase it and not only are the debtors robbed, but every farmer and wage worker and producer is robbed in the markets where he sells his products or his labor.

Nothing can be more elementary or plainer than this. The farmer is robbed just as surely by increasing the value of the dollar as if the half bushel in which his grain is measured at the market had been correspondingly increased in size; he is robbed just as surely as if the scales upon which his cotton or his pork are weighed at the market had been previously loaded or "set back."

The fathers evidently appreciated this fundamental truth, and hence when they in 1834 found the commercial value of silver and gold varying slightly from the coinage ratio, they properly adjusted it by changing the coinage ratio. But how? By changing the unit of account, the silver dollar? Nay, verily. Through all the changes in our coinage laws—in 1834, in 1837, in 1849, in 1853—no change in the amount of pure silver in the silver dollar was ever made. And the reason is plain. It was the measure of value, the standard of value, the unit of account, and the most primitive honesty demanded that it be inviolate. Whatever change was made in adjusting the difference between the silver and the gold dollar was adjusted by reducing the gold in the gold dollar. Only once in all the eighty years from 1792 to 1873, under the operation of open mints to both gold and silver on equal terms, did it become necessary to adjust the commercial difference between the gold and the silver dollar by a change of ratio in the coinage. That was in 1834, when the gold in the gold dollar was reduced from 27 grains to 25.8 grains.

It was left for the gold combine that battened upon the misfortunes of their country during the civil war, while the brave sons of the North and the South were drenching the soil in defense of their convictions—it was left for these sordid sons of greed to shift the measure of value by surreptitious means in the coinage act of 1873, and thus unsettle the equities and destroy the integrity of the contracts of almost a century. By the act of 1873, which passed both Houses without many of the most prominent members knowing what its secret purpose and concealed effect would be, which was signed by the President without any suspicion of its intended effect—so carefully was it framed, so carefully managed to conceal its purpose while assuming the air of utmost frankness—by that act of 1873, procured in this way, the equities of a century were destroyed and the way opened for limitless oppression of the masses of the people, for limitless pillage of the farmer and of all productive industry. In the name of the masses, who have been wronged by the rich for the benefit of the rich, we stand here to-day and demand that the wrong shall be righted; that the debtor, public and private, be allowed to discharge his debt according to the plain terms of the contract—i. e., in the coin of the Constitution (gold and silver), but measured in the silver dollar of 371¼ grains of fine silver.

And we deny that the payment of those debts in silver dollars, according to the terms of the contract, is paying them in dishonest dollars. Our debts are payable in coin, and under the definition in the Constitution coin is both gold and silver; while by the act of 1792 the silver dollar is the sole measure of value. If the term "dishonest" properly attaches anywhere in this connection, it attaches to that dollar which requires double as much of the farmer's cotton and wheat and corn to pay a debt as was required when the debt was made.

Here is a table showing that we have paid the civil-war debt nearly twice over in dollars, and yet it would require nearly twice as much of the products of the farm to liquidate the balance due, $889,313,380, as would have sufficed to pay the whole debt at first:

Year.	Debt, interest-bearing and noninterest-bearing, less cash in Treasury.	Debt could have been paid in bales of cotton of 500 pounds each.	Average price of cotton.	Debt could have been paid in bushels of wheat.	Average price of wheat.
1866	$2,636,026,164	12,940,020	$0.43	1,116,922,103	$2.36
1873	2,105,462,062	22,035,118	.20	1,349,719,338	1.56
1879	1,996,414,905	39,928,298	.10	1,649,929,673	1.21
1894	889,313,380	25,916,812	.0694	1,474,284,229	.61
Paid in principal and interest since 1866	3,914,424,855	65,240,414	.12	3,131,539,884	1.25

Add to this the enormous private debt during the same period and we get some faint idea of the mammoth stake for which the gold combine played during and since the civil-war, and which they are now striving to still further enlarge at the expense of the debtors both public and private.

In the first burst of righteous indignation that swept over the country after the true meaning of the act of 1873 became apparent, men were sent here fresh from the ranks of the people to undo this wrong. Among them was the present Secretary of the Treasury, whose magnificent arraignment of that crime has rarely been matched, never surpassed. Here is what Mr. Carlisle said in 1878:

I shall not now enter into an examination of the causes which have combined to depreciate the relative value of silver and to appreciate the value of gold since 1873, but I am one of those who believe that they are transient and temporary in their nature, and that when they have passed away or been removed by the separate or united action of the nations most deeply interested in the subject the old ratio of actual and relative value will be reestablished on a firmer foundation than ever. I know that the world's stock of the precious metals is none too large, and I see no reason to apprehend that it will ever become so. Mankind will be fortunate indeed if the annual production of gold and silver coin shall keep pace with the annual increase of population, commerce, and industry. According to my view of the subject, the conspiracy which seems to have been formed here and in Europe to destroy by legislation and otherwise from three-sevenths to one-half of the metallic money of the world is the most gigantic crime of this or any other age.

The consummation of such a scheme would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilence, and famine that ever occurred in the history of the world. The absolute and instantaneous destruction of half the entire movable property of the world, including houses, ships, railroads, and all other appliances for carrying on commerce, while it would be felt more sensibly at the moment, would not produce anything like the prolonged distress and disorganization of society that must inevitably result from the permanent annihilation of one-half of the metallic money of the world. With an ample currency, an industrious and frugal people will speedily rebuild their works of internal improvement and repair their losses of property, but no amount of industry or economy on the part of the people can create money. When the Government creates it, or authorizes it, the citizen may acquire it, but he can do nothing more.

I am in favor of every practicable and constitutional measure that will have a tendency to defeat or retard the perpetration of this great crime, and I am also in favor of every practicable and constitutional measure that will aid us in devising a just and permanent ratio of value between the two metals, so that they may circulate side by side and not alternately drive each other into exile from one country to another.—Congressional Record, volume 7, part 5, page 41, Appendix.

Closing the same speech, Mr. Carlisle uses the following extraordinary language:

Our power of legislation over this subject will not be exhausted by the passage of this measure, and we ought not to halt for a single moment in our efforts to complete the work of relief inaugurated by it. The struggle now going on can not cease, and ought not to cease, until all industrial interests of the country are fully and finally emancipated from the heartless domination of syndicates, stock exchanges, and other great combinations of money grabbers in this country and in Europe. Let us, if we can do no better, pass bill after bill, embodying in each some one substantial provision for relief, and send them to the Executive for his approval. If he withholds his signature, and we are unable to secure the necessary vote here or elsewhere to enact them into laws, notwithstanding his veto, let us, as a last resort, suspend the rules and put them into the general appropriation bills, with the distinct understanding that if the people can get no relief the Government can get no money.

And here is what Mr. SHERMAN, the arch evangel of gold monometallism to-day, said in 1869, when the proposition was made to go to a specie basis:

It means the payment of $135 where he has agreed to pay $100; or, which is the same thing, the payment of $100 where he has agreed to pay $74. When he has purchased property and paid one-fourth of it, it means the loss of the property. It means the addition of one-fourth to all currency debts in the United States. A measure to require a debtor now to pay his debt in gold, or currency equivalent to gold, requires him to pay 135 bushels of wheat when he agreed to pay 100; and if this appreciation is extended through a period of three years, it requires him to pay an interest of 12 per cent in addition to the rate he has agreed to pay. The appreciation of currency is a far more distressing operation than Senators may suppose. Our own and other nations have gone through this process before, and always with the sorest distress. It means the ruin of all debtors whose debts are twice their capital, though one-third less than all their property. It means the fall of all agricultural productions without any great reduction of taxes. To attempt this task suddenly by a surprise upon our people, by at once paralyzing their industry, by arresting them in the midst of lawful business and applying a new standard of value to their property, without any reduction of their debt or giving them an opportunity to compound with their creditors or distribute their loss, would be an act of folly without example in modern times.

And yet these men have out-Heroded Herod in recent years to bring about precisely the conditions of misery and distress they so vividly portrayed. Shall we trust them again? Shall we follow them further? When they were fresh from the people, they eloquently pleaded for the rights of the people; now they construe every point of law and of contract against the people, and violate law to do it. We who are fresh from the people to-day are standing for precisely what they stood for when they were fresh from the people twenty-five years ago.

2. It is argued that if free coinage of silver under this bill be reestablished a hardship would result in the settlement of contracts entered into since 1873. My reply is that we should not hesitate to right a wrong because, forsooth, some of those instrumental in bringing about that wrong and who, by reason of that wrong, have amassed fabulous fortunes, will be compelled to disgorge some of their ill-gotten gains. Still, there would doubtless be a large number of innocent and honest contractors who do not merit any punishment of this sort, and for their protection I would suggest as an amendment to the bill (which is sent to the desk) that all such contracts be adjusted upon the basis of the purchasing power of the dollar at the time the contract was made, as certified to by the Bureau of Statistics.

I need not pursue the question through its various phases since 1873. The compromises of 1878 and of 1890, and the final crowning infamy of 1893 have been burned into the memory of the masses. How the Executive grasped the reins and dictated legislation is fresh in mind. What was lacking in the act of 1893 to give full swing to the conspirators has been since supplemented by Department-made law to fit the schemes and the desires of the gold combine. Never before, perhaps, in the history of constitutional government, have trusted agents of the people dared go so far in construing contracts to which the people are a party to the manifest disadvantage of the people. Never before have trusted agents dared violate the laws so flagrantly to force the people's representatives along the lines laid out by the conspirators. And when the Congress hesitates to carry out their behests, forsooth, the representatives of the sovereign people are insolently met with the scarcely concealed threat that if we do not go forward and validate by law what the head of a Department has done without the warrant of law, there will be another object lesson of panic and ruin and disaster.

By such efforts at compulsion every energy should be aroused. I say to such, We accept your challenge; we will pass this bill. Do your worst. The contract right of the Government to pay its debts, according to the plain terms of the contract, shall not be tamely surrendered. The rights of the plain people shall not be bartered away. The worst you can do can be no worse than the prolonged and ever-increasing distress of the millions under the existing conditions. Even if your new object lesson result in wreck and ruin equal to the last one, the loss and destruction of value can be no greater than the ultimate aggregate loss and shrinkage from the continued operation of the existing system. But after the paroxysm of this new object lesson is past the toiler in shop and field and factory will be free to pursue the road of prosperity and progress without having his heels forever clogged with an ever-increasing load, without meeting a gold monopoly tollgate at every milestone.

[Mr. HYDE addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. NEILL. Mr. Speaker, it is scarcely to be expected that anything which might be said at this time in the brief period allowed for debate by the Republican majority on this floor upon this, the mightiest issue which now confronts the American people, can add very largely to the general stock of information on the subject. With a full appreciation of my lack of preparation to discuss the pending Senate bill, and of my inability to do the vast and far-reaching subject justice even under the most favorable conditions, still less at this late hour of night, I have yet deemed it a duty of highest moment to seek opportunity to present my views briefly, even though my method and arrangement be crude.

At the outset I beg to say that I gratefully salute the American Senate and render my meed of praise, feeble though it be, to that body for its prompt and ready recognition and performance of duty to the great body and mass of the citizens of this Republic in the passage of the bill now pending in this House.

That Senate which in the past has often been the subject of ribald diatribes from the penny-a-liners of the metropolitan press of the country and the sometime theme of the cheap-john and pinchbeck criticism of pseudo statesmen infesting this House has once again risen to the heights of a grand statesmanship and taken the initial step toward enacting into law a measure more beneficent, more just, more equitable, more largely enuring to the best interests of the masses of the plain people of these United States—the toiling millions, if the phrase pleases you, or if it displeases you—than any legislation enacted in this Capitol within half a century of the past. Think you the action by so decided a majority of that Senate, composed of Senators representing by entireties the sovereignties of all the States of this Union, is a matter to be lightly considered, pooh-poohed, and laughed out of court by the cry of "thrashing over old straw," "calamity howls of Populists," "wailing of anarchists," and other kindred stentorian utterances of the attorneys and advocates of the single gold standard of money?

To those who entertain such views, let me sound a warning that they are mistaken, and perchance grievously mistaken. It is well that all should know and be advised at the threshold that there are representatives of the people on this floor who, believing that the time has not yet come, and with an abiding faith in the providence of the God of nations that it will never come, for the patriotic and honest masses of the people of this country to be permanently enslaved, in a thraldom thricefold worse than the worst example of African slavery, will stand unflinchingly by the action of the Senate and demand of you, the representatives of an outraged people, to do likewise. Looking to the environments and difficulties and obstructions besetting the pathway of the great mass of producers, toilers, and wage earners of this country, preventing absolutely that degree of material prosperity which it is their God-given right to enjoy, is it not, fellow-Representatives, a time for calm, deliberate, and unprejudiced consideration on our part?

I have during all the period of my manhood life been a partisan. In my early manhood there came a call which sounded and seemed to my ears the call of my country, a call to arms in defense of my native Southland, whose flag I followed through evil as well as through good repute until it went down in a sea of gloom and disaster never more to rise. I was then a partisan. Returning to the paternal rooftree which, more fortunate than many others, had escaped fire and sword, I again, by the tolerance—if it please you—of the conquering section, was permitted to resume the duties and privileges of citizenship in a restored Union. The very logic of events, the instincts of self-preservation and a self-respecting manhood, made me a Democrat. I was a partisan. Later on I read and studied somewhat according to my limited opportunities the history of our Government and of the political economy affecting it, and became convinced that the tenets, theories, and practices of government advocated by the Democratic party were those best adapted to the welfare—material, moral, and mental—of the masses of the people. I was still a partisan, and I am yet a Democrat, rock-ribbed and thoroughly grounded in the faith, if

I know myself, but nevertheless somewhat rattled and shaken up, as it were, in my partisanship. [Applause.]

As a Democrat I would talk to-day, and of the theories and practices of finance as applied to our Constitution and Government, which are Democratic as I read the history and experience of the past, and yet I know full well that all I may say in this behalf will fall unheeded, and even scorned, upon the ears of some gentlemen whose Democracy in the past has been unquestioned and is yet unchallenged by me. This again somewhat impairs my partisanship, in fact, impels me toward discarding narrow partisanship, and to try to make my argument on the broader and higher plane of an appeal in behalf of all of my fellow-citizens of this broad and grand Union of States. In fact, I will take the liberty—I trust it is not an undue or an improper one—to remind my fellow-Representatives upon the other side of the Chamber that there is a duty resting upon them of as high import as that resting upon my humble self; that they should also rise above the low plane of partisanship, eschew all desires and practices looking simply to party advantage, and cooperate with gentlemen on both sides of the Chamber in striving to do our whole duty to the entire people of these United States.

A majority of you gentlemen, acting under the party whip, nominally in response to the sensational message of the President so dramatically sent to the Senate on the evening of December 20, 1895, passed a bill soon afterwards for the issuance of United States bonds, which bill reads as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury by the act approved January 14, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," he is authorized from time to time, at his discretion, to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, coupon or registered bonds of the United States, to an amount sufficient for the object stated in this section, bearing not to exceed 3 per cent interest per annum, payable semiannually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, in coin, after five years from their date, and payable in fifteen years after their date, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided in said act for the bonds therein authorized. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall use the proceeds thereof for the redemption of United States legal-tender notes, and for no other purpose: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify an act approved May 31, 1878, entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes." Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall offer any of the bonds authorized for sale by this act or by the resumption act of 1875, he shall advertise the same and authorize subscriptions therefor to be made at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States.

SEC. 2. That to provide for any temporary deficiency now existing, or which may hereafter occur, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to issue certificates of indebtedness of the United States, to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, payable in three years after their date to the bearer in lawful money of the United States, of the denomination of $20, or multiples thereof, with annual coupons for interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and to sell and dispose of the same for not less than an equal amount of lawful money of the United States at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States and at such post-offices as he may select. And such certificates shall have the like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided in said resumption act for the bonds therein authorized. And the proceeds thereof shall be used for the purpose prescribed in this section and for no other.

The Senate Finance Committee reported this bill with an amendment striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That from and after the passage of this act the mints of the United States shall be open to the coinage of silver, and there shall be coined dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, of standard silver, nine-tenths fine, as provided by the act of January 18, 1837, and upon the same terms and subject to the limitations and provisions of law regulating the coinage and legal-tender quality of gold; and whenever the said coins herein provided for shall be received into the Treasury, certificates may be issued therefor in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall coin into standard silver dollars, as soon as practicable, according to the provisions of section 1 of this act, from the silver bullion purchased under authority of the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," that portion of said silver bullion which represents the seigniorage or profit to the Government, to wit, the difference between the cost of the silver purchased under said act and its coinage value, and said silver dollars so coined shall be used in the payment of the current expenses of the Government; and for the purpose of making the said seigniorage immediately available for use as money, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue silver certificates against it, as if it was already coined and in the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That no national-bank note shall be hereafter issued of a denomination less than $10, and all notes of such banks now outstanding of denominations less than that sum shall be, as rapidly as practicable, taken up, redeemed, and canceled, and notes of $10 and larger denominations shall be issued in their stead under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," and also the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, when presented for redemption, in standard silver dollars or in gold coin, using for redemption of said notes either gold or silver coins, or both, not at the option of the holder, but exclusively at the option of the Treasury Department, and said notes, commonly called "greenbacks," when so redeemed, shall be reissued, as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

In this form the bill passed the Senate a few days ago by a majority of 7, the vote being—yeas 42; nays 35. There was no demand by the country for the bill which you passed and sent to the Senate. That bill is said to be also unsatisfactory to the Executive, in response to whose request you had professed to act. In my humble opinion there is a demand existing to-day by a majority of the people of these United States for the passage of the amended Senate bill, providing for the free coinage of silver, and for the retirement of all national-bank notes of a denomination less than $10.

There can scarcely be a question of more importance to a free people than the question of finance. Upon this subject Senator JONES of Nevada, in his great speech in the Senate in October, 1893, used the following language, which I deem eminently worthy of repetition here:

Upon a proper solution of the problem of money in a country depends the decision of the question whether there shall be in that country more poverty or less, more crime or less, more insanity or less; whether among its people there shall be more employment or idleness, more happiness or more misery—indeed, more liberty or more slavery; for it must be borne in mind that men may be as thoroughly enslaved by unfavorable industrial conditions as by legal enactment.

No matter under what form of government a people may live, whether the irresponsible despotism of a military autocrat or a constitution carefully framed to permit the widest play of political action, the table from which hunger rises unsatisfied will have no seat reserved for freedom.

Surely a subject that affects so vast a range of topics deserves serious consideration at the hands of a self-governing people.

These are the utterances of a man who has given the subject great consideration and study, which his intellect, education, and habits of life preeminently fitted him for.

Gold and silver coins are the money of the Constitution. On this subject Daniel Webster, whose great ability as a statesman was never questioned, whose most enduring fame, perhaps, was won as an expounder of the Constitution, and whose patriotism was never challenged, so far as I know, except in the closing years of his life in his own native New England, said:

Most unquestionably there is no legal tender, and there can be no legal tender, in this country under the authority of this Government, or any other, but gold and silver, either the coinage of our mints or foreign coins at rates regulated by Congress. This is a constitutional policy perfectly plain and of the very highest importance.

The States are prohibited from making anything but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts, and although no such express prohibition is applied to Congress, yet as the Constitution has no power granted to it in this respect but to coin money and to regulate the value of foreign coin, it clearly has no power to substitute paper or anything else as a tender in payment of debts and in discharge of contracts.

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Gwin vs. Breedlove, 2 Howard Report, said:

By the Constitution of the United States gold and silver coin, made current by law, can only be tendered in payment of debts.

Similar language was used by Chief Justice Chase and perhaps by some of the other judges of the Supreme Court in the decisions on the legal-tender cases. Of course I do not overlook the fact that this same court, by a bare majority, and by a construction which I think most lawyers consider a forced one, afterwards decided that the Government Treasury notes were a legal tender for the payment of debts.

Silver and gold had circulated side by side at par in the United States from the date of the first coinage act in 1792, until the demonetization act of 1873, with the slight change of ratio from 15 to 1 provided in the act of 1792 to the ratio of 16 to 1 provided in the coinage act of 1834.

During this period there had been coined in the United States mints about $145,000,000 in silver coins, and under the operations of the acts of Congress of February, 1793, April, 1806, April, 1816, and June, 1834, respectively, the silver dollars of Spain, Mexico, Peru, Chile, Central America, and the crowns and 5-franc pieces of France had been made legal-tender money in the United States and were in circulation here to an amount estimated at $100,000,000.

It is the fashion nowadays of the advocates of the single gold standard to speak of the free coinage of silver as a new and strange doctrine, a device of Populists and a scheme of anarchists, in order to debase the people's money, to ruin commerce, unsettle business, and derange prices. [Applause.] And these same flamboyant orators immediately and in the same breath proclaim themselves the friends of the laboring people and manifest an interest in the welfare of the working classes, which might be somewhat touching were it not so manifestly and transparently fraudulent in its purpose and design. In truth, the very first coinage law enacted under the present Constitution provided for the free and unlimited coinage of silver. It did more; it made the silver dollar, or unit of the value of a Spanish milled dollar as the same was then current, the unit of value.

I refer, of course, to the coinage act of April 2, 1792.

Section 14 of said act provided as follows:

And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any person or persons to bring to the said mint gold and silver bullion in order to their being coined; and that the bullion so brought shall be there assayed and coined, as speedily as may be after the receipt thereof, and that free of expense to the person or persons by whom the same shall have been brought. And as soon as the said bullion shall have been coined the person or persons by whom the same shall have been delivered shall upon demand receive in lieu thereof coins of the same species of bullion which shall have been so delivered, weight for weight, for the pure gold or pure silver therein contained.

This was free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver, and that without any charge for mintage.

And thus the law stood until the act of Febuary 21, 1853, which provided for the lessening of the weight of half dollars, quarters, dimes, and half dimes, respectively. The sixth section of which act also prescribed a mintage charge of one-half per cent for coining either pure metal or that of standard fineness. So that, as a matter of fact, under the coinage laws of Congress there was free and unlimited coinage, pure and simple, from 1792 till February 12, 1873.

During all this long period from 1792 to 1873, I have never heard that any of this stock of silver money was ever discredited, or failed to fulfill all the functions of good money and sound money, at home or abroad, except at our own National Treasury, where it is refused and dishonored by the gold sharks, Treasury despoilers, and shylocks, who are permitted to demand and receive gold only in redemption of the Government's paper promises to pay, to wit, legal tenders and silver-purchase Treasury notes.

It is true that Secretary Carlisle asserted in his Covington (Ky.) speech that the undervaluation of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, established by the coinage act of 1834, when the ratio existing at the mints of France was 15½ to 1, caused our silver to leave us and be taken abroad and sold as bullion.

The same statement has frequently been made by others, and has perhaps become a stock argument of the gold monometallists.

These men make these statements as evidence to prove their assertions that gold and silver coins will not remain in circulation together when the commercial ratio differs from the legal ratio established by law. That is to say, that when the relative commercial value of the bullion of the two metals varies from the relative value of the same metals after being coined the coins will not both remain in circulation, but that the coins made of the metal having the highest commercial ratio or value will be driven out of circulation and sold for bullion.

The weakness of these statements consists in the fact that they are palpably untrue as applied to the history of some parts of the United States, while they may be true as to the larger portion of the country. I assert it as a fact easily within my recollection, and more fully within the recollection of intelligent gentlemen older than myself with whom I have conversed frequently on the subject in the last year or two, that the standard silver dollars of the United States and the Mexican silver dollars and the 5-franc pieces of France constituted a large part of the money in Arkansas from 1846 to the beginning of the war in 1861. I know from the statements of intelligent gentlemen, some of them older than myself, that the same state of facts existed in the States of Tennessee and of Missouri adjoining my own State.

It is within my knowledge that the receiver of the United States land office which was located at Batesville, Ark., from about 1828 to 1861, received large amounts of the silver coins above mentioned in payment to the Government for its public lands, and was receiving them up to the day the State attempted to secede from the Union in May, 1861.

I know it would be very easy for some fellow in the North or East to say that down in Arkansas and the Southwest we did not have very much money at that time. While it is true we had no great money centers like at present exist, the people there had money, most of it brought in by the immigration coming from the States east of the Mississippi River, and while I do not controvert the proposition that in the more commercial States of the Union, those having most intercourse with the countries of the Old World, it was a fact that between 1834 and 1873, when the legal ratio between gold and silver was in this country 16 to 1, while in France the ratio was 15½ to 1, thereby giving a greater value to silver in France than in this country, there was a tendency in our silver coins of standard value to find their way to France.

But it is not true that this was the case as to all our silver coin, and I have mentioned my own personal knowledge of affairs in some parts of the country to prove that the coins of the two metals did remain in circulation together in some sections, and that those sections of country enjoyed the benefits of bimetallic currency up to the disappearance of both gold and silver coins during the late war.

But the question as to whether the coins of gold and silver will both remain in active and general circulation under any fixed or given ratio is not the great vital and underlying principle in favor of free coinage, which is the right of free access to the mints by both metals without discrimination against either.

Something very like this was embodied in the seventh section of the platform adopted by the Democratic party at Chicago in June, 1892, which reads thus:

> We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country and to the coinage of both gold and silver, without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage.

Recurring for a moment to the condition of monetary affairs in this country from 1834 to 1873, during which period, as a matter of fact, silver bullion was undervalued slightly at our mints by the coinage laws, and when we were, according to the dictum of the gold-standard people, on a gold standard, I submit there was no inconvenience or injustice suffered by silver. The industrious miner could dig out of the earth the precious metal, and there was a demand for it, and I may say truthfully an unlimited demand. If he did not choose to take it to the mints of his own country, and there have it coined entirely free of all mintage charge prior to 1853 and with the mintage charge thereafter, there was a good demand for it in France at a rate slightly above its coinage value in the United States.

During the period referred to, that is to say, from 1834 to 1873, when, as our gold-standard friends assert, the United States was practically on a gold standard, and when we know that England was absolutely so, it appears by statistics published by the Treasury Department of the United States that the silver product of the world was year by year increasing. I now quote from the report of the Director of the Mint for 1895, on pages 248 and 249, that the annual product of silver during the period from 1831 to 1840 was $24,793,000 coining value. Annual product from 1841 to 1850, $32,440,000. Annual product from 1851 to 1855, $36,824,000. Annual product from 1856 to 1860, $37,618,000. Annual product from 1861 to 1865, $45,772,000. Annual product from 1866 to 1870, $55,663,000.

The advocates of the single gold standard continually harp upon the fact that prior to the demonetization act of February 12, 1873, there had been only some 8,000,000 of standard silver dollars coined altogether, and that since the reopening of the mint to silver under the Bland-Allison Act of February 28, 1878, there have been some four hundred and twenty-odd million of standard legal-tender silver dollars coined, and that therefore this country is already flooded with silver. The gentlemen who indulge in this sort of statement—I will not call it argument—forget to take notice of the population of this country in 1870 and the vast increase between that date and the present. By the census reports the population of the United States in 1870 was in round numbers 38,000,000, and in 1890 it was 62,000,000.

It seems to me that it would be apparent to any fair-minded man who is really seeking for the truth that the people of this country would be capable of using profitably a good deal larger amount of money in 1890 and up to the present date than was required in 1870 and anterior thereto.

The same gentry also utterly ignore and in my judgment try to conceal the real truth in the case, to wit, that whereas, while prior to 1873 the coinage of silver in the United States had not amounted to an enormous sum, still the metal having free access to the mints, and having abroad a larger value as bullion than it had at home when coined, the people of this country got the benefit of all the silver mined in the United States whether it was coined or not coined. If it was shipped to Europe there was a return in money or some kind of commodity for its value.

Another stock argument of the gold bugs is that the silver we already have will not circulate, as, for instance, that of the 423,000,000 standard silver dollars coined by the United States mints there were on the 1st day of January, 1896, 364,000,000 in the Treasury and only 59,000,000 in circulation. And they raise a great hurrah over this, and say the people do not want silver and will not have it. They neglect to tell the whole truth, which is, that for every silver dollar in the Treasury there is outstanding and in the hands of some person a paper dollar in the form of a silver certificate. They also neglect to state the fact, plain to all men of some experience in the affairs of life, that at this time there is little or no gold in actual circulation. For instance, the statement from the Treasury Department of date February 1, 1896, issued from the division of loans and currency, places the amount of gold coin in the Treasury at $84,000,000, and the amount of gold in circulation at the same date $499,000,000. Now, of this amount stated as being in circulation the Treasury does have means of knowing the amount held by the national banks, which are required to make returns to the Treasury Department.

This is stated in the report of the Comptroller of the Currency made to the Secretary of the Treasury December 22, 1895, on page 15 of said report, as being upon July 11, 1895, $127,621,099.

Where is the remainder of the four hundred and ninety-nine million asserted by the Treasury Department to have been in circulation on the 1st day of this month? I state upon my knowledge and information upon such matters, which is, however, not very extensive, that there are not $150,000,000 of gold coin in the United States in general circulation, and I challenge any gentleman on this floor to show where even that amount is, even by prima facie evidence. I venture to say there is not a gentleman within the sound of my voice, unless he be a bank official or has been about a bank, that has within six months past seen $500 of gold coin of any description whatever. It is an undeniable fact that this coin does not pass from hand to hand. Even the people who have it will not part with it except upon extraordinary occasions. It has been laid away in vaults, and the peope who have it will not allow it to be handled lest it suffer abrasion, thereby lessening its value.

Another stock argument which has been used against any increase in our stock of silver coins is that because of its demonetization by the countries of Europe it has not in any of those countries a value as coin over and above its bullion value. And the Secretary of the Treasury, who in the spring and early summer of 1895 abandoned the duties of his great office and meandered over the country in advocacy of a system of finance which he had in 1878, when a Representative in this House, denounced with a logic and eloquence alike superb, drifted down to Memphis, Tenn.—he was doubtless there by invitation—to instruct the Tennesseeans in the matter of finance.

He is quoted by the St. Louis Republic, a reputable newspaper, which published what purported to be a full report of his speech, as saying, among other things, that—

Up to the present time there is no legal tender in international trade. Whether payments are made in gold and silver coins or in gold and silver bullion, the actual intrinsic value determines the amount or quantity to be delivered, no matter what may be the legal-tender laws of the different countries, and no matter though they may have the same or different ratios of value between the metals within their respective limits. * * * The law of France, for instance, places a higher value upon silver relatively to gold than is placed upon it by the laws of the United States, the French ratio being 15½ to 1 and ours being 16 to 1; but if 16 pounds of our silver, coined or uncoined, were sent to that country to be used in the payment of a debt or in the purchase of commodities, it would not be accepted at the ratio of 15½ to 1 or at the ratio of 16 to 1 as compared to gold, but only at the ratio of about 32 to 1, which shows that neither our ratio nor the French ratio has any effect whatever upon the value or the purchasing power of the metal itself.

I place in contrast to this statement and against it the testimony of Mr. William P. St. John, the president of the Mercantile National Bank of New York City, taken before the Committee on Banking and Currency of this House on the 15th day of December, 1894. Under a rigid cross-examination by Representative SPERRY, Mr. St. John said:

The silver dollar of the United States if it were in London to-day would sell at a discount of about five-eighths of 1 per cent, that is par, less freight, insurance, and interest to New York. It would not sell at the value of the bullion composing it, as you are sometimes told here.

This statement went unchallenged by all the great array of single gold standard advocates and witnesses in attendance at that hearing, and I assume, without fear of successful contradiction, that it was absolutely true.

It would take a volume of vast proportions to contain all the objections which the gold monometallists in this country, not to speak of their allies in Europe, can bring up against the free coinage of silver at any ratio. They utterly ignore the experience of the country under the free-coinage laws obtaining here up to 1873. With them experience is nothing. They have a theory which they intend to stick to; whether logical or illogical they care not. Every mother's son of them is like old Sol Gills was in the estimation of grand old Captain Cuttle, in Dickens's novel of Dombey and Son, "chock full of science."

They tell us that with the restoration of silver coinage, gold would at once go to a premium, that it would leave the country and go to the gold-standard countries of Europe. Then they tell us, which is true, that our largest foreign commerce is with these gold-standard countries.

It occurs to me, as I think it has occurred to all rational men who have considered the subject without prejudice and with a desire to arrive at the truth, that if gold left this conntry and went to the countries of Europe with whom we have the most trade, we would scarcely be injured by that. If we sent over our produce it would be paid for in gold, and the larger the stock of gold there most certainly the higher prices would be. But in truth all this twaddle that gold would go to a premium in the event of the restoration of silver coinage is begging the question. As a matter of fact, gold is at a premium to-day, and has been for months. I hold in my hand the weekly financial review of Henry Clews & Co., of Wall street, New York, who, I believe, are considered an authority in such matters. This circular bears the date of January 25, 1896, and states that the current rate of premium on gold and on legal tenders at that date was three-fourths of 1 per cent. The weekly letter of same date of Dimmock & Co., bankers and brokers, of Broadway, New York, states that there is one premium on gold and another on greenbacks, but without giving the rate.

In the line of my argument some minutes ago that the amount of gold in circulation in the United States is far below the amounts estimated in the Treasury statements, I desire to submit the opinion of Cox, Bixford & Co., bankers and brokers, of 46 Congress street, Boston, set forth in their circular of the 1st instant, who say:

In order to bring up the amount of gold to his estimate the Director of the Mint is obliged to charge to circulation among the public the astounding figures of $367,600,000.

These parties further say:

As this sum does not circulate, that is, pass from hand to hand, it must be either locked up in stockings or strong boxes, and it is a sufficiently ridiculous proposition to anyone knowing our people as to warrant some explanation on his part and an effort to produce some statistics in justification of his claim.

Continuing, they say:

No less an authority than Professor Taussig, of Harvard, challenges this absurd assumption as follows: "This last figure of $367,600,000 I am inclined to question very much. I am inclined to think $150,000,000 is all the gold there is in circulation."

The gold monometallists of the United States assert that the only financial safety for our people is to keep our monetary system in harmony with that of Europe. A few weeks ago there was witnessed on this floor a wonderful ebullition of enthusiasm over the reading of the message of the President of the United States upon the Venezuelan controversy with Great Britain. I can say truthfully that I at the time marveled at the temper of men who manifested such a belligerent disposition toward Great Britain in a matter which, however much it enlists our sympathies, can scarcely be said to strictly, immediately, and vitally concern the people of the United States, and yet the same men are so absolutely cringing and subservient to England's opinion, England's views, and England's methods of finance.

It is a well-authenticated fact, denied by no well-informed person, that at and for some time prior to February 12, 1873, when the further coinage of standard silver dollars was prohibited by law, that the coins were at a premium of about 3 per cent over gold; in truth, this fact is relied upon by gold-standard advocates as an argument against bimetallism. It is also a fact that at the very date of this demonetization act of February 12, 1873, the United States had successfully resumed the free and unlimited coinage of silver dollars, which had almost ceased during the war and for some years thereafter.

The report of the Director of the Mint for 1895, on page 273, shows that in 1871 there were coined of standard silver dollars $1,115,700, and in 1872, $1,106,450, and in the month and twelve days of 1873 ending February 12, $293,600. These facts to a plain man of common understanding would seem to be evidence that the free coinage of silver ought not to have been disturbed when it was in successful operation, especially as the law by which it was done is strongly suspected, if not proven, to have been tainted with fraud of the basest character. [Applause.]

It is contended by those who are opposed to the free coinage of silver that the general decline of prices has not been caused by the demonetization of silver and the correlative appreciation of gold.

In the discussion of this identical measure in the Senate this position was taken. A Senator, in his remarks, asked the question:

What evidence has been adduced by a single advocate of the free-coinage measure to show that prices have declined because of the so-called demonetization of silver, and that gold has appreciated, which is the correlative of the decline of prices in gold? None that I have been able to discover, except that the price of silver itself has declined nearly pari passu with that of the staple commodities with which it is compared.

Secretary Carlisle, in his Memphis speech, which I have heretofore alluded to, also assumed this position, although he did not go to the full length of asserting that the discontinuance of the use of silver had caused no appreciation in the price of gold and no effect upon prices.

While there are perhaps few phases of this subject of finance that are capable of clear mathematical demonstration, yet there are some things connected with it about which we may be reasonably certain by means of observation, experience, and the concurring opinions of those in the best position to get at the truth. Now, to my mind, as a plain man and a practical one, and in a small way a man of affairs and business, there is a vast multitude of circumstances tending to prove that the general fall of prices which has occurred since about 1873 has been caused to a great extent by the demonetization of silver in this country and in Germany and the consequent measurement of all values by the amount of gold in existence. I am supported in my view of this by many eminent authorities. Mr. Robert Giffen, the statistician of the London Board of Trade, is perhaps the ablest as he certainly is one of the bitterest enemies of bimetallism. From his book entitled The Case Against Bimetallism, printed in London, 1895, I desire to submit the following extracts:

Holding, myself, the view that there is "a" relation between the quantity of the precious metals and prices, I have been frequently claimed by bimetallists as going a long way with them. I avail myself, therefore, of the present opportunity to give an answer as to how the question of the ratio of exchange between the precious metals and other commodities is fixed. I hold most fully to the view that it is fixed in no other way than is any other ratio, viz, by the supply and demand, and by the cost of production of the last margin of supply necessary to meet the last margin of demand. * * *

The demand for non-monetary purposes on the annual production is also preponderant in the case of gold, and very large in the case of silver. About two-thirds of the gold annually produced is taken for the arts; and if the consumption of India is included, as being either for simple hoarding or for the arts, and in no case for the purpose of circulating money, then the demand for gold for non-monetary purposes appears almost equal to the entire annual production. * * *

Equally with the stock of precious metals for purely non-monetary uses, the stocks of the precious metals hoarded are very large. The military and quasi-military chests of military Governments like France, Germany, and Russia, the accumulations of the precious metals in these countries, far beyond any strict requirement of monetary circulation, are enormous. The United States again has accumulated both gold and silver in its Government vaults far beyond any ordinary monetary necessity. There are large private hoards besides all over the world, but especially in India, where both gold and silver are largely hoarded. Whatever the motives may be which determine these hoards the hoards themselves are not money in circulation in any form, and the supply of these demands is not a supply of "money," which can help to make any such relation between the quantity of money and prices as the quantitative theory of money, and with it the bimetallic theory, assume. (Pages 82, 85, 87, and 88.)

We see, then, how largely mistaken these monometallists have been who, in their dislike of bimetallism, have denied that the recent great demands for gold in proportion to its supply were likely to have caused a rise in its exchange value for other things. Looked at in this way, the fall of prices is in itself a proof that gold, in relation to all demands for it, has been relatively scarcer than it was.

Everybody who has wanted it has had to give more for it. If everybody who wanted coal or pig iron was giving more for it than before, we should not hesitate to say that coal and pig iron were relatively more in demand than they had been; and what we should say of coal and pig iron we must also say of gold or silver in a like case. * * *

Some monometallists, as we have already hinted, have given a great advantage to their opponents by denying altogether the necessary connection between a fall in general prices and a relative scarcity or short supply of gold, which they have foolishly done on the score of gold in the form of currency being abundant enough. (Pages 219 and 221.)

This is one of a multitude of authorities to the same purport which might be produced if time permitted. That we are living in an era of falling prices and general depression of a majority of the interests of the whole people of the United States will, I think, be admitted by every observant and well-informed person who is honest enough to tell the truth. The great producing classes of agricultural products, including the landowners as well as the tenants and laborers who perform the manual labor, are not prosperous. There is no thrift, no enterprise. The people who have considerable sums of money are unwilling to let it out, except upon the most overwhelming and ironclad security. They are afraid to invest it in any kind of property on account of the general continuous shrinkage of values.

The result is stagnation, labor unable to procure employment, landowners unable to make any profit by the most economical and industrious management. This should not be so. The United States has a territory the richest on the earth; a population for industry, enterprise, intellect, courage, and morals unsurpassed by any upon the globe, if indeed it could be equaled by selections from all other nations.

A benign providence has blessed the toil of the husbandman with abundant harvests, and while there is no lack of food and raiment, there are hundreds of thousands of honest people unable to procure the bare necessaries of life in a sufficient amount, and that without any fault of their own. This evidences that there is something wrong in our condition. My belief, and in my opinion the belief of more than half of the people of the United States, is that the present source of our trouble is that we are on the gold standard; one-half of our metallic money, although in use and circulating as token money, is denied at the Treasury of the Government which coined it the full measure of its legal-tender qualities. And I will add that this is done not only without warrant of law, but in absolute defiance of law, under the paltry, miserable pretense of keeping up a parity between gold and silver.

Mr. Speaker, I charge, and I make the charge with all earnestness and with a full sense of my responsibility, that all this cry for sound money and for a single standard and all this opposition to the coinage of silver dollars upon any ratio is directly in the interest of the holders of the $749,000,000 of outstanding United States bonds and of the holders of the hundred million to be now issued immediately under the recent bidding. These bonds, according to law and according to the contract written or printed in the face of each bond, are payable in coin of the United States of the standard value of July, 1870, which included standard silver dollars as fully as gold coins. No man will deny this, because it is a matter of record and a matter of law. Five hundred and fifty-nine millions of the bonds mature in 1907, one hundred millions in 1904, and one hundred and sixty-two millions in 1925.

The holders of these bonds are now getting the interest in gold without any warrant of law. They desire to get this country firmly anchored to a gold standard in order that the principal of all the bonds may be payable in gold. These bonds constitute a mortgage upon the property, the energy, the industry, and the toil of the entire people of this country for the next thirty years, and it will be utterly impossible for us and our posterity to pay them in that time.

As touching upon the subject of these bonds, and as touching the subject of a gold standard and the theory that all the Government obligations must be paid in gold alone, I desire to have read from the Clerk's desk a concurrent resolution introduced in the Senate of the United States by the Hon. Stanley Matthews, a Senator from Ohio, on the 6th day of December, 1877.

This resolution was considered by the Senate, and thereafter, on the 25th day of January, 1878, adopted by a yea-and-nay vote of the Senate—42 yeas and 20 nays, not voting 14.

This same concurrent resolution was adopted in the House of Representatives January 28, 1878, by a yea-and-nay vote—180 yeas and 79 nays.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. MATTHEWS. I submit the concurrent resolution with a view of having it read for the information of the Senate and laid upon the table to be printed.

The resolution was read, as follows:

"Whereas by the act entitled 'An act to strengthen the public credit,' approved March 18, 1869, it was provided and declared that the faith of the United States was thereby solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of such obligations had expressly provided that the same might be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold or silver; and

"Whereas all the bonds of the United States authorized to be issued by the act entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt,' approved July 14, 1870, by the terms of said act were declared to be redeemable in coin of the then present standard value, bearing interest payable semi-annually in such coin; and

"Whereas all bonds of the United States authorized to be issued under the act entitled 'An act to provide for the resumption of specie payment,' approved January 14, 1875, are required to be of the description of bonds of the United States described in the said act of Congress approved July 14, 1870, entitled 'An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt'; and

"Whereas at the date of the passage of said act of Congress last aforesaid, to wit, the 14th of July, 1870, the coin of the United States of standard value of that date included silver dollars of the weight of 412½ grains each, as declared by the act approved January 18, 1837, entitled 'An act supplementary to the act entitled "An act establishing a mint and regulating the coins of the United States,"' to be a legal tender of payment according to their nominal value for any sums whatever: Therefore

"Be it resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That all the bonds of the United States issued or authorized to be issued under the said acts of Congress hereinbefore recited are payable, principal and interest, at the option of the Government of the United States in silver dollars of the coinage of the United States containing 412½ grains each of standard silver; and that to restore to its coinage such silver coins as a legal tender in payment of said bonds, principal and interest, is not in violation of the public faith nor in derogation of the rights of the public creditor."

Mr. NEILL. I ask the Clerk to read the yea-and-nay vote upon the adoption of this concurrent resolution in the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

YEAS—42.

Allison,	Davis, Ill.	Jones, Fla.	Plumb,
Armstrong,	Davis, W. Va.	Jones, Nev.	Ransom,
Bailey,	Dennis,	Kirkwood,	Saulsbury,
Beck,	Dorsey,	McCreery,	Saunders,
Booth,	Eustis,	McDonald,	Spencer,
Bruce,	Ferry,	McMillan,	Teller,
Cameron, Pa.	Gordon,	Matthews,	Thurman,
Cameron, Wis.	Grover,	Maxey,	Voorhees,
Chaffee,	Hereford,	Merrimon,	Wallace.
Coke,	Howe,	Morgan,
Conover,	Johnston,	Oglesby,

NAYS—20.

Anthony,	Christiancy,	Hamlin,	Paddock,
Barnum,	Conkling,	Kernan,	Rollins,
Bayard,	Dawes,	Lamar,	Sargent,
Blaine,	Eaton,	Mitchell,	Wadleigh,
Burnside,	Edmunds,	Morrill,	Windom.

ABSENT—14.

Butler,	Hill,	McPherson,	Whyte,
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Patterson,	Withers.
Garland,	Ingalls,	Sharon,
Harris,	Kellogg,	Randolph,

Mr. NEILL. Mr. Speaker, I will not ask for the reading of the vote in the House of Representatives upon this concurrent resolution, but will state that on the 28th day of January, 1878, the resolution was agreed to in the House by a vote of 189 yeas to 79 nays; not voting, 24. Among the yeas there is the name of Carlisle, who, I think, is the same distinguished gentleman who now holds the portfolio of the Treasury, and who is so solicitous that the Government of these United States shall not pay any of its obligations in a money which he now considers inferior, to wit, silver. I also observe the name of Herbert, if I mistake not the same Herbert who now holds the portfolio of the Navy, and who has found it convenient during the past twelve months to absent himself from his post of duty and make stump speeches urging upon the people of this country their solemn duty, from his present standpoint, to pay all their governmental obligations in gold. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, as illustrative of the feeling of the people of this country upon the momentous question of the use of silver money in 1878, only eighteen years ago, I desire to read the following from the proceedings of the Senate on the 10th day of December, 1877. I read from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date. Mr. Matthews, a Senator from the State of Ohio, said:

Mr. President, the general assembly of the State of Ohio at its session last winter adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That common honesty to the taxpayers, the letter and the spirit of the contract under which the great bodies of its indebtedness was assumed by the United States, and true financial wisdom each and all demand the restoration of the silver dollar to its former rank as lawful money."

Continuing, Senator Matthews said:

This resolution was passed with great unanimity.

There were but three negative votes in the house of representatives and one in the senate, and I have no doubt it expresses the deliberate and considered public opinion of the people of that State with the same proportion among them as to unanimity as was evidenced by the vote of their representatives in the general assembly.

Mr. Speaker, in the course of debate in the Senate upon this concurrent resolution Senator Matthews further said:

* * * But my statement is, that gold has risen in value with all commodities and therefore with silver, and with silver only because it has risen in value with all commodities.

I have the testimony of my observation; I have the testimony in the list of bankruptcies which I read; I have the testimony in the list of sheriffs' sales I have noticed; I have the testimony of the prices to which real estate has sunk; and I could recount instances in that city which I believe to-day the soundest and most prosperous one on the continent, where business has been transacted the least on credit—I mean the city in which I live (Cincinnati)—where the depreciation in real estate and in every article of property other than gold itself has been actually unexampled. What else means all this cry of discontent? What else means all this half-suppressed murmur of dissatisfaction?

Do gentlemen suppose that people are crying out when they suffer no pain? Do they suppose that the voice of lamentation comes up from the homes and houses of the people merely that they may hear themselves shriek and cry? Or is it the truth and is it the fact that the distress of the country is beyond all historical comparison in our country and that to-day it will require but a few more turns of the wheel to submerge the majority of the body of the people into hopeless bankruptcy? So then, Mr. President, on any ground and in any view that I am able to take, if we restore the silver dollar to its former and accustomed place in our legislation, in our coinage, and in our currency, we are still paying the public debt and all private debts according to a large and a full and overflowing measure of value.

Mr. Speaker, who was Stanley Matthews? Was he a lunatic, an anarchist? No; he was a Senator from the great State of Ohio and died an honored member of the Supreme bench of the United States. With him, and his great colleague in the Senate at that time, was Allen G. Thurman, who heartily and warmly supported, spoke for, and voted for the resolution which I have had read. I will not take up the time of the House in commenting and calling particular attention to other great names whose support was lent to that resolution, many of them now historic. These men were talking and were acting at a time when the demonetization act of 1873 was fresh in the minds of the people, who were stirred to profoundest depths of indignation.

During that very session of Congress, on the 28th day of February, 1878, there was enacted into law over the veto of a Republican President the act commonly called the Bland-Allison Act, which restored to silver dollars their full legal-tender qualities and provided for a limited coinage of silver, which gave to the country in thirteen years something over $400,000,000 addition to its coinage, and gave very considerable relief to the monetary needs of the people, and in a measure alleviated the distress of which Senator Matthews spoke so graphically. But the Bland-Allison Act never was satisfactory to the gold bugs of the country, and when I use the term "gold bugs" now I mean those people who are directly interested from mercenary motives in the establishment and maintenance of a gold standard, and in 1890, during the life of a Republican Congress, these people were strong enough to secure the repeal of the Bland-Allison Act and the substitution therefor of the so-called Sherman silver-purchase act.

This act has been confessed upon the floor of the Senate to have been intended as a device to prevent the enactment of a law for the free coinage of silver. I refer in this directly to a statement made by the senior Senator from Ohio in the extraordinary session of 1893. There is no sort of doubt but that the Sherman law of 1890 was designed and intended, and that it did prevent the passage of a bill for the free coinage of silver. This view of the case was evidently in the minds of the majority of the national Democratic convention assembled at Chicago in June, 1892, when that convention in section 7 of the platform adopted used this language:

> We denounce the Republican legislation known as the Sherman Act of 1890 as a cowardly makeshift, fraught with possibilities of danger in the future, and which should make all of its supporters as well as its author anxious for its speedy repeal. We hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and to the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either or charge for mintage.

Was that declaration, solemnly made, and upon the faith of which the present Administration came into power, and without which it could not, in my opinion, have been elected, a delusion and a snare?

We shall see, and history will record the facts.

It is certain that the majority of Democrats in Arkansas have been terribly disappointed in the nonfulfillment of their understanding of that declaration, dispirited and discouraged. They had followed the flag of their party with a fidelity as unselfish and a devotion as pure as that which inspired the patriot fathers in their struggle for liberation from the British yoke in the war of the Revolution.

Having but few Federal offices located within their territory, their expectations of Federal patronage were necessarily small. They were not contending for pelf and power, but from love of principle and pride of party.

They had been educated by the men in whom they trusted into the belief that the system of coinage authorized by the Constitution and adopted by Hamilton and Jefferson in the days of Washington, and pursued and amplified under the Administration of the immortal Andrew Jackson, was a tenet of Democracy. To have one of their cherished doctrinal beliefs and traditions, inherited from a past century, and endeared by the history of a glorious past, rudely thrust aside, nay, even trampled upon, by an Administration which they had found in obscurity and by their generous suffrages helped to elevate to power, has been to them indeed a draught of the bitter waters of Marah.

In my opinion they will still adhere to principle and to the doctrines and usages of Democracy as taught by the fathers of the party, but it is almost certain that they will not longer consent to be dominated by a faction whose sole aim seems to be to fasten this country to a system of finance imported from monarchical Europe, and which will surely result in the ruin and financial enslavement of the masses and their children and children's children through untold generations.

It is, in my opinion as an humble member of the party in whose ranks I have toiled so long, a time for plain speaking. It may be that my candor will cost me my political life; if so, so be it. I am no better than the rank and file of my party. In the first remarks I ever had the honor of submitting on this floor, in February, 1894, I said to my fellow-Democrats that, in my judgment, our grand old party was perilously near to shoals and breakers. I was not a prophet or the son of a prophet, yet it seemed to me the danger was apparent—the elections in November, 1894, proved it to be so.

Mr. Speaker, I shall vote to concur in the Senate amendment for two other reasons, namely, if the amended bill is enacted into law it will compel the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem legal tenders and Treasury notes in standard silver dollars without giving any option to the note holder. In the next place it will to some extent, even though slight, curtail the power of the national banks, which I regard as the enemies of the human race. I have not time to amplify upon this part of this subject. Let us, fellow-Representatives, do our duty in the premises without regard to any probable or prospective Executive action. The issue is upon us now; it may be shirked, but it will not down. Seventy millions of people are interested in the result; the right will in the end prevail.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By the order of the House a recess was to be taken at 10.30 p. m. until half past 10 o'clock to-morrow. Unless objection is made, the Chair will assume that consent is given that the recess be taken now.

There was no objection; and the House accordingly (at 10 o'clock p. m.) took a recess until 10.30 a. m. on Friday.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examinations and survey for location of dams Nos. 2, 3, 4, and 5 of the Ohio River series—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Commissioner of Labor, replying to the House resolution of the 4th instant, relating to the efficiency of employees in certain Executive Departments—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for engraving on copper a map of the United States—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of Agriculture, replying to the House resolution of the 4th instant, relating to the efficiency of employees in certain Executive Departments—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 6) constituting Syracuse, N. Y., a port of delivery, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 264); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HULICK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3279) to authorize the reassessment of water-main taxes in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 265); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BENNETT, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4779) relating to the anchorage and movements of vessels in St. Marys River, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 266); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. PENDLETON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred House bill No. 3342, reported in lieu thereof a bill (H. R. 5641) to grant to railroad companies in the Indian Territory additional powers to secure depot grounds, accompanied by a report (No. 267); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MINOR of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2662) to provide for the adjudication of the claim of the Fond du Lac band of Chippewa Indians arising upon the failure of certain treaty stipulations, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 268); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. EVANS, from the Committee on Ways and Means, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4580) to amend section 3449 of the Revised Statutes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 281); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. HANLY, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 4763) for the relief of W. H. Ferguson, administrator of Thomas H. Millsaps. (Report No. 269.)

By Mr. BLACK of Georgia, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (H. R. 5083) granting an increase of pension to A. H. McLaws. (Report No. 270.)

By Mr. HARDY, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (H. R. 2605) granting pension to Henry V. Andrews, of Fulton County, Ill., a survivor of the Black Hawk war. (Report No. 271.)

By Mr. COFFIN, from the Committee on Pensions: The bill (H. R. 3749) to increase the pension of Mrs. Eunice Ida Rhoades. (Report No. 272.)

By Mr. SULLOWAY, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 4968) granting a pension to Helen A. Jackman, dependent daughter of Lieut. William Jackman, late of Company I, Fourteenth Regiment of Maine Volunteers. (Report No. 273).

By Mr. MILES, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 5140) for the relief of Michael H. J. Crouch, late of Company M, Sixth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavalry. (Report No. 274.)

By Mr. ANDERSON, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 4606) to grant an increase of pension to Mary B. Houk. (Report No. 275).

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 4265) granting a pension to Eliza Wilson. (Report No. 276).

By Mr. ANDREWS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 1181) for the relief of Maria E. Wilson. (Report No. 277.)

By Mr. KERR, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 2621) to increase the pension of Jane Webster, widow of Joel Webster. (Report No. 278.)

By Mr. WOOD, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 1634) to grant pension to William F. Good, Company L, Tenth Indiana Cavalry Volunteers. (Report No. 279.)

By Mr. KIRKPATRICK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (H. R. 2234) granting a pension to Joseph A. Cooper. (Report No. 280.)

By Mr. PICKLER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (S. 507) to pension Mollie Crandall. (Report No. 282.)

By Mr. POOLE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions: The bill (S. 344) granting a pension to Mary A. Hall. (Report No. 283.)

By Mr. HANLY, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 1256) for the relief of Henry A. Webb. (Report No. 284.)

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. FLYNN: A bill (H. R. 5633) to incorporate the Most Worshipful Grand Lodge of Ancient Free and Accepted Masons of Indian Territory—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. EVANS: A bill (H. R. 5634) providing for the withdrawal of distilled spirits from bonded warehouses by the distiller or owner, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BROSIUS: A bill (H. R. 5635) to amend section 1754 of Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to preferences in the civil service—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. LIVINGSTON: A bill (H. R. 5636) for the erection of a public building at Atlanta, Ga.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. FLYNN: A bill (H. R. 5637) for the relief of settlers on certain lands in Oklahoma—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. PHILLIPS: A bill (H. R. 5638) to grant 2 condemned cannon and 50 cannon balls to A. G. Reed Post, No. 105, Grand Army of the Republic, of Butler, Pa.—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. JOHNSON of California: A bill (H. R. 5639) to amend section 711 of the Revised Statutes of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. ACHESON: A bill (H. R. 5640) disposing of 4 condemned cannon and 24 cannon balls—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COBB of Missouri (by request): A bill (H. R. 5641) to provide for the retirement of the Treasury notes issued in payment of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," to provide for the coinage of the silver bullion purchased under the provisions of said act, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. McEWAN: A bill (H. R. 5642) to insure creditors of corporations in the collection of their claims—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HITT: A bill (H. R. 5674) authorizing Rear-Admiral W. A. Kirkland, United States Navy, to accept the gold box presented to him by the Emperor of Germany—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. TRELOAR: A bill (H. R. 5675) authorizing the construction of a wagon and motor bridge over the Missouri River at St. Charles, Mo.—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. HULL: A bill (H. R. 5676) to extend the provisions of an act to provide for the muster and pay of certain officers and enlisted men of the volunteer forces—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BARRETT: A joint resolution (H. Res. 109) to provide for an investigation to determine a location for the Naval Academy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills, which were referred as follows:

The bill (H. R. 1076) for the relief of George T. Vance and Guy P. Vance, executors of William L. Vance, deceased—Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

The bill (H. R. 1143) for the relief of Miriam Goodloe, widow, and Laura Blinn, Richard V. Goodloe, and Joseph A. Goodloe, children, and James H. Goodloe and Mrs. Fannie Hough, grandchildren of James Goodloe, deceased—Committee on Claims discharged, and referred to the Committee on War Claims.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills of the following titles were presented and referred as follows:

By Mr. APSLEY: A bill (H. R. 5643) granting a pension to Charles A. Hunter—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BAKER of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 5644) granting a pension to Augustus Witte—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5645) for the relief of James W. Wilmot—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURTON of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 5646) granting a pension to Frances M. Roberts—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 5647) for the relief of Mrs. Magdelena Eitel—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 5648) granting a pension to John A. Link—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5649) granting a pension to Henry H. Taylor, of Burlingame, Kans.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5650) for the relief of Solomon F. Brown, of Topeka, Kans.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DAYTON: A bill (H. R. 5651) for the relief of James V. Moore—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DOVENER: A bill (H. R. 5652) granting relief to the heirs of the late J. M. Doddridge, of Wheeling, W. Va.—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina: A bill (H. R. 5653) for the relief of Mrs. Jane A. Sanders, widow of Edward W. Sanders, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FAIRCHILD: A bill (H. R. 5654) for the relief of Catharine Taylor—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HICKS: A bill (H. R. 5655) to increase the pension of William H. McClelland—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HENDRICK: A bill (H. R. 5656) for the relief of Hugh M. Henson—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5657) for the relief of Hugh M. Henson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McCALL of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 5658) for relief of Henry Runnebaum—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5659) for relief of John Wade—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5660) for relief of Thomas M. Wadley—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McCLURE: A bill (H. R. 5661) to increase the pension of Anna E. Botsford, widow of Eli W. Botsford, late major of Sixteenth Regiment Ohio Volunteers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OTEY: A bill (H. R. 5662) for the relief of W. T. Fitzpatrick, Bedford City, Va.—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. PHILLIPS: A bill (H. R. 5663) granting an increase of pension to Joseph E. McCabe, late sergeant Company A, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5664) granting a pension to Elizabeth Martin—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. REED: A bill (H. R. 5665) granting a pension to Henry F. Rice—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SPERRY: A bill (H. R. 5666) granting a pension to John A. Hopkins—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. TUCKER: A bill (H. R. 5667) granting a pension to Mrs. Maria B. Brinton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TURNER of Virginia: A bill (H. R. 5668) for the relief of Miss E. A. Lewis—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WOOD: A bill (H. R. 5669) to increase the pension of Salem Rice—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5670) to increase the pension of Richard S. Phillips—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5671) to remove the charge of desertion against Elisha K. White and grant him an honorable discharge—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GILLET of New York: A bill (H. R. 5673) removing the charge of desertion from the military record of Albert H. Hamlin—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ACHESON: Petition of H. A. Carr and 47 other citizens of Flatwoods, Fayette County, Pa., praying for the passage of the Stone immigration bill—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. CATCHINGS: Memorial of the National Board of Trade, praying for the establishment of reciprocal trade relations, especially with Canada, Mexico, and the States of Central and South America—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of the National Board of Trade, urging the passage of the Patterson bill, to prevent unjust discrimination in freight rates, without amendments—to the Committee on Railways and Canals.

Also, memorial of the National Board of Trade, favoring aid in the construction of the Nicaragua Canal—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial of the National Board of Trade, praying for the continuation of the improvement of the Mississippi and Ohio rivers and their navigable tributaries—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. CURTIS of Kansas: Petitions of citizens of Delphos, Concordia, and Glasco, Kans., to prohibit the issuance of liquor licenses except to those who hold a permit issued by virtue of the laws of Kansas, so far as that State is concerned—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. DALZELL: Petitions of the Structural Iron Workers' Protective Union, of Pittsburg, Pa., and the Blacksmith Workers' Union, of McKeesport, Pa., in favor of a bill to regulate the manning of vessels on the Great Lakes—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. DANFORD: Petition of David Lentz and others, of Antioch, Ohio, and vicinity, praying for the passage of the service-pension bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of J. V. McMaster and others, of Demos, Ohio, asking for the passage of the Stone immigration bill—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. ELLIS: Memorial of the Commercial Club, of Vancouver, Wash., asking an appropriation for the improvement of the Columbia River between Vancouver and the mouth of the Willamette River—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. FLETCHER: Petition of John Blanchard and 68 others, of Minneapolis, Minn., favoring the Stone immigration bill—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. FLYNN: Petition of 5,000 settlers in Oklahoma, praying for the passage of the free-home bill—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 4091—to the Committee on Claims.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 5596—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GILLET of New York: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Hornellsville, North Hector, Southport, Canisteo, Buena Vista, Havana, Reading Center, Odessa, and Wellsburg, all of the State of New York, in favor of the suppression of the sale of beer and spirituous liquors at Ellis Island, Bedloes Island, and Fort Wadsworth, N. Y.—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, petition of T. S. Card and 79 citizens of Corning, N. Y., in favor of a bill to restrict immigration—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

Also, petition of H. P. Burdick and others, of Hornellsville and Hartsville, N. Y., against the Sunday-observance bill (H. R. 167)—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. HICKS: Petition of George W. Page, A. M. Snyder, P. F. Custer, and 45 others, of Mineral Point and Vinco, Pa., praying for the passage of the William A. Stone bill, restricting immigration—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. HITT: Petition of Charles J. Kinnie and 51 others, of Rockford, Ill., urging an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting any law, State or national, respecting an establishment of religion or the use of public moneys in support thereof—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HOOKER: Petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Allentown, Fredonia, and Frewsburg, N. Y., against the sale of beer at Bedloes Island, and Fort Wadsworth, on Staten Island, and at Ellis Island, N. Y.—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. HUFF: Petition of Blair County Union ex-Prisoners of War Association, of Altoona, Pa., in favor of the passage of House bill No. 306, providing pensions for soldiers and sailors who were prisoners during the late rebellion—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HULICK: Petition of David Mering and 14 other ex-soldiers of Springboro, Ohio, and vicinity, for the enactment of the service-pension bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HULL: Petition of S. J. Loughran and 76 other citizens of Des Moines, Iowa, asking that no money be appropriated for private or sectarian purposes—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. HURLEY: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Brooklyn, N. Y., to forbid the sale of beer to immigrants at Ellis Island—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. LACEY: Petitions of F. M. Davis and 28 others, H. Barrett and 24 others, J. C. Mathis and 23 others, all citizens of Oklahoma, for free homes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. LAWSON: Petition of certain colored citizens of Georgia, for aid from the United States to facilitate their emigration to Liberia—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. MAHANY: Memorial of the East Buffalo Live Stock Association, to remove unnecessary restrictions from the foreign live-stock trade—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota: Petition of J. O. Larson and other voters of Round Lake, Minn., against Sunday-observance bill (H. R. 167)—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. McLACHLAN: Petition of the Los Angeles County Association, Union ex-Prisoners of War, favoring the passage of House bill No. 306, relating to the granting of pensions to soldiers and sailors who were confined in Confederate prisons—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of American seamen on the Pacific Coast, protesting against the repeal of the act of Congress approved February 18, 1895—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, petition of C. P. Nance & Son, E. F. Rogers, and others, of San Lucas, Cal., for the construction of the Nicaragua Canal by the United States—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. PHILLIPS: Papers to accompany a bill granting a pension to Elizabeth Martin—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany a bill granting an increase of pension to Joseph E. McCabe, late sergeant, Company A, Seventeenth Pennsylvania Cavalry—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany a bill to grant 2 condemned cannons and 50 cannon balls to H. G. Reed Post, No. 105, Grand Army of the Republic, of Butler, Pa.—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. RAY: Resolution of Watrous Post, No. 30, Grand Army of the Republic, of Binghamton, N. Y., favoring the independence of Cuba—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, petitions of officers of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Campville and Tioga County, N. Y., for a measure to prohibit the sale of beer at Bedloes Island, Fort Wadsworth, and Ellis Island—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut: Petitions from chapters of the Daughters of the American Revolution in Bridgeport, Stamford, and Berlin, Conn., and from citizens of Middletown, Montville, New London, and Groton, Conn., and from the president and officers of Yale University, and the president and officers of Wesleyan University, containing 439 names, all forwarded through Anna Warner Bailey Chapter, Daughters of the American Revolution, of Groton and Stonington, Conn., in favor of the acquirement of additional plats of ground contiguous to the Fort Griswold property, in order to preserve and protect that Revolutionary site—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TRACEWELL: Resolutions adopted by the Indianapolis Board of Trade, requesting the passage of House bill No. 3212, to secure a better foreign market for grain and other agricultural products of the United States—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, resolutions of the Merchants and Manufacturers' Club of Madison, Ind., asking for an appropriation of $25,000 for dredging and otherwise improving the Ohio River at that point—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. TRELOAR: Papers to accompany bill for the relief of David Gibson—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH: Petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Albion, Nunda, Elba, Corfu, and Bergen, N. Y., in the regard to the sale of beer to immigrants at Bedloes Island and Fort Wadsworth, and at Ellis Island, N. Y.—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. WILBER: Petifion of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Schenectady, Richmondville, Rockton, and Amsterdam, N. Y., in regard to the sale of beer to immigrants at Bedloes Island, Fort Wadsworth. and Ellis Island, N. Y.—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 7, 1896.

Prayer by Rev. HUGH JOHNSTON, D. D., of the city of Washington.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

The Secretary (Hon. W. R. Cox) called the Senate to order and read the following communication:

VICE-PRESIDENT'S CHAMBER, Washington, February 7, 1896.

SIR: It will be impossible for me to be present at the opening of the Senate this morning. You will, therefore, please call the Senate to order, as required by law.

Very respectfully, A. E. STEVENSON.

Hon. W. R. COX,
Secretary United States Senate.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Secretary, I offer the following resolve, upon which I ask immediate action:

Resolved, That the Senate now proceed to elect a President pro tempore of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. The question is on the adoption of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Maine.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Secretary, I also offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Secretary read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That WILLIAM P. FRYE, a Senator from the State of Maine, be, and he hereby is, elected President pro tempore of the Senate, to hold office during the pleasure of the Senate, and in accordance with the resolution of the Senate adopted on the 12th day of March, 1890, on the subject.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Secretary, I have been instructed by the unanimous vote of the Democratic Senators on this side of the Chamber to present the name of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, Hon. ISHAM G. HARRIS, whom the Democrats when they had control of the body honored by electing as President pro tempore of the Senate, and upon whom the Senate further conferred the honor of not permitting any other name to be presented in opposition to him. That was done in accordance with the precedent which has grown up in the last few years, so as to avoid even the appearance of a scramble for that high position, but to accord it to the majority of the body, as was also done in the case of the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Manderson, and the distinguished Senator from Kansas, Mr. Ingalls. The Senator from Tennessee, appreciating as a matter of course the compliment that his colleagues on this side of the Senate had paid him, has requested me, in view of the precedents, not to present his name, and it is only because of his desire and request that I fail to carry out the direction of the Democrats of the Chamber.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Secretary, I avail myself of this occasion to tender my profound thanks to the Democratic Senators for the honor they did me in nominating me for reelection, my term of office as President pro tempore of the Senate having expired with my then Senatorial term on the 4th of March last.

As already stated by my friend from Maryland, in March, 1891, the then senior Senator from the State of Nebraska, Mr. Manderson, was elected President pro tempore of the Senate without division and without a single dissenting vote. In March, 1893, the Senate honored me by electing me in the same manner. It is true, Mr. Secretary, that in 1891 there was a Republican majority in this body. It is equally true that in 1893 there was a Democratic majority here. It is also equally true that the Republicans lack one of having a majority of the whole body as the Senate is now constituted. But notwithstanding that fact, in order that there shall be not even the appearance of friction and in order that those kindly relations which should exist and be maintained between every Senator and the Presiding Officer of the body, my personal wish is that the distinguished Senator from Maine may be elected to that high position in the same manner that Senator Manderson was elected in 1891 and I in 1893.

This much I have deemed it proper to say.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Secretary, the Populist party, numbering six in this Chamber, concluded some time ago to present the name of the senior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE] to the Senate for the office of President pro tempore. But in view of the fact that there has been or is to be such a harmonious union between the Democratic and Republican parties in this Chamber, I do not know that it would be worth our while to present his name. We can certainly have no choice between the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE]. Either, we have confidence, would make a competent presiding officer, fair in his rulings. Therefore the Populist party, while holding to its determination to stand as a distinct party in this Chamber upon all vital matters, will not offer any resistance to the election of the honorable Senator from Maine.

The SECRETARY. The question is on the adoption of the resolution submitted by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE].

The resolution was agreed to nem. con.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. HARRIS] and the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] will conduct the President pro tempore-elect to the chair.

Mr. FRYE was escorted to the chair by Mr. HARRIS and Mr. HALE, and, the oath prescribed by law having been administered to him by the Secretary of the Senate, upon taking the chair as President pro tempore, he said:

Senators, I am profoundly grateful for this exceedingly generous expression of your confidence. I can only try to justify it by bringing to the discharge of the duties of the office to which you have elected me fidelity and strict impartiality. The Secretary will read the Journal of the last day's proceedings.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. HANSBROUGH, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That the Secretary wait upon the President of the United States and inform him that the Senate has elected WILLIAM P. FRYE, a Senator from the State of Maine, President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold and exercise the office in the absence of the Vice-President, from time to time, during the pleasure of the Senate, in accordance with the terms of its resolution passed March 12, 1890, and that he make a similar communication to the House of Representatives.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 5th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1450) to reconvene the delegates of the United States to the International Marine Conference of 1889.

The message also announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 285) for the relief of the Independence National Bank of Philadelphia, Pa.; and

An act (S. 650) to incorporate the Post Graduate School of Medicine of the District of Columbia.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that after the usual morning business on Monday morning I shall desire to address the Senate for a few moments upon the resolution now on the table in regard to the Monroe doctrine.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. NELSON presented the petition of George K. Shaw and sundry other citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Greene, Clark, and Clinton counties, all in the State of Ohio, and a petition of sundry citizens of Ohio, praying for an adequate duty on wool; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of 120 citizens of Bucyrus, Ohio, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a memorial of sundry lake shippers of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against placing obstructions to navigation in the Detroit River in the nature of bridge piers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Ministerial Association of Wooster, Ohio, and a petition of the Ministerial Association of Mansfield, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation in the interest of morality, etc.; which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I present a memorial of the Northeast Citizens' Suburban Association of the District of Columbia, relative to school facilities and the lighting and the grading of streets. I move that the memorial be printed as a document, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented the petition of Walter B. Cole and sundry other citizens of Detroit, Mich., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. CULLOM. I present two petitions of citizens of Wayne County, Ill., praying for the passage of House bill 3814, or the bill which I had the honor of introducing, in relation to the adjustment of swamp-land grants.

I also present a petition, in the form of resolutions, on the same subject of the board of supervisors of Wayne County, Ill., attested by the clerk. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KYLE presented the petition of Hon. Freeman Knowles and several hundred other citizens of Deadwood, S. Dak., praying that Congress may accord belligerent rights to the Cuban patriots; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DANIEL presented a petition of the American, English and Venezuelan Trading and Commercial Company, of Richmond, Va., praying for recognition by the State Department and for the restoration of their rights of mining, etc., in certain territory of Venezuela by virtue of a grant from the Venezuelan Government; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. PASCO presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Fernandina, Fla., praying that the improvement of Cumberland Sound and Fernandina Harbor be placed upon the list of permanent appropriations for rivers and harbors; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Florida Bankers' Association, praying for the establishment of a subtreasury of the United States at Savannah, Ga.; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BURROWS presented a memorial of 140 citizens of Watrousville, Mich., remonstrating against the appropriation of public moneys for sectarian purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Big Prairie, Mich., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WHITE presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., and a petition of the board of trustees of South Pasadena, Cal., praying for the speedy construction of the Nicaragua Canal under the control of the Government; which were referred to the Select Committee on the Construction of the Nicaragua Canal.

He also presented a petition of the Memorial Baptist Church of Los Angeles, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation granting protection to American citizens in Turkey, and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented petitions of the board of supervisors of Sacramento County, of the board of supervisors of Sierra County, of the board of supervisors of Sonoma County, and of the board of supervisors of Amador County, all in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation developing the mining industries of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BRICE presented a joint resolution of the legislature of Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation ceding certain lands to the State of Ohio; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Joint resolution No. 12. Requesting our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their influence in securing the passage of an act ceding certain lands to the State of Ohio.

Whereas the Ohio canal commission in the prosecution of its work of investigating the titles of State lands finds that section 7, town 6 south, range 4 east, Auglaize County, Ohio, is the property of the United States; and

Whereas said section 7 is wholly within the limits of the Mercer County reservoir, and therefore a part of the public works of Ohio, and any disposition of it to private parties or corporations would work great injustice to the public works of the State; and

Whereas the canal commission having made application to the Commissioner of the General Land Office for a patent to the land in the said section 7 under the swamp-land act of 1850, and said application having been rejected, and the application is now pending on an appeal before the Secretary of the Interior: Therefore

Be it resolved by the general assembly of the State of Ohio, That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to use their good offices in securing the passage of an act ceding the land in question to the State of Ohio, and that the governor be requested to forward to our Senators and Representatives of Ohio a certified copy of this resolution.

CHARLES H. BOSLER,
Speaker pro tempore of the House of Representatives.
ASAHEL W. JONES,
President of the Senate.

Adopted January 29, 1896.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Ohio:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Samuel M. Taylor, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is an exemplified copy, carefully compared by me with the original rolls now on file in this office, and in my official custody as secretary of state, as required by the laws of the State of Ohio, of a joint resolution passed by the general assembly of the State of Ohio on the 29th day of January, A. D. 1896.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto subscribed my name and affixed my official seal, at Columbus, this 29th day of January, A. D. 1896.

SAMUEL M. TAYLOR,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BRICE presented a petition of the Piqua Rolling Mill Company, of Piqua, Ohio, praying for the passage of the Torrey bankruptcy bill; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a memorial of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of a bureau of military education and to promote the adoption of a uniform military drill in the public schools of the several States and Territories; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented memorials of the Republic Iron Company, of Mitchell & Co., of Palmer & Co., of the Hawgood & Avery Transit Company, and of sundry vessel owners, all of Cleveland, Ohio, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation authorizing the construction of bridge piers in the Detroit River; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VILAS presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at a mass meeting of citizens of Pewaukee, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation granting protection to American citizens in Turkey and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. COCKRELL. In behalf of the bill (S. 172) for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, I present two petitions, one numerously signed by citizens of Jackson County, Mo., and the other by citizens of Howard County, Mo. I move that the petitions be referred to the Committee on Claims, to accompany that bill.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 789) for the relief of Kate Winter, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1493) granting a pension to Mary Clare Kelly, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 826) granting a pension to Caroline Reed, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1888) granting an increase of pension to William T. Walker, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 350) granting an increase of pension to George C. Abbey, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 2300) to incorporate the Supreme Council of the Thirty-third Degree of Scottish Rite Masonry for the Southern Jurisdiction of the United States, reported it without amendment.

Mr. WARREN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1962) for the erection of a public building at the city of Jamestown, N. Y., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 323) to amend an act entitled "An act to punish false swearing before trial boards of the Metropolitan police force and fire department of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1892, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1904) to regulate marriages in the District of Columbia, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the following bills, reported adversely thereon; and the bills were postponed indefinitely:

A bill (S. 912) to amend sections 720, 721, 722, and 723 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, in relation to marriages; and

A bill (S. 1514) to amend sections 720, 721, 722, and 723 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to the District of Columbia, in relation to marriages.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 474) fixing times when, regulating the manner in which, and declaring the character of the accounts between the United States and the several public-land States, relative to the net proceeds of the sales and other disposition of the public lands made and to be made therein by the United States, which shall hereafter be stated and certified to the Treasury Department for payment, to report it with amendments, and submit a report thereon. I ask that 1,000 extra copies of the report, which is very full, be printed for the use of the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BERRY. I desire to state that the Senator from Florida [Mr. PASCO], the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. VILAS], and myself, who are members of the Committee on Public Lands, do not agree to this report, but dissent from the report recommending the passage of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that 1,000 extra copies of the report may be printed for the use of the Committee on Public Lands. Is there objection? The Chair hears no objection, and that order will be made.

Mr. BRICE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 893) for the relief of Mrs. Mary B. Hulings, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 290) to carry into effect the findings of the Court of Claims in the cases of Edward N. Fish and others for supplies furnished the Indian service, to report it without amendment, and submit a report thereon. I supposed that I had made this report before, but I do not find it upon the Calendar, and therefore I assume that my recollection is at fault.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BACON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 990) to amend section 9 of an act entitled "An act to provide for the appointment of a sealer and assistant sealer of weights and measures in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DANIEL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3553) to incorporate the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, reported it with an amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1386) to incorporate the National Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was indefinitely postponed.

WHITE LOT AND MONUMENT GROUNDS.

Mr. GEAR. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. Res. 79) granting use of White Lot and Monument Grounds to "The Committee of 1896," to report it without amendment. I am also instructed by the committee to ask that immediate action be taken on the joint resolution. The title explains the meaning of the measure.

Mr. HARRIS. I hope the Senator from Iowa will not ask for present consideration. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] has given notice that after the routine business he desires to be heard, and I understand that an early adjournment is to be had to-day.

Mr. GEAR. I will say to the Senator from Tennessee that it will only take an instant. The joint resolution has passed the other House. It proposes to grant the Society of Christian Endeavor the use of the White Lot temporarily for their annual convention.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall interpose no objection.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee for a moment to the fact that this measure will at once go through, and I have one other bill that I desire to have put on its passage. Although we want an early adjournment to-day, by reason of the urgency of the case I must ask immediate consideration of that bill after this is disposed of or after the Senator from Nebraska has concluded. I shall be delighted to wait for him, for I am always glad to hear him; but I do hope the Senator will not prevent the unanimous consideration of such measures.

Mr. HARRIS. I shall interpose no objection. I merely wanted to suggest that where a Senator has given notice that at a particular time he desires to address the Senate the privilege is usually accorded to him. Hence I hope these requests will be delayed until after he concludes.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Ah, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GEAR. I also report back from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds the joint resolution (S. R. 25) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permits for the use of the White Lot and part of the Monument Grounds. The House joint resolution having been passed, I move that this joint resolution be indefinitely postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

LOCATION OF MINING CLAIMS IN COLORADO.

Mr. WOLCOTT. On behalf of my colleague [Mr. TELLER], who is unfortunately detained from the Chamber to-day by illness, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of House bill 4991, a very short bill, under circumstances of some urgency. It is a bill which has already passed the other House and which opens a forest reservation near Cripple Creek to the prospectors for the precious metals. The reservation was created at the request of the people of the county before the discovery of Cripple Creek, since which time there has been much prospecting going on there. The lines are unknown. The Committee on Public Lands of this body unanimously reported the bill favorably. It is desired by everybody and opposed by nobody. I have spoken to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who does not object to my asking the Senate for its immediate consideration at this time.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. HILL. Is it to facilitate the production of gold?

Mr. WOLCOTT. Very largely, and it will be of great service to the constituents of the Senator from New York and that sort of bimetallists who are under the impression that if we produce gold enough silver has no rights.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Colorado asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4991) to open forest reservations in the State of Colorado for the location of mining claims.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD FOR SENATE AND HOUSE LIBRARIES.

Mr. HALE. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a concurrent resolution submitted by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY], in relation to furnishing additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the Senate library, to report as a substitute for it a joint resolution directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 20 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution (S. R. 72) directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 20 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, etc., That section 73 of the act of January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing and binding, and the distribution of public documents, which reads: "To the Senate and House libraries, 10 copies each," be so amended as to read: "To the Senate and House libraries, 20 copies each."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 1992) to regulate appointments and promotions in the municipal government of the District of Columbia and in the offices of the recorder of deeds and the register of wills for said District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also introduced a bill (S. 1993) to increase the pension of George E. Tibbetts; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BERRY introduced a bill (S. 1994) authorizing the Arkansas Northwestern Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ALLEN introduced a bill (S. 1995) granting a pension to Hiram Daman; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GIBSON introduced a bill (S. 1996) amending the act of June 8, 1880, entitled "An act to authorize the President to appoint an officer of the Navy or the Marine Corps to perform the duties of solicitor and judge-advocate-general, etc., and to fix the rank and pay of such officer," and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 1997) granting an increase of pension to Maria E. Baker; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SHERMAN introduced a bill (S. 1998) to extend a patent of Joseph Zihlmann; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 1999) to provide for the observance of the 12th day of February as a national holiday; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2000) making appropriation for the payment of the French spoliation claims which have been adjudicated by the Court of Claims; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MCMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2001) authorizing the sale of title of the United States to certain tracts of land in the District of Columbia to Margaret Shugrue, Caroline Lochboehler, and John R. Scott; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 2002) for the relief of Arthur Connell; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ROACH (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2003) for the relief of James Gilfillan and John A. Rollings; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ELKINS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2004) to increase the efficiency of the infantry of the Army of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2005) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, approved July 16, 1894," amending the third proviso thereof; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 2006) for the relief of Newell A. Burrows; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WHITE introduced a bill (S. 2007) to authorize the United States Court of Private Land Claims to hear, try, and determine the issues as to the extent and boundaries of the Las Animas grant; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HAWLEY introduced a bill (S. 2008) granting a pension to Fanny Moale Gibbon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2009) to simplify the system of making sales in the Subsistence Department to officers and enlisted men of the Army; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BRICE introduced a bill (S. 2010) to remove the charge of desertion against Phillip Schaefer, late of Company K, Twenty-seventh Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2011) granting a pension to Nancy Whirley; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 2012) authorizing Isaac M. Mason and Webster M. Samuel and their associates to improve the channel of the Mississippi River between St. Louis and Cairo, Ill., and between Cairo, Ill., and Vicksburg, Miss., upon certain conditions and for certain considerations, to be paid by the United States, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. DANIEL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I desire to give notice that on Tuesday next, immediately after the disposal of the usual routine morning business, I will, by permission of the Senate, submit some remarks upon the resolution lying upon the table relating to the assertion and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desire to give notice that at 2 o'clock I shall move an adjournment of the Senate until Monday next. I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations with reference to the deficiency appropriation bill when that bill is likely to be taken up, and whether it will be convenient to fix some time when the consideration of the bill shall be proceeded with?

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has that bill in charge. It ought to be taken up on Monday next if we adjourn until Monday. It certainly should be taken up as soon as the matter we have now in hand is disposed of. I think it is not the intention to interfere with the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS].

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator from Idaho will allow me, I will move now that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DUBOIS. I wish the Senator from New Hampshire would allow me to make a statement.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is withdrawn.

Mr. DUBOIS. I think an arrangement has been made by which a vote can be had on my resolution at 2 o'clock. It will only take a few moments, and we had better dispose of it without further debate. I think it would be satisfactory to the Senate and better all around if we could dispose of that matter to-day, and it will only take ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. CHANDLER. If it can be agreed that the Senator's resolution shall be voted on at 2 o'clock without debate, of course I shall not move an adjournment until after that vote has been taken.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask unanimous consent that at 2 o'clock, without further debate, we shall proceed to vote on the resolution which has been under discussion.

Mr. ALLISON. Is it proposed that the resolution shall be taken up at this moment?

Mr. DUBOIS. Oh, no.

Mr. MILLS. The Senator from Idaho merely asks unanimous consent to set the time.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask unanimous consent that we shall agree to vote on the resolution at 2 o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. Simply upon the resolution?

Mr. DUBOIS. And the amendments.

Mr. ALLISON. Or any motion connected therewith. We do not want any misunderstanding again as to what will be in order at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HALE. I think perhaps that the Senator, instead of asking unanimous consent, may as well leave it to the general understanding there is that at that time there is to be no further debate, and that then we shall proceed to vote, without further debate, upon the resolution or any parliamentary motion connected with it.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well.

Mr. HALE. And not ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am perfectly content to leave it in that way.

Mr. ALLISON. I rose to ask the Senator from Idaho to allow the matter to go over for the present. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] and others interested in the question are not now in the Chamber.

Mr. DUBOIS. It has gone over in that way.

Mr. HARRIS. Is it the request that at 2 o'clock all debate shall close, but that unlimited amendments may be offered?

Mr. FAULKNER. The request has been withdrawn.

Mr. DUBOIS. The request has been withdrawn, I will say to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. The Senator does not understand that all amendments have been withdrawn?

Mr. DUBOIS. No; the request for unanimous consent has been withdrawn.

Mr. HARRIS. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. HILL. I suggest to the Senator from New Hampshire whether it would not be wiser to defer that motion until we see what is going to be done at 2 o'clock. I suggest that we do not now know what disposition will be made of the resolution at that time.

Mr. CHANDLER. On the suggestion of the Senator from New York, I will defer making the motion until after the vote is taken on the resolution of the Senator from Idaho, if a vote be taken at 2 o'clock.

Mr. HILL. That is right.

Mr. CHANDLER. If a vote be taken on the resolution I shall then move to adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. HILL. That is satisfactory.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senate will indulge me, I will again ask the Senator from Maine, who has charge of the deficiency appropriation bill, what his purposes are with reference to that bill? I will say to the Senator that that bill carries a very large deficiency, especially the deficiency with regard to the expenditures for the courts of the United States, and I desire to make some suggestions to the Senate when the bill is taken up in reference to those expenditures. Therefore I should like to know, if the Senator from Maine will oblige me by informing me, when he proposes to press the bill for consideration.

Mr. HALE. As the Senator has appealed to me with reference to the course which I intend to pursue upon the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, I will say that it is my intention, looking at the probabilities between now and that time, to ask the Senate to proceed to its consideration after the routine business on Monday; and I hope that then the Senate will make a speedy disposition of it. It will be followed by three other bills which the Committee on Appropriations have reported to this body.

I am glad to find that the Senator from New Hampshire has been looking into the subject of the large deficiencies in the Department of Justice for the courts, because it is a subject that has exceedingly pestered the Committee on Appropriations. The increasing deficiencies in that Department of the Government, as has been said before, arise largely from an imperfect method which has been followed in the other House of appropriating only a part of the year's appropriation in the regular annual bill, and that necessitates, of course, a deficiency to make up the lack. But aside from that, the deficiencies are increasing, and I hope that the fertile mind of the Senator from New Hampshire will evolve some proposition that will be not only a discussion and criticism of this condition, but a remedy for it. The Committee on Appropriations will welcome, I am sure, any suggestion in that line.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will only add that my remedy is ready, and that is, not to appropriate for the deficiencies.

Mr. HALE. That, of course, we will discuss and decide upon when we reach the bill. I will repeat, as it looks now as though other matters would be out of the way, and I have no doubt the Senate will adjourn over Saturday, that I propose to call up the urgent deficiency appropriation bill on Monday morning.

Mr. CALL. I desire to make a remark to the Senator from Maine who is in charge of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill. I am in receipt of a telegram from the marshal of the southern district of the State of Florida, stating that the court is in session at Jacksonville, with a large number of witnesses in attendance, with no money available to pay them, and that the immediate passage of the deficiency bill is needed for that purpose.

COLONIAL CHARTERS AND STATE CONSTITUTIONS.

Mr. QUAY. I offer a resolution for reference to the Committee on the Library, which provides, I will say in offering it, for an appropriation from the contingent fund of the Senate, and therefore it must ultimately go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate; but I especially desire to have it referred in the first instance to the Library Committee, in order to receive a report from that committee before it is referred to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

The resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on the Library, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library cause to be prepared a compilation of the colonial charters and constitutions of each State of the United States, together with all amendments thereto at any time in force, arranging the same in chronological order for each State, with suitable explanatory matter and indexes, and that the expense of said compilation be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. MORGAN submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That, when it may be so necessary, the chairman of the Committee on the Construction of the Nicaraguan Canal is authorized to employ a stenographer, whose compensation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

PROPOSED TARIFF RATES.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there be no further concurrent or other resolutions, the Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], coming over from a previous day, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the Senate an estimate of the probable increase of the revenue if the bill (H. R. 2749) to temporarily increase revenue, to meet the expenses of Government, and provide against a deficiency, should become a law.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask if the routine morning business is closed?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The routine morning business is closed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have two resolutions that have gone over under the rule, and I think must be now laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was just proceeding to lay resolutions before the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. My resolution has not been disposed of, and I am anxious to have it passed, so as to get the information it calls for. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] suggested that he intended to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution of the Senator from Nevada is now before the Senate.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. President——

Mr. ALLEN. May I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. STEWART. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I should like to ask the Senator from Nevada and also the Senator from New Hampshire to allow their resolutions to pass over temporarily until I make a few remarks, which will not exceed thirty minutes.

Mr. STEWART. I suppose my resolution in regard to the tariff bill can be passed in a minute. It has been waiting for a long time, and we ought to have the information at an early day.

Mr. ALLEN. My remarks will not take thirty minutes.

Mr. STEWART. If my resolution can be postponed by unanimous consent until the Senator concludes his remarks, I shall not object.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been very courteous to Senators in regard to my two resolutions. They are simply resolutions of inquiry, which will not provoke any discussion, and the committees are very desirous of getting the information they call for.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] asks unanimous consent that the resolution offered by him shall be laid over without prejudice.

Mr. STEWART. Until after the completion of the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, and then to be called up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without losing its place. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

PENSION STATISTICS.

Mr. GALLINGER. I now ask that my resolutions may be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a series of resolutions submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions submitted by Mr. GALLINGER February 4, 1896, as follows:

Whereas there are certain pension measures new pending before the Senate Committee on Pensions upon which such information as can be furnished by the Commissioner of Pensions should be placed at the disposal of Congress, and in order that there may be established from the records of the Pension Office some reliable estimate of the mortality rate of pensioners: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby directed to furnish the Senate, at the earliest possible moment, the statistics and information which the records of the Pension Office disclose, from the 1st day of July, 1895, to the 1st day of January, 1896, of invalid pensioners pensioned under the general law, showing the total number of names on the roll July 1, 1895, and January 1, 1896, and the number of deaths which have occurred during that period in each classification or grade of such pensions.

Second. The same information relative to pensions granted under the act of June 27, 1890.

Third. The same information relative to widow pensioners under each act, which latter shall include under a separate classification all extinctions of title for pensions from death, remarriage, or abandonment.

Fourth. The same information as regards dependent pensioners under each act except that of June 27, 1890.

Fifth. Statistics with regard to each class of pensioners under acts granting pensions to survivors and their widows under Mexican and Indian wars and the war of 1812.

Resolved further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby requested to furnish to the Senate, at the earliest possible moment, a statistical statement, showing the number of pension certificates issued during the six months ended January 1, 1896, classifying the same as originals of each class and reissues of each class, showing whether increases or reductions, increased pensions or any other classification usually observed, and also statistics showing the suspension and other stopping of pensions from causes other than deaths or extinction of title by remarriage, covering each class of pensions under each class of acts separately.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

CENSUS OF EX-SOLDIERS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], coming over from a former day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. GALLINGER February 6, 1896, as follows:

Whereas a proviso contained in section 17 of an act entitled "An act to provide for taking the Eleventh and subsequent censuses," approved March 1, 1889, reads as follows:

"Provided, however, That said Superintendent shall, under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, cause to be taken on a special schedule of inquiry, according to such form as he may prescribe, the names, organizations, and length of service of those who had served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the war of the rebellion, and who are survivors at the time of said inquiry, and the widows of soldiers, sailors, or marines"; and

Whereas the said section further provides that "the only volumes that shall be prepared and published in connection with said census shall relate to population and social statistics relating thereto, the products of manufactories, mining, and agriculture, mortality and vital statistics, valuation and public indebtedness, recorded indebtedness, and to statistics relating to railroad corporations, incorporated express, telegraph, and insurance companies, a list of the names, organizations, and length of service of surviving soldiers, sailors, and marines, and the widows of soldiers, sailors, and marines": Therefore

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate whether the schedule relating to the names, organizations, and length of service of those who had served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the war of the rebellion was prepared and the information required taken; and, if so, whether the said information was published as required by said section 17 of the act named, and, if not so published, the reasons for withholding said publication.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Nebraska yield to me?

Mr. ALLEN. Certainly.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to ask the consent of the Senate that the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds, and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins, be made the unfinished business for Monday next.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator from North Dakota will indulge me to make a short speech of about thirty minutes without interruption, I promise him that I shall never get in his road again, if it be possible to keep out of it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I simply want an order of the Senate, and I doubt if it will take more than a minute to decide the question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask that the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations with reference to the Monroe doctrine be laid before the Senate and read by title.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Do I understand the Senator from Nebraska declines to yield?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution by title.

The SECRETARY. A concurrent resolution reported by Mr. DAVIS from the Committee on Foreign Relations, January 20, 1896, relative to the assertion and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, December 2, 1823, James Monroe, then President of the United States, in a message to Congress, said:

> We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and the allied powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any part of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere, but with the governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them, or controlling in any other manner their destiny by European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States.

At the time these words were written the Holy Alliance was in existence. It was formed at Paris from September 14 to 26, 1815, between the Emperor of Russia, Alexander I; the Emperor of Austria, Francis I, and the King of Prussia, Frederick William III. It is said to have been the most remarkable attempt in history to control the policy of other governments. The Holy Alliance furnishes a valuable lesson to the student of political history. It was formed for the ostensible purpose of carrying the cross of Christ into every known European land, and was an alliance between the Greek, Catholic, and Protestant religions, though, strange enough, the Pope, the head of the Catholic Church, was not admitted to it.

Farseeing statesmen of that age knew that it had a deeper significance to Europe and the world than to merely force the gospel on those unwilling to receive it. Its real purpose was to extend the territorial dominion of the signatories and to subject weak and irresolute nations to its control; and it was especially aimed at the downfall of Napoleon Bonaparte, the brilliant son of Corsica, then in the zenith of his military glory and power, whose sun arose and set for the last time on the field of Waterloo in 1815.

Mr. President, it was this real purpose of the Holy Alliance that called forth President Monroe's message and induced him to declare that, while amicable relations existed between the United States and the Allied Powers, we would consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any part of the Western Hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. President Monroe foresaw with clear vision the great truth, then apparent to the wise men of that age, that if the Holy Alliance should accomplish its purpose it meant eventually the absorption of power in America and the reduction of every State on this continent to vassalage, and by that means it would weaken the power of the United States, if not result in its complete overthrow and final destruction. Nothing can be more truthful than the declaration that the slightest interference with the Goverments of this continent who had secured their independence by treaty or by the valor of their arms would directly interfere with the independence of the United States.

I make reference to the Holy Alliance only for the purpose of leading up to the scientific principles upon which the doctrine of national self-preservation is based.

It is my purpose to consider this doctrine as an original proposition, for I know of no other way in which it can be rightfully and intelligently considered. Senators who have preceded me on this subject have exhausted the written history of the question, some ascribing the doctrine to Washington, some to Jefferson, some to John Quincy Adams, some to James Monroe, and still others to Channing, the great English statesman and diplomatist.

Mr. President, I would not knowingly rob any man of the glory justly due him, much less an illustrious citizen, who, in life, served his country well and who died to the great regret and loss of his countrymen; but a doctrine as plain as that under discussion, and which is as old as government itself, arising out of and based on a prime necessity of all human government, ought not to be ascribed to any man, however exalted or illustrious he may have been, when it is the common property of the human race.

No nation has ever existed, and, indeed, none in the nature of things can exist, without adopting and applying in its foreign relations the doctrine of national self-preservation, generally ascribed to Monroe and known as the "Monroe doctrine." President Monroe is entitled to the credit of having first formulated this doctrine and given it to the world, as a ruler, in a message to his people, but there the credit must end. We observe this law manifest in all creation. The plant, when assailed by violence, even the violence of the wind, shrinks in self-preservation; the bird uses its wings in flight; the fish scurries to some hidden moss or to the fathomless depths of the pool. In the larger animals, where the instinct of self-preservation is frequently overborne by that of ferocity, the chances of battle are taken with doubtful results. Man, however, occupying the noble heights to which God has assigned him, possesses not only the animal instinct of self-preservation, but the intellect which foresees coming events and fortifies against danger.

A nation is an aggregation of human beings occupying a definite portion of the earth's surface, banded together by common interests and the necessity of self-preservation, each lending to all, and all to each, the assistance necessary to that end. From this relation, aided by reason, springs the known necessity of preserving the nation from the aggression of others, and anything which will have a tendency to deprive the nation of its territory, and therefore its independence, or to imperil its autonomy, and therefore its safety, is provided against by the law of national self-preservation, which is the aggregate or intensified form of individual self-preservation. From this source, and from none other, springs the doctrine embodied in President Monroe's message, which has been so frequently referred to in the debates on this floor.

Galileo, the Italian philosopher and mathematician, in the sixteenth century, made known to the world the diurnal motion of the earth, but it is not to be supposed that Senators would claim that the diurnal motion of the earth has not existed from the beginning of time and long before Galileo shed the light of his learning upon the world. It was the great truth, thus observed and classified by him, though it had existed from the beginning of time, that gave to the world day and night in regular order from the dawn of creation. As well might we ascribe the existence of this great truth to Galileo, as to say that President Monroe originated and applied for the first time the doctrine of national self-preservation.

Doctor Harvey, the eminent English anatomist, discovered the circulation of the blood in 1628, but Senators will not deny the fact of the circulation of blood from the time of man; for if it had not existed man could not have lived and performed the prodigies of labor and learning that have been performed by him in all ages.

Sir, at the same time Sir Isaac Newton, the celebrated English philosopher and mathematician, discovered the law of gravitation; but I presume that no one will claim that the law of gravitation has not existed from the foundation of the world and long before Newton opened his eyes to the scenes of this earth.

Mr. President, these great natural laws were in existence before Galileo, Harvey, and Newton classified and applied them. It remained for them to apply laws that are coexistent with creation itself. So we may say of the doctrine of national self-preservation; it has been applied from the foundation of human government to the present moment; it was applied in the struggles of Judea and Israel; it has been applied in every nation, civilized or barbarous, from the foundation of the world. It remained, however. for President Monroe to put this doctrine into tangible form and first apply it to the foreign relations of this country, and to that extent he is entitled to the credit of its application.

I took occasion in some remarks submitted in this Chamber a few days ago to speak of this doctrine as the law of self-defense. Perhaps the expression was not strictly accurate. I should have spoken of it as I speak of it now, as the law of national self-preservation; but, after all, as the law of self-defense is but the outward manifestation or execution of the law of self-preservation the expression was not far from the truth.

Mr. President, having stated my opinion of the principle upon which this law of necessity rests, and that it is indispensable to the maintenance of every form of government among men, the next question to be considered is, How shall it be applied? Is there any necessity for its application in the dispute between Great Britain and Venezuela?

Fraud, say the law writers, can not be defined with absolute accuracy. While it consists in the false representation by words or acts of some existing or supposed fact which is calculated to and does mislead to his injury the one upon whom it is practiced, yet just what facts will constitute fraud can not be determined in advance of its application. It is for the courts in the practical administration of the law to determine whether a given state of facts comes within the definition of fraud or not.

Mr. President, in like manner we are to determine the question of the application of the doctrine of national self-preservation. If the invasion of the South American Republics by Great Britain will endanger the welfare or menace the safety of this Government in any way, we should apply this doctrine and resent her action with all the strength and resources of a mighty nation. We must be the exclusive judges of when the doctrine is to be applied. We can not permit Great Britain, or any other foreign power, to determine when and to what extent the acquisition of territory on the Western Hemisphere will imperil our Government. The President of the United States, under a law passed by this Congress, has appointed a Commission of five eminent citizens who are to listen to the evidence to be submitted to them and make diligent inquiry for all information as respects the true line of demarcation between Venezuela and British Guiana.

When this Commission shall have reported it will be ample time for us to act. If we shall then determine that the action of Great Britain in acquiring terriory in Venezuela will imperil our Government by imperiling the rights of Venezuela, it will become our duty to marshal all the resources of our people to resist the threatened or actual invasion. If, on the other hand, we shall determine, after due investigation and deliberation, that our interests will not be imperiled, it will be our duty to abstain from any interference with the action of Great Britain. I feel confident, however, that the dispute over the boundary line between Venezuela and British Guiana is not for the primary purpose of obtaining territory, but for the purpose of gaining control of the Orinoco River, which leads into one of the richest portions of South America. Mr. President, if this be true, it will be our duty to repel the aggressive action of that nation.

It has been disputed here that the law of national self-preservation is a law of nations. Sir, it is of necessity the law of every nation, whether expressed in its fundamental law or in works on international law or not. As well might we dispute the law of individual self-preservation as to deny that the law of national self-preservation is a part of the law and being of every Government.

It is to be hoped that the people of Venezuela will not be overelated at the attitude this country has taken; it is to be hoped they will not be deceived by the language used in this Chamber; it is to be hoped that their conduct will be conservative, and that nothing will be said or done by them in consequence of the friendly spirit manifested toward them by this country that will lead to rash or inconsiderate action.

Mr. President, I do not deem it necessary to discuss the principles upon which this doctrine rests to any greater extent. It is not only a legal question, but it is a question of patriotism as well. It is not my purpose to indulge in useless jingoism. Extravagant expressions in times like these count for nothing; threats are useless; but if the time shall ever come when we are called upon to defend this doctrine, it must be done, no matter at what cost or at what sacrifice.

I would not encourage the feeling that England and America, the two greatest English-speaking peoples of earth, are to be needlessly thrown headlong into a mighty conflict for the supremacy of jurisdiction on this continent; but England should be given to understand in a manner that can not be mistaken that the honor and interests of our country will be preserved at all hazards and under all circumstances, even though it may take every man and exhaust all the resources of this nation to defend them.

The threatened demolition of England and the English institutions that we have heard in this Chamber is not real; there is no danger from foes without. We have simply been indulging in the harmless pastime of twisting the caudal appendage of the British lion to arouse a war spirit in the breasts of our people, and thus induce them to forget their grievances and their wrongs.

Mr. President, we mistake the temper of the American people. They know full well that there is no danger of our becoming involved in a war with England, or with any other foreign power. They do not seek war, and I can not condemn in too severe terms the lack of confidence in the sober judgment, the intelligence and patriotism, of the American people that has led at least one Senator in this Chamber to assert that a large portion of them would welcome war and bloodshed as a relief from their present conditions.

Sir, much eloquent denunciation of England and the English system of forcible colonization has been indulged in in this Chamber within the last few weeks, but they are as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals—

> Full of sound and fury,
> Signifying nothing.

Florid language has been used, and a willingness to die for the country has been expressed when there is not the slightest likelihood of being called upon to make the sacrifice, but these will not meet the situation nor solve the problem. We must meet this question in the serene and pure atmosphere of a cold philosophy that rises high above the dust and smoke and clouds of mere contending words. If, after we have tried this, the sky line is not visible; if the clouds of war should still gather and threaten to deluge our beloved country with blood, then let our eloquence speak from a thousand battle ships that skim the seas and ten thousand cannon that will wake the echoes of the world.

Mr. President, back of all this rises the vision of an oppressed, patient, toiling people, asking for relief; and while we have indulged here in empty phrase, their condition has been daily growing worse. Is it not the better part of valor, the higher and better part of statesmanship, to meet the just demands of a God-like humanity by giving our country relief; by giving to our people a greater volume of money; by making their toil more remunerative, their property more valuable? Shall we not awaken in their breasts a new hope, a new life, and a new energy by giving renewed activity to industry, and gladden their hearts by bringing to the wife and children of him who labors a smile of gladness and sunshine where the clouds of poverty and sorrow sit, and by putting into their mouths a new song?

If, unhappily, the time shall come, which God grant it may not, that American valor must again be displayed on the field of battle in defense of American institutions and against foreign greed and aggrandizement, we may confidently expect the sons of America to march under the flag of the free, consecrated by the blood of a hundred years, to permanent and glorious victory. Then for every Grant there will be a Lee; for every Sherman a Johnston; for every Thomas a Jackson; for every Sheridan a Stuart, and Mason and Dixon's line will be blotted from the map of the United States, and true Americans, North and South, welded by the blood of the Revolution, the war of 1812, and the war with Mexico, renewed by the estrangement of 1861, as lovers renew and intensify their affection by estrangement, soothed and sustained by a united and splendid American womanhood, will give to the world a lesson in valor that it has never known before. And when the end comes, as it surely will come, and the storm that has rocked us in a great civil strife for renewed American freedom shall have subsided, and the nation shall arise once more from the ashes of its deadly conflict with the enemies of human liberty, crowned with a new glory and encircled with a new halo, shall we not place the songs of our recent civil strife with the sacred memories of other days, and sing that sweeter, grander, more inspiring and God-like song, dear to all American hearts:

> My country, 'tis of thee,
> Sweet land of liberty,
> Of thee I sing;
> Land where my fathers died,
> Land of the pilgrims' pride,
> From every mountain-side
> Let freedom ring.
>
> My native country, thee—
> Land of the noble free—
> Thy name I love;
> I love thy rocks and rills,
> Thy woods and templed hills;
> My heart with rapture thrills
> Like that above.
>
> Let music swell the breeze,
> And ring from all the trees
> Sweet freedom's song.
> Let mortal tongues awake;
> Let all that breathe partake;
> Let rocks their silence break;
> The sound prolong.
>
> Our father's God, to Thee,
> Author of liberty,
> To Thee we sing;
> Long may our land be bright
> With freedom's holy light;
> Protect us by Thy might,
> Great God, our King!

PROPOSED TARIFF RATES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. STEWART on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, directed to furnish the Senate an estimate of the probable increase of the revenue if bill H. R. 2749, entitled "A bill to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of Government and provide against a deficiency," should become a law; and what would be the duty per pound in United States money on the different grades of imported wool according to the present market price; and is the proposed duty on wool provided for in said bill sufficient to compensate for or correspond with the increased duties proposed on woolen goods.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution in relation to the distribution of seed. I understand the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] desires to submit some remarks on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, the purchase and distribution of improved seeds may be, in the opinion of some, a small matter, but the nonexecution of an act of Congress by an executive officer is by no means a small matter. It is a propensity of human nature that when one makes up his mind to do something which does not comport exactly with his ideas of duty, or does not measure up to the test of his own conscience, the first thing he does is to look around for a plausible pretext with which to justify his action.

The Secretary of Agriculture has done this. He made up his mind to refuse to expend the appropriation for the purchase of seeds; he sought and found a pretext for this refusal. The language of the appropriation act directing the purchase and distribution of improved seeds, I understand, is the same language that has been used for years past in making similar appropriations. It is the same language that was used in the three appropriation acts for the three years last passed, during which time the Secretary of Agriculture has occupied his present position. He did not refuse to execute those laws, however much they may have been condemned by his judgment. But he could stand it no longer. Having made up his mind that the purchase and distribution of improved seeds was a wasteful expenditure on the part of the Government, he determined that he would put a stop to it. How? Why, simply by refusing to execute the law; and having resolved to try the experiment, he looked around for a pretext to justify it.

Accordingly, quoting the language of the statute, "for the purchase, propagation, and distribution, as required by law, of valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings," etc., underscoring and laying stress upon the words "as required by law," he writes a letter to the Attorney-General of the United States and propounds to him the question:

> Can the Secretary of Agriculture legally purchase any other seeds than those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, to wit, seeds "rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent change from one part of our own country to another," under authority of the act of March 2, 1895?

The answer to this question he had doubtless discovered in advance would be favorable to his purpose. The Attorney-General, replying officially, places a convenient construction upon the words emphasized by the Secretary of Agriculture, and that official finds in that construction the pretext for the nonexecution of the law which he was seeking.

Mr. President, the question as to how far executive officers may go in withholding assent to the execution of an act formally enacted into law is one that strikes pretty close to the foundations of our institutions. It involves a consideration of the extent of legislative power, and of the means by which that authority may be enforced. It involves expunging, even, an act of Congress from the statute books. This attempt on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture to take a law of Congress by the throat and hold it up, refusing his assent to its execution, is not the first time that such a thing has been attempted under the present Administration.

In the sundry civil act of the last session of the late Congress a provision was inserted directing the payment of $5,238,000 to the sugar producers of the United States in recognition of the equity of their claim for payment of part of the bounty earned upon the sugar crop of the calendar year 1894.

It will be recollected that eight months of the calendar year of 1894 had expired before the provisions of the McKinley bounty law were repealed, and during those eight months the crops of cane and beets from which sugar is made had been cultivated and laid by, and all that was necessary was to await their full maturity before commencing to manufacture the cane in the one instance and the beets in the other into sugar. As the cultivation of the cane and beet crops had more and more progressed, as more and more money had been expended in their cultivation, so had the bounty upon the crop of 1894 been more and more earned. So that when the McKinley bounty provisions were repealed by the Wilson Act, more than half of the bounty upon the sugar crop of that year had been fairly earned, and in recognition of this Congress made the appropriation to which I have referred.

But it seems that Congress may enact but executive officers will avoid. Accordingly when this provision of law reached the Treasury Department and had gone through the preliminary stages of its execution, in its further execution it came before an official known as the Comptroller of the Treasury. He took that law by the throat as a highwayman holds up a traveler and prevented its execution. It made no difference to him that the law-making power of the Federal Government, in unison with the executive authority acting through the President, had concurred in the enactment of the law. It made no difference to him that when the President of the United States had affixed his approval to the act, he acted for the entire executive branch of the Government, and thereby precluded further question of its validity by such branch.

It would seem, Mr. President, that prior to that time the source of veto power under our system had been thought to be lodged solely in the Chief Executive of the Republic, but we learned on that occasion that another and even greater veto power had lain dormant all the years that the Republic had existed, and suddenly rose into life and activity through the official personality of the Comptroller of the Treasury. The President of the United States, under the Constitution, when he vetoes a measure must veto it as a whole or approve it as a whole; but not so with the Comptroller of the Treasury. He is limited by no such narrow confines. No pent-up Utica circumscribes his boundless power. The appropriation bill may pass muster before the President and be approved by him, and yet when it reaches the Treasury Department the Comptroller, exercising a power greater even than that which the President is given by the Constitution, selects out of the act certain items of appropriation which do not measure up to his constitutional test, or his idea of validity, and deliberately runs his pen through the same.

For the first time in the history of the Government the power was distinctly claimed by a subordinate official of the Federal Government, charged with the execution of a law, that he could call into question its constitutionality. The Comptroller of the Treasury, holding that the appropriation for the payment of the bounty upon sugar in the sundry civil appropriation act last passed was unconstitutional, claimed the right to withhold his execution of that law because of unconstitutionality. Prior to that time it had been thought the Constitution vested in the courts alone the authority to pass on the constitutionality of laws.

When the President of the United States, in exercising his prerogative of veto, vetoes a measure because he deems it to be unconstitutional, and the two Houses of Congress, in the exercise of their constitutional prerogative, pass the measure over the Executive veto by the necessary two-thirds majority it is as much a law of the land as though it had been signed instead of vetoed by the President. And after that, notwithstanding the opinions of the President are not changed, still believing, as he may, that there is no warrant in the Constitution for such a measure, he must, under the duties prescribed to him in the Constitution, and under his oath of office, proceed to its execution. But the Comptroller of the Treasury, in the powers claimed by him and for him, went far beyond anything of that kind. Under the view of the authority vested in him, taken by the Comptroller himself, it makes no difference to him whether or not the Executive power of veto of a measure has been exhausted before it reaches him in due process of its execution. Even if the President vetoed a bill and it had been passed over his veto and had gone to the Comptroller for his execution, he could exercise anew the power of veto and strike from it any provision or any appropriation which did not measure up to his idea of a constitutional test. So mighty is the Comptroller of the Treasury!

In the case to which I have referred he exercised that power, though the President had approved the act. Claiming the right to call in question the validity of the appropriation, he announced a suspension of the law, and, further, that on a certain day a hearing would be had before him touching the validity of this particular appropriation. In other words, he arrogated to himself the functions of a court, resolved himself into a branch of the judiciary, and invited the citizens of the United States interested in the appropriation to appear before him in person or by counsel to argue before him, a subordinate executive official, whether or not the law should be executed by him. And the remarkable spectacle was presented of three gentlemen, who, as Senators of the United States, occupying seats upon this floor, had assisted in the passage of the act, and of two gentlemen of the other House, acting in the same capacity in that body, impelled by a sense of duty, appearing before this subordinate executive officer and submitting arguments for the execution of a statute!

It had been thought prior to that time that when gentlemen holding high positions in the legislative branch of the Government had discharged their proper and legitimate functions by taking part in the enactment of a law by the body to which they were accredited, their duties ended, but in these degenerate times it would seem that their duties do not end, and they must follow up into the Executive Department to which the act goes the law which they assisted in enacting and there see to its execution.

Mr. President, under the view taken by the Comptroller of the Treasury, if he could question the validity of the appropriation to which I have alluded, then, sir, no appropriation whatever is safe. If he could hold up, as he did, the disbursement of the money appropriated to pay the sugar producers of the United States the equitable claim which was theirs and which Congress had recognized, then I submit that he could hold up any other appropriation enacted by Congress. If this extraordinary power is to go unquestioned, the time may come when some future Comptroller of the Treasury, holding office in the time of a great war, in which perhaps the life of the Republic itself is involved, and Congress should appropriate hundreds of millions of dollars to put the country in a condition of defense, may sit in judgment upon such appropriation and decree it to be invalid and unconstitutional and refuse his assent to its execution. This may be an extreme case to put, but not an impossible one.

Prior to the extraordinary position assumed by the Comptroller it was thought that all that was necessary to enact a measure into law was for it to pass both Houses of Congress and receive the Executive approval, or else in case of his veto of a measure that it should be passed by the constitutional two-thirds majority over his veto by the two Houses of Congress. But it would seem, under this new order of things, that an act of Congress is not a law, that a measure is not enacted into law until it shall have passed both Houses of Congress, received the Executive approval, and then the roll is called upon it in the Department of Agriculture, in the one instance, and in the Treasury Department in the other, and the Secretary of Agriculture and the Comptroller of the Treasury answer "aye."

Mr. President, pretensions of this kind on the part of any executive officer must be repudiated by all sound opinion. In the case of the sugar bounty appropriation it did not matter with this Treasury official that the bounty law had been executed by him in several preceding years, and that from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000, all told, had been paid out to the sugar producers of the United States by the present Administration on claims approved by the Comptroller of the Treasury. This was done in the calendar years 1891, 1892, and 1893; millions of dollars paid out before he became conscious of the extraordinary veto power lodged in him; twenty-five or thirty million dollars paid out by the Treasury officials on claims approved by this very Comptroller before he conceived the idea that such appropriations were without constitutional warrant, and only when it came to the tail end of the execution of the bounty law, after about $40,000,000 in all (including prior payments) had been paid out to the sugar producers in the time following the enactment of the McKinley Act, when only this $5,238,000 was left to be disbursed, he arrogates to himself the authority of asserting the unconstitutionality of such appropriations, and withholds his assent to the payment of the few millions yet to be disbursed before the bounty policy was to finally terminate.

Mr. President, I deemed this a fitting occasion to call to the attention of the Senate of the United States this usurpation of authority on the part of a subordinate executive officer. While the Senate is considering the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH], requiring the execution of a law of Congress by the head of one of the Executive Departments, it is opportune to call the attention of the country to another glaring and flagrant usurpation of power in the Treasury Department growing out of the conduct of the Comptroller of the Treasury alluded to.

I do this, Mr. President, in the hope that the Judiciary Committee of this body, to which this matter of the refusal of the Comptroller to execute the law of Congress has been referred, will find time to investigate the extraordinary conduct of this executive official and take some action to vindicate the law making power of the Government; and I do so in the further hope that the Senate of the United States, if it can find time from its work of attaching silver linings to the legislative clouds that hover in and about this Chamber, will give some attention itself to the way in which one of the laws in which this body participated has been ruthlessly set aside by a subordinate official of the Government.

Mr. President, the action which the Senate is asked to take on the pending resolution has back of it a precedent which occurred in the Thirty-sixth Congress. It would seem, sir, that at that time, in 1860, a Comptroller of that period refused to execute an act of Congress, just as the Secretary of Agriculture is now refusing to execute an act of the late Congress. On one of the appropriation bills of that year was attached the following provision of law:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the First Comptroller of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, required to adjust the damages due to Edward H. Carmick and Albert C. Ramsey, on account of the abrogation by the Postmaster-General of their contract to carry the mail on the Vera Cruz, Acapulco, and San Francisco route, dated the 15th of February, 1853, to adjudge and award to them according to the principles of law, equity, and justice the amount so found due. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby required to pay the same to said Carmick & Ramsey out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

When that provision of law reached the Treasury Department the Comptroller refused to execute it. It makes no difference upon what ground he based his refusal. It is not for any executive officer to question the wisdom or propriety of the enactment of a law. His duty is confined to the execution of the law. So, the Comptroller, going out of his way to question the propriety of the enactment of the statute, refused his assent to its execution. When the Senate of the United States met thereafter the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That a select committee of five be appointed to inquire whether the sixth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post-Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859," has been executed by the First Comptroller of the Treasury, and whether any further legislation is necessary to carry into effect said act, and report by bill or otherwise.

The select committee of five was appointed and took the matter under consideration. I hold in my hand the elaborate report made by the committee. It is known as Senate report 270, Thirty-sixth Congress, first session.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Louisiana allow me to ask him a question? Was the resolution which he has just read introduced in the Senate or in the other House?

Mr. BLANCHARD. It was introduced in the Senate, but the Senator from Delaware is informed that a similar resolution, touching the very case, was also introduced in the other House, only there the duty of examining into the conduct of the Comptroller was imposed upon the Judiciary Committee instead of a select committee.

Mr. GRAY. What was the purport of the report of the committee?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I shall read a part of it. The committee of the Senate took into consideration the right claimed now by the Secretary of Agriculture, and claimed last August by the Comptroller of the Treasury, to withhold execution of a statute. Their report says:

The first duty imposed by the resolution under which your committee is acting, and the first inquiry made by them, was to ascertain whether the sixth section of the said law had been executed, and they found that it had not, because the law can not be executed without an assessment of damages due to the parties, which the present Comptroller has refused to do. The former First Comptroller, Mr. Whittlesey, promptly took the case up and fully examined and considered the subject, decided some important points, and made a most elaborate and conclusive report in favor of it.

The present First Comptroller, however, in resistance to the mandates of law and in violation of its obligations, has interposed every obstacle and impediment which his ingenuity could suggest to prevent and defeat its proper execution. And the committee regret to say that other officers of the Government, having no official connection whatever with the subject, also interposed to prevent the law from being carried into effect according to its purpose and its terms. Their action, however, could have no legal effect, because this is a question over which they had no jurisdiction.

I skip much of the report and come to the following paragraph:

The Comptroller alone was amenable to the President and to Congress for the faithful execution of the law, and to no one else. He could not divide his responsibility; and the opinion of the Attorney-General, or the opinion of any other officer of the Government, even of the President himself, could not absolve the Comptroller or release him from his obligation and duty to execute the will of Congress as expressed by the law.

Mr. President, that has a direct bearing upon the instant case. Here the Secretary of Agriculture seeks refuge in his refusal to execute this law behind the opinion of the Attorney-General, and yet the report of the select committee of the Senate declared that even the opinion of the Attorney-General did not release this executive officer from the duty to execute the will of Congress.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana to the fact that the opinion of the Attorney-General in the case of the Secretary of Agriculture by no means sustains his position.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I agree with that. Nevertheless the Secretary of Agriculture claims that it does sustain him. But if it does, here is a high authority which decided that an executive officer could not shield himself from liability behind the opinion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. President, I see the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived, at which the morning hour, in which I am speaking, ceases. I would like to conclude my remarks, and therefore ask unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed, promising to conclude in a few moments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A resolution by Mr. DUBOIS, proposing an amendment to paragraph 1 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope the request of the Senator from Louisiana will be granted.

Mr. DUBOIS. How long will the Senator take?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I do not think I will occupy more than ten minutes.

Mr. DUBOIS. Very well. I ask that the regular order be laid aside temporarily.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho asks unanimous consent that the regular order may be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Louisiana may conclude his remarks. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Louisiana will proceed.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I am asked by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN] to give the name of the Senator who was chairman of the select committee from whose report I have quoted. His name was Green. This report was submitted to the Senate of the United States on the 12th of June, 1860, by Mr. Green of Missouri.

Mr. COCKRELL. James S. Green.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, following the paragraph in the report I last read appears a further discussion of this matter, which I will omit, and come to the concluding part of the report. It is as follows:

Now, in considering the peculiar circumstances of this case, it becomes a matter of very grave inquiry to know how far any executive, ministerial, or subordinate officer of the Government can be permitted to go behind the law, or question the motives or action of Congress to find excuses or reasons for the nonexecution of the law. If this be permitted without rebuke, it would be subversive of all law; it would, in fact, be an end of all Government; because, if the legal agents of the Government appointed to execute the laws are, in their discretion or caprice, to question their policy or wisdom, and then refuse to execute them, all the functions of lawful government must cease.

The faithful execution of the law is imposed upon all the officers of the Government alike.

This duty is equally imperative upon all. From the President down to the lowest official, all are bound by this obligation. And the Constitution itself, ruling supreme over all, limiting and defining our rights, and prescribing our duties in the Federal Government, makes it the special duty of the President "to see that the laws are faithfully executed."

* * * * * * *

The main object of the committee is to vindicate the lawmaking power. Congress represents the people and the States, and is justly held responsible for its action. A mere deputy to investigate a fact of damages should not be permitted to nullify the act of Congress, whether right or wrong, nor should he be allowed to insult others by impugning their motives.

Mr. President, not willing to trust longer the execution of the law to the Comptroller, despairing of coercion being brought to bear upon him by the then Chief Executive to compel its execution, the select committee saw fit to recommend to the Senate that the power of executing the law be taken out of his hands and vested in other officers of the Government who would have regard to the legislative will. Accordingly they reported this resolution:

Be it resolved, That the power devolved on, and the duty required to be performed by, the First Comptroller of the Treasury, to assess the damages due the parties under the sixth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1857," be, and the same are hereby, transferred to and vested in, and shall hereafter be performed by, the Register of the Treasury and Commissioner of Patents.

In that time the lawmaking power vindicated its authority to have its acts executed, and it is to be hoped, now that this Congress has had called to its attention two glaring instances of the refusal of executive officers to execute the law, and when there appears to be no hope that the Chief Executive of the Republic will require at the hands of these appointees of his its execution, that the legislative branch of the Government will again vindicate its authority by taking some action to compel these officials to the performance of their duties.

I have here also the report made by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives to the Thirty-sixth Congress upon the same refusal of the First Comptroller to execute the law at that time. The matter was taken up in the House of Representatives under a resolution adopted instructing the Judiciary Committee to investigate. It did so, and through Mr. Billinghurst submitted a report, which I will not take up the time of the Senate to read in full. One paragraph, concluding the report, I will, however, read. It is as follows:

Congress has taken its share of responsibility in declaring that a contract existed, was abrogated, and that damages are due. Whether it has wisely or unwisely met and discharged that responsibility is not a question that can be reviewed now by the First Comptroller, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, or the President. That is a closed question. The President has approved the law.

In the opinion of your committee, it is the duty of the First Comptroller to execute the existing law.

Mr. President, if precedent were needed in the effort which is now being made in this body to vindicate the lawmaking power of the Government by compelling a stubborn Secretary of Agriculture to execute a law, here is the precedent. But even if a precedent did not exist in a case like this, where there has been a flagrant omission of public duty by a public officer, the Senate of the United States should itself make a precedent.

Mr. ALLISON obtained the floor.

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. ALLISON. I will yield for a moment.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, rising to the unfinished business, I wish to express my regret that the Senator from Louisiana has seen fit, in the able and scathing arraignment he has made of the action of the Comptroller of the Treasury in setting at naught a law of Congress, passed with the disapproval of the President, to link with it a denunciation of the Secretary of Agriculture for executing a law of Congress. I agree with him in regard to what he said as to the action of the First Comptroller in seeking to nullify an act of Congress. I believe with him that it was beyond the scope of the duty and the power of that officer to declare a law, passed with all the forms which are prescribed for legislation, to be unconstitutional; but that was a distinct refusal to execute a law, and the Senator links with that a denunciation of the Secretary of Agriculture for deciding that he will execute a law according to its terms and according to the lettering in which it is written upon the statute book. He finds fault with that distinguished and able Cabinet officer for observing the limitations that a law enacted by Congress placed upon his powers; that law in regard to the distribution of seeds, about which so much has been said, being:

That the purchase and distribution of seeds by the Department of Agriculture—

I read from section 527 of the Revised Statutes—shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country.

Because the Secretary of Agriculture sought to confine himself to that limitation placed upon his power he is joined as an object of denunciation with the Comptroller of the Treasury for refusing to confine his powers and his duties to the strict letter of a Congressional enactment.

Mr. BLANCHARD. If the Senator from Delaware will yield to me for a moment, I would say——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. GRAY. I do.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Perhaps before the Senator came into the Chamber, in the beginning of my remarks, I took occasion to say that the Secretary of Agriculture had taken refuge behind a pretext for his refusal to execute that law, and that pretext was an opinion of the Attorney-General.

Mr. GRAY. The part of the Senator's speech which it was my good fortune to hear made no discrimination in its denunciation of those two officers. Both were held up as declining to execute a law, when I here point out to the Senator and to the Senate that the law applying to the Secretary of Agriculture was strictly construed by him according to its letter and unmistakable terms. The law says that he shall confine himself to the distribution of "such seeds as are rare and uncommon"; and that he attempted to do.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture did not confine himself to that construction the year previously.

Mr. GRAY. And in that construction the Secretary of Agriculture was supported by the first law officer of the Government, if indeed it was necessary in a case so plain to apply to that officer to make an official construction of the law. I ask the Senator from Louisiana what interpretation he would have given to that law if the Secretary of Agriculture had asked him what it meant when it said he must confine himself to the distribution of the seeds there described?

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I am under restraint as to time, there being another matter pressing.

Mr. GRAY. I beg the Senator's pardon, and shall not trespass on his time further.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I beg a moment to answer the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. ALLISON. For a moment.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The Senator from Delaware asked me a question, which I desire to answer. He wants to know what construction I would have put upon the law which he read, if my opinion had been asked by the Secretary of Agriculture. Had I been Secretary of Agriculture and had executed that same provision of law for the three preceding years, I should not have stultified myself by refusing to execute it the fourth year. The opinion of the Attorney-General should have been asked earlier in his administration. The Secretary of Agriculture has done something for three years, and then suddenly discovers in the fourth that it can not lawfully be done. The country will adjudge it a mere pretext.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes; agreed to the conference asked for by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HULL, Mr. TRACEY, and Mr. MCCLELLAN managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory," with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (H. R. 173) to provide American registers for the barks Minde and Johan Ludwig;

A bill (H. R. 5566) to prohibit prize fighting and pugilism, and fights between men and animals, and to provide penalties therefor, in the Territories and the District of Columbia; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 103) to authorize the Attorney-General to transfer to William Henry Clifford a portrait of the late Mr. Justice Clifford, now in the Department of Justice.

PROPOSED DISTRIBUTION OF APPROPRIATION BILLS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. DUBOIS proposing an amendment to paragraph 1 of Rule XVI of the standing rules of the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I now resume the floor, and move that the resolution of the Senator from Idaho, and all amendments thereto, be referred to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to report the same to the Senate on the first Monday of December next, with or without amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. If that resolution is to be disposed of without debate I have no objection. Otherwise, in pursuance of the notice I gave this morning, I propose to move an adjournment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator a question. It is not intended that this motion shall in any way be an instruction to the Committee on Rules as to what its report shall be, favorable or unfavorable?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Senate ready for the question?

Mr. PALMER. I desire to ask whether there is any unanimous-consent agreement that this question shall now be disposed of without debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not informed.

Mr. HARRIS. There is no unanimous consent.

Mr. PALMER. The motion of the Senator from Iowa involves a disposition of the resolution of the Senator from Idaho which I think fairly admits of discussion.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PALMER. I do.

Mr. DUBOIS. I wish to submit a statement. I understand, I think correctly, that there will be some amendment or substitute offered for the resolution.

Mr. HILL. I intend to offer a substitute.

Mr. DUBOIS. And that no debate will be had on it. I think Senators understand the question thoroughly, and the different phases of it will be presented by amendments which Senators can vote upon as they see fit.

Mr. PALMER. The question whether there shall or shall not be debate, of course, is largely under the control of the Senator from Idaho, but at last I suppose it must be referred to the individual judgment of each Senator as to whether he desires to be heard on the question or not.

I desire to state that I very earnestly and cordially support the proposition of the Senator from Idaho, and I should like to see it adopted; but I desire before any other step is taken to express my views on the subject.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. PALMER. I do.

Mr. CHANDLER. Did I understand the Senator to say that he desired to debate the resolution at this time?

Mr. PALMER. I have no objection to the resolution going over until another day if that be the wish of the Senate.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me, I will move that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday next.

Mr. ALLISON. Before that motion is put, I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me until I move, as he moved a while ago, that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. CHANDLER. I yield for that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. DUBOIS. I trust if the pending resolution is not disposed of that that motion will be beaten.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will withdraw that for a moment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I withdraw it.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from New Hampshire to yield to me until I make a request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield?

Mr. CHANDLER. I do.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I desire to take the sense of the Senate in respect to a proposition that the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins be the unfinished business of the Senate immediately after the matter the Senator from Idaho has in charge is disposed of.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator except appropriation bills?

Mr. ALDRICH and Mr. DUBOIS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] has the floor.

Mr. PALMER. I thought I had the floor, Mr. President. I yielded to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] for a suggestion, but I supposed I was still on the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the Senator from Illinois. The Senator from Illinois is correct. He is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PALMER. I merely desired that my right should be recognized. I now yield to the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER].

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me, I wish to appeal to the Senator from Idaho, who has the pending resolution in charge, that he ask unanimous consent to dispose of it now. I think the Senator from Illinois will permit a vote to be taken upon the resolution, as it has been before the Senate for a considerable length of time. If it goes over until Monday it will take one day and perhaps two days more. Everybody is here and willing to vote upon the proposition now, and I ask the Senator from Idaho to request unanimous consent that it may now be disposed of.

Mr. DUBOIS. I stated during the morning hour that if the matter could be disposed of without debate at 2 o'clock I should be very glad to have it come to a termination. I did not ask unanimous consent then, because some objection was raised, but I made the statement that if we could dispose of the resolution without debate at 2 o'clock that would be agreeable to me. I maintain that position now.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator will ask for unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the Senator from Idaho if he objects to the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules?

Mr. DUBOIS. I object very much to the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I insist on my motion to adjourn.

Mr. ALDRICH. I hope the Senator from Idaho will ask unanimous consent.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Idaho has not asked unanimous consent.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then, I ask unanimous consent.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent.

Mr. HILL. That I object to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York objects.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire. [Putting the question.] The Chair is unable to determine.

Mr. CHANDLER. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BERRY. I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. CALL (after having voted in the negative). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I do not think he has voted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has not voted, the Chair is informed.

Mr. CALL. Then I withdraw my vote and announce my pair with the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. TELLER] is detained from the Chamber to-day by illness. He is paired with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], as has been announced.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 52; as follows:

YEAS—21.

Baker,	Hawley,	Palmer,	Vest,
Caffery,	Hill,	Pettigrew,	Voorhees,
Cannon,	Lodge,	Pritchard,	Warren.
Chandler,	McBride,	Sherman,
Gallinger,	Mills,	Smith,
Harris,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,

NAYS—52.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Pugh,
Allen,	Daniel,	Kyle,	Quay,
Allison,	Davis,	Lindsay,	Roach,
Bacon,	Dubois,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Bate,	Faulkner,	Mantle,	Squire,
Blanchard,	Frye,	Martin,	Thurston,
Brice,	Gear,	Mitchell, Wis.	Tillman,
Brown,	George,	Morgan,	Turpie,
Butler,	Gibson,	Nelson,	Vilas,
Cameron,	Gorman,	Pasco,	Walthall,
Carter,	Gray,	Peffer,	Wetmore,
Clark,	Hale,	Perkins,	Wilson,
Cockrell,	Hansbrough,	Platt,	Wolcott.

NOT VOTING—16.

Berry,	Chilton,	Jones, Ark.	Proctor,
Blackburn,	Elkins,	Jones, Nev.	Shoup,
Burrows,	Gordon,	Morrill,	Teller,
Call,	Irby,	Murphy,	White.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. ALDRICH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Let the motion be stated.

Mr. HILL. I offer what I send to the desk as a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. I understand the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] desires to be heard.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the proposed substitute.

The Secretary read as follows:

This amendment shall not take effect, however, until on and after the first Monday of December next.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest that the amendment of the Senator from New York is not a substitute for the motion of the Senator from Iowa. It is an amendment to the original proposition.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President——

Mr. ALDRICH. A motion to refer can not be amended in that way.

Mr. FAULKNER. I am satisfied that under the rules no motion can be made to affect the motion of the Senator from Iowa except a resolution that will modify, change, or amend the instructions to the committee.

Mr. MILLS. That is this amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. A motion which embodies the main feature, which is a reference to the committee with instructions, is the only amendment that can be made. It takes precedence of all other motions.

Mr. HILL. There are no particular instructions as to the matter to be reported. The motion of the Senator from Iowa is to report at a particular time. That is all it is.

This is a proper substitute, because it does away in effect with the effect of the motion. For instance, without intending to reopen the discussion, permit me simply to say that it was suggested here that the resolution originally ought to have been referred to the Committee on Rules, and that the committee should have reported it. Therefore the suggestion is now made by a motion that the resolution shall be referred to the committee with instructions to report at a particular time, not a particular thing, but at a given time. As a substitute for that motion, to meet the objection, it is proposed that the amendment to the rules itself shall not take effect until the very date when it is proposed that the Committee on Rules shall report.

It strikes me that the substitute is germane to the question, because there are presented the two phases of the controversy. One is that the resolution shall be referred to the committee, not simply a general reference—that is not the question—but a reference with instructions to report at a particular time, on a given day. Those who favor that motion recognize the propriety of some postponement of action. I propose by the substitute that the amendment of the rules shall not go into effect until a particular day. We provide by the substitute a counter proposition, not that the resolution shall be referred to a particular committee, not that that committee shall report at a particular time, but that the amendment of the rules which the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] directs shall be reported on the first Monday of December shall itself not go into effect until that time.

There are the two propositions involving the question before us, and to say that one is not a substitute for the other is to violate every principle of parliamentary law.

Mr. HALE. The Senator from New York, in seeking to accomplish this purpose, has forgotten the rules of the Senate.

Mr. ALDRICH. He always does.

Mr. HILL. A little louder, please.

Mr. HALE. There is an order in which motions shall be entertained, and one of those orders is a motion to refer or to refer with instructions. When that motion is made it cuts off all amendments to the original proposition, and the motion must be entertained and a vote taken upon the motion to refer with instructions or an amendment to the instructions. There can be no doubt whatever about it. There is no man who has been in the Senate and subject to its rules and is willing to be subject to its rules who does not know it.

Mr. GORMAN. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. And having said that, I am willing to leave it to the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order that has been made and rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. I rise to submit an amendment.

Mr. MILLS. I ask whether the Chair has ruled the amendment out of order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has so ruled.

Mr. MILLS. Then I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have submitted an amendment to the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. MILLS. Let the amendment be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Mr. GALLINGER moves to amend by inserting after the word "back" the word "favorably."

Mr. MILLS. That is just what I was going to do.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. MILLS. I understand that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. PALMER] wishes to be heard on this question, and I hope he will not be cut off.

Mr. ALDRICH. He does not wish to speak on this particular amendment.

Mr. PALMER. I have no interest in this particular question, and so long as these questions are depending in the Senate I do not desire to occupy its attention.

I will make another remark at this point. I observe all around the Senate very great anxiety to vote and dispose of this question now. I think I discover that the main question, that in which I am most deeply interested, has already been disposed of. My idea would be to adopt this proposition now and provide for its going into effect from to-morrow, taking all the possible and imaginary consequences that might result from it. If that is not my good fortune, I have no desire to occupy the time of the Senate in submitting remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] moves to lay upon the table the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. FAULKNER. I make that motion because the other one is such a fair proposition.

Mr. GALLINGER. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DUBOIS. I ask that the motion be again read.

Mr. GALLINGER. Let the motion be read as it will read if amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the motion as it will read if the amendment should be adopted.

The SECRETARY. If amended the motion will read as follows:

To refer the resolution and amendments to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to report the same back favorably to the Senate on the first Monday of December next, either with or without amendment.

Mr. HALE. It is understood that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] does not make the motion in that form.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will include in my amendment the striking out of the latter part of the motion, "either with or without amendment."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the motion will be modified to that extent.

Mr. GRAY. Let the Secretary state the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. FAULKNER. Let the motion be read, and then let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will first read the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. ALLISON moves to refer the motion and amendments to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to report the same back to the Senate on the first Monday of December next, either with or without amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will now state the proposed amendment.

The SECRETARY. Mr. GALLINGER moves to insert after the word "back" the word "favorably"——

Mr. GALLINGER. And to strike out.

The SECRETARY. And to strike out the words at the end of the resolution, as follows: "Either with or without amendment."

Mr. MILLS. Let the motion be read as it will read if amended.

The SECRETARY. So that, if amended, the motion will read as follows:

To refer the resolution and amendments to the Committee on Rules with instructions to report the same back favorably to the Senate on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. MILLS. That is right.

Mr. BACON. I ask that the amendment be divided; that the motion to insert be separated from the motion to strike out. The two propositions in the amendment are not at all inconsistent.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

Mr. FAULKNER. The motion before the Senate is to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER].

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On that question the yeas and nays have been ordered. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. NELSON. Is the question on the motion to refer or on the motion to lay the amendment on the table?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is on the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. HALE. To lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. On that the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CANNON (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CHANDLER (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. MURPHY]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. HARRIS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], but he and I agreeing, as we do, upon all questions in respect to the resolution, and as I understand that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] stands paired upon this question with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. MANTLE (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. VEST (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. DANIEL (after having voted in the negative). I desire to withdraw my vote, as I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES].

The result was announced—yeas 39, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—39.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Lindsay,	Sherman,
Allen,	Faulkner,	McMillan,	Thurston,
Allison,	Frye,	Mitchell, Wis.	Turpie,
Bacon,	Gear,	Pasco,	Vilas,
Bate,	Gibson,	Peffer,	Voorhees,
Berry,	Gorman,	Perkins,	Walthall,
Brice,	Gray,	Platt,	Warren,
Caffery,	Hale,	Pugh,	Wetmore,
Cameron,	Harris,	Quay,	Wolcott.
Cockrell,	Hoar,	Sewell,

NAYS—29.

Baker,	Dubois,	McBride,	Smith,
Blanchard,	Gallinger,	Martin,	Squire,
Brown,	George,	Mills,	Tillman,
Burrows,	Hansbrough,	Morgan,	White,
Butler,	Hawley,	Nelson,	Wilson.
Carter,	Hill,	Palmer,
Chilton,	Kyle,	Pritchard,
Davis,	Lodge,	Roach,

NOT VOTING—21.

Blackburn,	Elkins,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Call,	Gordon,	Morrill,	Teller,
Cannon,	Irby,	Murphy,	Vest.
Chandler,	Jones, Ark.	Pettigrew,
Clark,	Jones, Nev.	Proctor,
Daniel,	Mantle,	Shoup,

So Mr. GALLINGER's amendment to the motion was laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. HILL obtained the floor.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

Mr. HILL. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. DUBOIS. I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Iowa on the table.

Mr. HALE. On that let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALDRICH answered to his name.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, the answer to which may save a roll call. If that motion prevails, does it not lay the whole subject on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would, undoubtedly.

Mr. HALE. Let the roll call proceed.

Mr. HILL. What was the parliamentary inquiry? I did not hear it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Whether, if the motion to lay on the table is agreed to, the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] and the amendments pending will be laid on the table

Mr. CULLOM. Would it lay upon the table the resolution of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], which is the main question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not understand that it would.

Mr. HILL. Nor any other amendment, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Except those pending to the single motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HILL. Certainly all those amendments, but none other is pending.

Mr. GRAY. There is no other amendment pending.

Mr. MILLS. I ask that the amendment may be stated.

Mr. GRAY. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I ask the Chair to state what the motion is and what the effect of it will be.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is to lay on the table the motion to refer made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON]. The question was asked whether or not, if that motion prevailed, it would carry with it the amendments pending to it. The Chair ruled that it would.

Mr. HILL. Are any amendments pending?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair does not know.

Mr. HILL. There is none. So that it carries nothing, but simply lays the motion to refer on the table.

Mr. HOAR. As I understand, a motion to lay on the table the motion to refer carries the whole subject with it. Formerly a motion to lay on the table an amendment, if adopted, carried the whole subject. We were obliged to provide for that by a special rule.

Mr. ALDRICH. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. I beg pardon.

Mr. ALDRICH. I answered to my name, and it strikes me that the discussion is out of order.

Mr. HOAR. Let me finish my sentence.

Mr. HILL. There is nothing in the point. It does not carry the main question with it to the table. The rules are explicit on that point.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Rhode Island makes the point that the roll call has commenced and a response has been made, the Chair will sustain it.

Mr. ALDRICH. I do not make it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island does not make the point of order.

Mr. HOAR. Otherwise the motion would not be in order. There are certain motions in order. One is to report with or without instructions. No one of them can be disposed of by a motion to lay on the table——

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator from Massachusetts allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Without carrying the whole subject with it. That is the proposition I make.

Mr. HILL. Then, the other amendment having been laid on the table, if the Senator's argument is correct the whole subject is laid on the table.

Mr. HOAR. We have a special rule in regard to amendments. Any amendment can be laid on the table without carrying anything with it. I myself am the author of that special rule. Until the last three or five years you could not lay an amendment on the table without carrying the whole subject with it.

Mr. SHERMAN. My friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I think has fallen into an error. The proposition to lay the motion to refer on the table simply denies the motion to refer and the Senate retains before it the subject-matter under discussion. It seems to me that is perfectly clear. While I sympathize with the Senator in the votes he has given, I myself can not sustain that construction of our rules. Such a construction would work great damage at different times.

Mr. GORMAN. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, I will read the rule.

When an amendment proposed to any pending measure—

Any pending measure—is laid on the table it shall not carry with it or prejudice such measure.

Mr. HOAR. That is the rule.

Mr. CULLOM. That does not touch the main question before the Senate, which is the motion to refer.

Mr. GORMAN. Yes; it does.

Mr. GRAY. The motion to refer is not an amendment.

Mr. CULLOM. As the Senator from Delaware says, the motion to refer is not an amendment. If the motion to refer is laid on the table the next question will be on the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho. Those who want to take up the resolution had better vote to lay the motion to refer on the table. Those who do not had better vote to sustain the motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will continue the calling of the roll.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us know what the decision is.

Mr. HILL. It does not lay the whole question upon the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would be very strongly inclined when the point comes up at its proper place to submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think the point is well taken, and that it does carry the whole question, but it does not propose so to rule now.

Mr. HARRIS. It seems to me vitally important that every Senator should understand the effect of the vote that he is to give upon this motion. If it is to have one effect I should vote one way. If the motion to lay on the table simply carries to the table the motion to refer made by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], I should vote one way, but if the motion to lay on the table carries with it the resolution, disposes of the whole subject, then I should vote another way. I think it vitally important that the Senate and every Senator should understand the effect of the vote that he is to give on this proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Chair is compelled to rule he would rule that it carried the whole question.

Mr. HILL. I respectfully appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not ruled yet.

Mr. DUBOIS. Of course Senators desire to vote advisedly on this question, and it seems to me we can reach the same conclusion by a simpler method; that is, by my withdrawing the motion to lay on the table, and thus let the vote come directly on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. HALE. That is it.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. DUBOIS. Therefore I withdraw my motion to lay on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion is withdrawn. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON].

Mr. ALLEN. Let it be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be stated.

The Secretary read as follows:

Mr. ALLISON moves to refer the resolution and amendments to the Committee on Rules, with instructions to report the same back to the Senate on the first Monday of December, either with or without amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Question!

Mr. CULLOM. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CALL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. CANNON (when his name was called). I am paired on this question with the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON]. If he were here, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CLARK (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. DANIEL (when his name was called). I beg leave to state that I am paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. JONES]. Otherwise I should vote "nay."

Mr. MANTLE (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. JONES]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN].

Mr. VILAS (when Mr. VEST's name was called). The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], who was a short time since called from the Chamber, desired me, in case he was not able to return, to announce that he is paired on this question with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], and that if present he would vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 40, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—40.

Aldrich,	Cullom,	Hoar,	Sewell,
Allison,	Faulkner,	Lindsay,	Sherman,
Bacon,	Frye,	McMillan,	Smith,
Bate,	Gear,	Mitchell, Wis.	Thurston,
Berry,	Gibson,	Morgan,	Vilas,
Brice,	Gorman,	Pasco,	Voorhees,
Burrows,	Gray,	Perkins,	Walthall,
Caffery,	Hale,	Platt,	Warren,
Cameron,	Harris,	Pugh,	Wetmore,
Cockrell,	Hawley,	Quay,	Wolcott.

NAYS—28.

Allen,	Davis,	Lodge,	Pritchard,
Baker,	Dubois,	McBride,	Roach,
Blanchard,	Gallinger,	Martin,	Squire,
Brown,	George,	Mills,	Tillman,
Butler,	Hansbrough,	Nelson,	Turpie,
Carter,	Hill,	Palmer,	White,
Chilton,	Kyle,	Peffer,	Wilson.

NOT VOTING—21.

Blackburn,	Elkins,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Stewart,
Call,	Gordon,	Morrill,	Teller,
Cannon,	Irby,	Murphy,	Vest.
Chandler,	Jones, Ark.	Pettigrew,
Clark,	Jones, Nev.	Proctor,
Daniel,	Mantle,	Shoup,

So the resolution was referred to the Committee on Rules.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins be made the unfinished business in the Senate, excepting appropriation bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the joint resolution relating to the distribution of seeds shall be made the unfinished business of the Senate as against all other business except appropriation bills. Is there objection?

Mr. CALL. I hope the Senator from North Dakota will ask the Senate to agree upon a time to vote upon the joint resolution. There are several resolutions, the Cuban resolution particularly, that I desire to have brought up as soon as the appropriation bills will allow. I suggest to the Senator that he ask unanimous consent that we shall vote on the joint resolution at a particular time.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I will say to the Senator from Florida that on Monday morning I shall endeavor to reach an agreement of that kind.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from North Dakota will remember that I yielded to him upon his joint resolution a day or two ago with the understanding that the resolution offered by me in relation to the bill reported by the Committee on Finance shall be taken up on Monday and shall have precedence of all other business.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania continues as morning business. It went over without prejudice and is a part of the morning business on Monday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

GAINESVILLE, M'ALESTER AND ST. LOUIS RAILROAD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory.

The amendment of the House of Representatives was, in line 11, after the word "Arkansas," to insert:

SEC. 3. That section 3 of said act be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. That a right of way of 100 feet in width through said Indian Territory is hereby granted to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railway Company and a strip of land 100 feet in width, with a length of 2,000 feet in addition to the right of way is granted for such stations as may be established, but such grant shall be allowed but once for every 10 miles of the road, no portion of which shall be sold or leased by the company, with the right to use such additional grounds where there are heavy cuts or fills as may be necessary for the construction and maintenance of the roadbed, not exceeding 50 feet in width on each side of said right of way, or as much thereof as may be included in said cut or fill: Provided, That no more than said addition of land shall be taken for any one station: Provided further, That no part of the lands herein granted shall be used except in such manner and for such purposes only as shall be necessary for the construction and convenient operation of said railroad, telegraph, and telephone line, and when any portion thereof shall cease to be so used such portion shall revert to the nation or tribe of Indians from which the same shall have been taken."

SEC. 4. That section 6 of said act be amended by striking out all after the word "Provided" and inserting the following: "That a map of definite location showing the entire route of said road through the Indian Territory shall be filed and approved by the Secretary of the Interior before any part of the said road shall be constructed."

Mr. CHILTON. I ask the Senate to concur in the House amendment. It is merely a formal one. The bill has already passed the Senate. It had the approbation of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs, and passed the Senate. It went to the other House, and they have made an amendment which is acceptable to the parties interested. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

PATENTS IN POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

Mr. KYLE. I submit a resolution calling for information. I presume there will be no objection to its consideration now. It is very short.

Mr. CHANDLER. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire objects.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. KYLE. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will allow this resolution to go through. It merely calls for information.

Mr. CHANDLER. I gave notice that I would move an adjournment at 2 o'clock.

Mr. KYLE. I should like to have my resolution read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will be read.

Mr. LODGE. I object to any further business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts objects.

Mr. KYLE. May I not introduce the resolution and have it read and go over until Monday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to that request? The resolution, without objection, will be received.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inform the Senate whether any person or persons in the employ of the Post-Office Department has applied for or has received any patent for an invention or improvement of existing invention made or received since his entry into the employ of the Post-Office Department touching any article used by such Department; and whether such employee has received any royalty in respect to the same.

Mr. DANIEL. I ask the Senate to take up and consider——

Mr. LODGE. I thought a motion to adjourn had been made by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

Mr. DANIEL. I have the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will state to the Senator from Virginia that I have had the floor on a motion to adjourn for a long time. It was understood that Senators upon this side of the Chamber wished an adjournment at 2 o'clock for a particular purpose.

Mr. DANIEL. I have the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is a matter never interfered with before that I know of in the history of the Senate.

Mr. DANIEL. The Senator is giving me a piece of information I did not possess.

Mr. CHANDLER. I understand perfectly. I know the Senator did not mean to insist upon it.

Mr. DANIEL. I always respect a consideration of that sort. I did not understand the situation.

Mr. CHANDLER. Unless in the case of very urgent business, I must insist on my motion.

Mr. DANIEL. I will not make the motion that I intended to make.

Mr. CHANDLER. I would prefer to have the Senator withhold his motion, as I have a motion to adjourn pending.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 10, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 6, 1896.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 10.30 a. m. (Friday, February 7), and was called to order by the Speaker.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege, not to retract anything that I have said or to apologize for anything that I have said, but it having been——

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] that as the meeting this morning is for debate only on a particular subject——

Mr. TALBERT. I will state that I would like to be heard now. I have been misrepresented by the press——

The SPEAKER. The Chair suggests to the gentleman whether it would not be best for him to wait until the session opens at 12 o'clock, when an opportunity will be afforded——

Mr. TALBERT. I would prefer to go on right now and make my statement. Will you recognize me, Mr. Speaker, at 12 o'clock?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will be obliged to recognize the gentleman on "a question of personal privilege." The Chair thinks it would be better that the gentleman should not proceed now, because these understandings in regard to order of business ought never under any circumstances to be violated.

COIN REDEMPTION FUND.

The House, according to order, resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of the revenue.

[Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, the issue presented by this bill is a plain one between the policy of gold monometallism as against bimetallism. No ingenuity of words or plausibility of statement can disguise the plain situation presented at this time. No gentleman here will deny that we are now on a gold monometallic basis. To be relieved of that basis, and of the conditions produced by it, the Senate framed and passed the bill now under consideration. In the able argument of the distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] against this bill, every argument possible to be presented in the time occupied by him adverse to the bill was placed before the House. The fact that that gentleman devoted his entire time to criticising the remedy proposed in the Senate bill and did not at any time give expression to any view favorable to the maintenance of the gold standard, but, on the contrary, especially avowed his fidelity to bimetallism, without pointing out any practical manner of achieving it, has left the House without the benefit of his valuable opinion upon that question, and has been to that extent a disappointment to many of us.

The gentleman from Maine is probably the best equipped man upon the floor of this House for the performance of his duty as a Representative of the people, and it is with great diffidence that I undertake to make any reply to the masterly presentation of the antifree-coinage argument made by him to the committee in the opening of this debate. That diffidence is not in the least dispelled by the thought that whatever may be said by me must be compressed within the small space allotted to me for the discussion of this great question. In his argument the gentleman from Maine charges that France and the Latin Union having entered into the agreement to maintain a bimetallic standard, were compelled to abandon that standard and were unable to maintain it. Upon what authority was such a statement made? The history of the transactions of those Governments with respect to the maintenance of bimetallic coinage nowhere discloses the inability of those Governments to maintain the coinage of gold and silver.

On the contrary, the reason assigned by France for her course in closing her mints to the coinage of silver was that she did not propose to aid her ancient foe, Germany, by absorbing her silver. I have been unable to find any authority to justify the statement that these nations were compelled, by reason of their inability to maintain the standard, to abandon it. The gentleman says that France and the United States are maintaining, tentatively, precisely the same coinage policy, not gold monometallism, but limited bimetallism. With every respect for that gentleman and for his profound knowledge of public questions, I most respectfully deny the truth of that statement.

The United States and France both have gold and silver money, but in France gold and silver are standard money, while in the United States, under the administration of a law declaratory of a bimetallic standard, gold is standard money and silver is token money. Gentlemen tell us that they are trying to do justice to both metals—to do justice between them. As well might a father undertake "to do justice" between two sons in this way: He might say to William, "I will give you $50,000, and you shall have a store on this side of the street"; and then he might say to John, "I will give you $50,000, and you shall have a store on the other side of the street." So far the action of that father would seem to do equal and exact justice between his sons; but if, after having made this equal division, he should march up and down the street and say to the people who came to buy: "Do not go near John's store; he sells bad goods; he will cheat you; he will not give you your money's worth; if you want to buy anything go to William's store"—if that father, professing to do equal and exact justice between his sons, should act in that manner, he would be acting as the Government of the United States acts with reference to gold and silver as money metals. Professing to treat them with equal justice, it practically says to the people and to the world: "We coin gold and silver as money, but take care to have nothing to do with our silver; it is bad money; it is worthless; it is a fraud."

Let the administration of the law governing our gold and silver currency be carried into effect upon the same lines and upon the same theory which obtains in the French Government, and the statement of the gentleman from Maine and those who act with him will be correct. Let the United States Government, the Government of a nation of 70,000,000 of people and sixty-five billions of wealth, follow the example of the great Bank of France and use the option which it possesses under the law to pay the demands against it in gold or silver, and the United States Government will stand on a par in its credit with the great French Republic.

Who has heard of any assaults upon the credit of France? Who has heard that her ability to pay any portion of her six billions of indebtedness has ever been questioned or doubted for a moment? What Frenchman has ever been compelled to read in the public prints charges that the money of his country, or any of it, was a cheap or worthless money?

France has 38,000,000 people, owes a debt of $6,000,000,000, and maintains $700,000,000 of silver currency at par with her gold. The United States has 70,000,000 people, owes a debt of $847,361,960, and had July 1, 1895, $500,243,653 of silver coin. And yet we are told that with our superiority of resources, with almost double her population, and less than one-seventh of her debt, we can not absorb and maintain at parity the annual product of the silver which would come to our mints. The total product of the world of gold and silver for the year 1894, at its coinage value, was only $216,892,000. Of this amount $113,095,000 was silver at its coinage value. Of this amount the United States produced only $64,000,000—less than $1 for every man, woman, and child within the limits of our country. Does anyone contend that, with the population of the United States increasing regularly at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, the trivial increase to the currency which would be occasioned by adding less than $1 per capita of silver would in any way imperil the parity of the two metals, if the United States would exercise its option and maintain the parity by redeeming its obligations as the law authorizes it to do, in either gold or silver?

Sir, it has always been the contention of the advocates of bimetallism on the part of the United States, independent of any other nation, that the exercise of the option conferred by law on the Government would maintain the parity both between the gold and silver coins, and between the coinage and market value of our silver.

That it would do so is best proved by the experience of France. The United States, under the administration of its laws as they now exist, is purely upon a gold basis. France, in the administration of its laws, is upon a bimetallic basis, not coining gold and silver freely, but using its option to pay either.

Every member of this House is probably familiar with the fact that if a citizen of this country or any other goes to the Bank of France with a draft upon which he desires money, he will be paid that money in either gold or silver at the option of that bank, and by this means, even with the persistent pressure on the part of gold-using countries to depreciate silver in the markets of the world, France has always maintained the integrity of her currency. And she is to-day a prosperous, thriving nation, while we are under the curse of the twin producers of cheapness—the gold standard and the Democratic tariff for revenue only.

The gentleman from Maine inquires for what reason the advocates of independent bimetallism believe that the United States could alone coin silver freely without detriment to the integrity of its currency? The answer to that is, first, that prior to its demonetization it did coin silver freely and without injury; second, Japan, with only 41,000,000 people, less skilled in the sciences and the arts than ours, and with fewer resources, coins silver freely, and presents a picture of prosperity to-day compared with which the depression in all branches of trade in all gold-standard countries is a standing, living rebuke to the assumption of superiority on the part of those nations claiming to have reached the highest civilization. This opinion is not alone entertained by the Senators and Representatives who vote for silver, and are therefore openly charged by the gold-standard press with personal dishonor and with actually misrepresenting their people, but the opinion has been countenanced and expressed by some of the highest authorities in the financial world. Sir Henry Hucks Gibbs, a director in the Bank of England, and a recognized authority in Great Britain upon monetary questions, before the English commission which met in 1888 to investigate the financial question, when asked if Great Britain alone could maintain bimetallism, promptly replied, "Yes, or any other great commercial nation."

The United States is the greatest producing nation on the globe. In its products consists its wealth. From its products its obligations must be paid. Their value measured in gold (and all values in the United States are now measured in gold) must of necessity be great or small according as the supply of the measure of value is limited or extensive.

The year 1895 has added to the world's supply of gold about $200,000,000. Of this amount about 75 per cent has been used in the arts and in supplying the losses from accumulated stocks of gold. Therefore there has actually been added to the gold currency of the world in the year 1895 about $50,000,000. The population of the world is about 1,500,000,000 of people. Therefore there has been added to the world's stock of gold money about 3⅓ cents per capita for every man, woman, and child. The increase in the gold currency, it will be observed, has not and can not possibly keep pace with the growth of population, the growth of industries, and the consequent demand for sufficient currency for the successful transaction of business.

I can understand how a great consuming nation like Great Britain, absorbing the surplus products of the world, should be interested in depreciating the price of those products by maintaining a constantly appreciating standard of money. But it is difficult for me to understand by what process of reasoning gentlemen are able to convince themselves that a producing nation, any more than an individual producer, can possibly be interested in lowering the value of the things which constitute its fund of wealth. It is not the token money which is the measure of value; it is the money of ultimate redemption.

Under our Constitution that money is gold and silver; under the law and its administration gold is the standard and all other money is token money. It is a rule of monetary science which I presume no gentleman will dispute that if you double the supply of money (and when I say "money" I mean standard money) you double the value of the commodities whose value is measured in money.

A statement was made some time ago, about a year ago, in the New York Tribune that the values of railroad stocks had depreciated in the previous two years about $1,000,000,000. It is not wonderful that this is so. What gives to railroad stocks their value? The earning capacity of the road. What gives earning capacity to the road? The producing capacity of the country tributary to it. What stimulus is there to the farmer, the producer of wheat, of corn, of oats, of barley, of cotton, and of stock, to raise and put upon the market the products of his farms when the prices, measured in gold as they are, are in many instances less than the cost of production? And, Mr. Speaker, in spite of the statements and the arguments of the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] yesterday, I want to say that I know that in my own State the farmers have been raising crops of grain without profit, and even at a loss in many instances. These figures which are cited here may show a greater yield per acre, but that may be accounted for by the exceptional yield of the year on which the gentleman from North Dakota bases his argument. As a matter of fact, we all know that many a farmer in our respective States—and it is not confined by any means to the Rocky Mountain States; it applies also to the Mississippi Valley States—we all know that many a farmer has been of late years no more than able to pay the cost of sowing and harvesting and marketing his crop. Give the farmer and stock raiser such a price for what he produces as will enable him to make a fair and reasonable profit and the freight earnings of your great railroads will be swelled to such an extent that an occasional dividend will be in sight, instead of a perpetual deficit and a receiver.

In support of our contention that the free coinage of gold and silver at the existing ratio by the United States would fix and maintain an actual parity between the market and coinage value of silver, I desire to read briefly from the report of the royal commission of 1888 on gold and silver. The report was made in three parts. Part 1 was signed by all of the commissioners, consisting of six gold-standard men and six silver men; one of the gold-standard men, Mr. Courtney, has since renounced his gold-standard views and declared for bimetallism. This is the statement made by that commission:

Nor does it appear to us a priori unreasonable to suppose that the existence in the Latin Union of a bimetallic system with a ratio of 15½ to 1 fixed between the two metals should have been capable of keeping the market price of silver steady at approximately that ratio.

The view that it could only affect the market price to the extent to which there was a demand for it for currency purposes in the Latin Union or to which it was actually taken to the mints of those countries is, we think, fallacious.

The fact that the owner of silver could in the last resort take it to those mints and have it converted into coin which would purchase commodities at the ratio of 15½ of silver to 1 of gold would, in our opinion, be likely to affect the price of silver in the market generally, whoever the purchaser and for whatever country it was destined. It would enable the seller to stand out for a price approximating to the legal ratio, and would tend to keep the market steady at about that point.

It will be observed by inspection of the report of the Director of the Mint for 1895 that the total stock of silver coin in France is only $487,900,000. The report of the Director for 1891 shows that there was $700,000,000 of silver coin in France. It is difficult to understand upon what basis the last estimate of the Director is made, if the estimate of 1891 is correct, unless it be upon the hypothesis that it is a part of the Administration's policy to attempt to show that France is discarding her silver money, for an examination of Mr. J. Barr Robertson's work on Bimetallism, published in 1895, shows that in 1892 the imports of silver into France exceeded the exports $720,000, and in 1893 the imports of silver exceeded the exports $1,320,000, while in 1894 the exports only exceeded the imports $680,000. Therefore if this table be correct, and it is compiled from Dr. Soetbeer's estimates, it would seem that there is no foundation for the charge that France is abandoning her silver money. It may be, as an explanation for the discrepancy, that the Director of our Mint has failed to take into consideration the foreign silver coin amounting to over $120,000,000 in circulation in France.

The gentleman from Maine seems to shrink with horror when he contemplates the danger of this country being placed on a par with Mexico.

Mr. Speaker, while it has never been the belief of the advocates of bimetallism by the United States that its adoption would lead to silver monometallism, it is but fair to say that the condition of Mexico and Japan, both silver-using countries, is so much better from the standpoint of profitable production than that of the United States under the gold standard that I feel that a dignified silence upon the part of our people when making comparisons between those nations and ours in their present industrial conditions would redound to our benefit.

The following extract from the Boston Herald, under date of February 1, 1896, indicates a condition of affairs in Mexico which I am of the opinion the distinguished gentleman from Maine would be glad to have transplanted to some of the idle factories of the New England States:

The remarkable prosperity of Mexican cotton mills, which are declaring big dividends, in some cases 20 per cent, has attracted the attention of the press.

And I want to ask the gentleman from Maine how many mills in the New England States within the last twelve months have declared a 20 per cent dividend or a 10 per cent dividend?

The Mexican Herald declares that—

"Mexico is now in position to invade the markets of the west coast of South America in competition with Germany, England, and all other countries on a gold basis. It is very significant that Mexican print works are now selling goods direct to ports on the Pacific coast of Mexico and taking the market away from the gold-standard countries, which can only be done now because the west coast is quickly accessible.

"One of the greatest merchants, forty years in business and a large importer from Europe, says that it it no longer possible for the United States or Europe to compete with Mexican mills, which can turn out excellent cottons at $1.25 less per piece. Mexico is growing more cotton yearly, and will soon be able to supply itself without bringing in American cotton; and as the growing and manufacturing are done on the basis of cheap labor and silver money, Mexico should aspire to enter the lists as an exporter of cotton goods.

"There is an ample field here for the investment of capital in cotton mills, also in paper and other products. Mexican woolens are now being turned out of superior quality, and thousands of people are refusing to buy expensive English goods. Tailors are supplying their growing demand at prices less than one-half those charged for European goods. For example, trousers are being sold at $5 per pair which if made of English goods would cost $14. Mexican manufacturers are very prosperous, and there is undoubtedly a chance for a modern shoe factory. The policy of the Government is to render Mexico independent as far as possible of the foreign gold-standard countries. This tends to give employment to railways, and the policy of the Mexican Central Railway in favoring every Mexican industry on its various lines is cordially commended in Government circles. The road has become thoroughly Mexican in policy, with resultant higher earnings.

"Hundreds of Americans are here, among them many capitalists, and there is a great interest shown in coffee lands and lands for general agricultural purposes. Sugar planters were never more prosperous than now, and this industry can not easily be overdone, as the domestic demand is not filled and profits will be large for many years. The National Bank of Mexico will in May declare a dividend of 17 per cent and add heavily to its reserve. The active capital of the bank is $8,000,000 and the reserve $5,000,000."

I join hands with the gentleman from Maine in advocacy of the great Republican principle of protection, but say to him frankly that no protective tariff under a gold monometallic standard will be adequate to foster the industries of this country. No tariff can be made high enough to protect American producers from Asiatic competition.

Gold monometallism and free trade are the twin sisters of cheapness. It is the avowed object of both to cheapen every product to the consumer, and experience has taught us that the objects have been accomplished. Bimetallism—that is, the equal use and recognition of gold and silver as standard money—and protection are both intended to enable the producer to receive a higher price for his product. It is therefore not difficult for me to understand why the President, who is an advocate of the gold standard and free trade, should oppose any policy designed to give added value to any commodity. His entire interest seems to be confined to the holders of gold, and when they are cared for he doubtless feels that his duty is done. But when the gentleman from Maine is found opposing a policy designed to elevate rather than depress the values which go to make up the wealth of this nation by refusing to remove the conditions which depress all values, and at the same time advocates the protective theory, he is certainly open to the charge of driving a team one horse of which is going in one direction and one in the other.

The gentleman no doubt finds now, and will to a much greater extent find in the future, manufactured articles from Japan excluding American manufactured articles in the markets of the world. Anyone who has read carefully the reports of the growth of the manufacturing industries in Japan must be blind indeed who is not apprised of the wonderful strides that nation has made in the establishment and growth of its manufacturing industries.

With the permission of the House, I shall print, as a portion of my remarks, some extracts from newspapers upon this question of the development of manufactures in Japan, for that development is going to do more to open the eyes of the Eastern manufacturers to the iniquity of the single gold standard than all the arguments that can be offered on this floor.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose briefly to refer to the position of the Republican party in its declarations in the national platform of 1892 upon the question of bimetallism. The following is the plank:

FREE AND SAFE COINAGE OF GOLD AND SILVER.

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions, to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal. The interests of the producers of the country, its farmers and its workingmen, demand that every dollar, paper or coin, issued by the Government shall be as good as any other. We commend the wise and patriotic steps already taken by our Government to secure an international conference to adopt such measures as will insure a parity of value between gold and silver for use as money throughout the world.

Now, sir, a careful reading of that plank will disclose the fact that the first twenty-four words thereof are declaratory of a principle; they specifically commit the party to bimetallism and the use of both gold and silver as standard money. The remaining portion of that plank is devoted entirely to declarations relative to the achievements of bimetallism and the maintenance of the two metals at a parity.

The method of achieving bimetallism as advocated by the gentleman from Maine and those who agree with him is through an international monetary conference which requires the consent of Great Britain. I presume there is no member of this House who believes for one moment that Great Britain can be induced to abandon the gold standard and adopt bimetallism, for the simple reason that she is the great creditor nation and the great consuming nation of the world. If that be true, then the road to bimetallism marked out in our platform is hopelessly blocked. If that be true, then the declaration is meaningless and bimetallism can not be achieved in that way.

Republican Representatives who agree with the distinguished gentleman from Maine do not think that the United States can go to independent bimetallism, and therefore they will not travel our road. That being the case, firmly adhering to my conviction that the United States is perfectly able to achieve independent bimetallism, but desirous of having our eastern Republican brethren reach that desired goal, I propose for the purpose of this present debate and vote that we blaze a new trail, and I therefore send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read the following amendment, which I propose to offer to the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 1. That the President is hereby authorized and directed to call a commercial and tariff conference, to assemble at the city of Washington, not later than June 1, 1896, to be composed of representatives of silver-using countries.

SEC. 2. That at such conference the representatives of the United States Government are directed on the part of this Government to endeavor to secure a compact between the countries there represented for the mutual benefit of the contracting parties, which compact or agreement shall contain, among such other provisos as may be deemed advisable, the following propositions, to wit:

First. The silver-using countries represented at such conference and agreeing to the compact shall open their ports to the free admission of all products of this country, in exchange for which the United States will open its mints to the coinage of silver.

Second. A discriminating duty shall be levied against imports brought into the country from gold-standard countries, and all duties upon goods imported into this country from such gold-using countries shall be paid in gold.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I propose to offer this amendment only for the purpose of finding out to what extent the Republicans of the East are willing to go in the direction of bimetallism. I do not yield one jot or tittle from my former position, that the Senate bill in itself as it stands is the proper and complete solution of the present difficulty, and I repeat I shall offer this amendment only for the purpose of seeing what support can be obtained for this bimetallic idea from the Republicans of the East.

The opponents of bimetallism insist that the burden of proof in this argument is upon the supporters of bimetallism. The contention of the distinguished gentleman from Maine was that it was incumbent upon us to show that the adoption by the United States of the system of coinage provided for by the Senate bill would redound to the benefit of the country. Nearly all of the opponents of this system insist that the proposal of the Senate is experimental legislation.

Mr. Speaker, such is not the fact. The fact is that for four thousand years the money of the world consisted of gold and silver, and not until 1816 was there any attempt to make a single standard of gold. In all those years abundant opportunity to discover the imperfections of the bimetallic standard and to repudiate it was given, but the wisdom of ages has demonstrated the soundness of the system, and as a result its retention naturally followed. The experiment of a gold standard was tried and has utterly failed. It is unnecessary for me to go into the details surrounding the successive actions of certain Governments looking to the establishment of the gold standard. It is sufficient, however, to say that in Germany and Austria there is a growing sentiment looking to the rejection of the gold standard and reestablishment of bimetallism.

The experience of those countries, like the experience of the United States, has been that the system has been disastrous to the producing classes. And since production is the source and foundation of all wealth, the evil effects of any system which depreciates the values of products must of necessity sap the foundation of wealth. The United States is experiencing now the beneficial effects of a gold standard. Either it must remain or some other standard be substituted in its stead. What have you of the opposition to propose in lieu of the present system? What have you to propose instead of the Senate bill except a continued and uninterrupted issue of bonds? Your sacred gold reserve has touched the forty-seven-million point to-day. How do you propose to cure the situation? The answer is by the issuance of more bonds. And how long will this practice be kept up? When will the day of reckoning come? These bonds must some time be paid. They will be paid by the people of the United States from their accumulated wealth and their accumulated earnings. Which is better for the people of a producing nation, an appreciating standard, which lowers the prices of all commodities, or a depreciating standard, which raises the price of all the products of human toil? You who vote and who propose to vote to maintain this standard have no remedy to propose. You stand here helpless. We offer you a solution which the experience of forty centuries has approved, and we are told that this is experimental legislation and that the United States can not undertake to restore silver unaided and alone.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to the opinion of Sir Henry Hucks Gibbs, referred to in a former part of my remarks, I desire to call the attention of the House to an item in the London Financial News expressive of the English fear that the United States will adopt the free coinage of silver and its effect upon English trade, as follows:

There is a plain moral in the remark that if the United States would venture to cut herself adrift from Europe and take outright to silver she would have all America and Asia at her back and would command the markets of both continents. The barrier of gold would be more fatal than any barrier of the custom-house. The bond of silver would be stronger than any bond of free trade.

There can be no doubt about it that if the United States were to adopt a silver basis to-morrow British trade would be ruined before the year was out.

Mr. Speaker, the duty and responsibility of solving this great question will, in my judgment, rest upon the Republican party. That party has furnished a solution for every great question presented to it by the American people since its existence. It furnished a stern and final solution of all of the difficulties growing out of the great strife. It gave us our liberal homestead laws, and wrote upon the statute books of this country in various acts the beneficent provisions of protection. It remains to be seen whether or not it will neutralize the splendid achievements of the past by lying supinely down and submitting to the perpetual riveting upon this great producing country a system of finance whose purpose and effect is to depreciate the value of every acre of land, of every bushel of wheat, of every pound of cotton, and of every day's labor owned by the citizens of the Republic. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for three minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request that the time of the gentleman from Montana be extended for three minutes?

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, as is well known, I have no desire to cut off the gentleman in his remarks, and if I can be assured some time in which to be heard upon this subject I shall not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is hardly a time to make bargains. Does the gentleman from Nebraska object?

Mr. KEM. I must object, Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances.

Mr. HARTMAN. Under the permission of the House I desire to insert in the RECORD the following editorial from Mr. Wharton Barker's excellent paper, the American, of January 18, 1896, entitled "Protection without bimetallism impossible," and mark it Appendix A:

APPENDIX A.

PROTECTION WITHOUT BIMETALLISM IMPOSSIBLE.

Under gold monometallism a protective tariff is an impossibility, for no tariff can be made high enough to protect our producers from Asiatic competition, fostered by the appreciation of gold. Receiving pay for what they sell to us, or England, or any other gold-using country, in gold that has appreciated as measured in silver, their standard of value, 100 per cent, the silver-using peoples can afford to sell their agricultural products and manufactured goods for just one-half the price in gold of what they would be obliged to charge if the parity between gold and silver had not been destroyed and gold had not appreciated as compared to silver 100 per cent, for 50 cents in gold is now worth as much to them as $1 twenty-five years ago.

The divergence in the value of gold and silver has enabled the silver-using peoples to cut the prices of what they sell to gold-using countries in half, without reducing the silver price which they receive, and, as the purchasing power of silver is as great with them as ever, without curtailing their profits. As the Japanese and Chinese learn to use European and American machinery, and as they learn by experience to economize in production, adopting the improved methods of production, and profiting from the experience of Western civilization, they are naturally enabled to reduce the cost of production, but aside from any cheapening of production, the producer in Japan or China, or other silver-using nation, can sell in America, or England, or Germany, or any gold-using nation, for just one-half the price in gold that he could before the parity between silver and gold was destroyed by demonetizing silver, without reducing his profit one jot.

The Chinese tael, based on silver, and the Japanese silver yen go just as far as ever, will buy as much labor, pay for the production of as much cotton, or yarn, or cotton cloth as ever. With the tael, worth 68 cents in gold, or the yen, worth 50 cents, the Chinese or Japanese manufacturer can produce as much as when the tael was worth $1.36 in gold and the yen $1, and even more, because of the use of improved machinery, but with the gold received in gold-using countries for what he sells to such countries he can buy exchange for twice as many taels or twice as many yens as he could when silver had not commenced to depreciate as measured by gold. Thus he is enabled to sell at half price in gold.

To keep our markets our manufacturers must meet this. But meet it they can not. Try as they will, they can not cheapen production so as to enable them to do so. They may improve machinery and economize in production, but their silver competitors will promptly avail of the same improved machinery and the same economies in production. In this way our manufacturers can gain no advantage over their Asiatic competitors. Just so far as silver has fallen as measured by gold our manufacturers must reduce prices, or the difference will result as a bounty on imports and lead to the import and sale of Chinese and Japanese goods in place of those of home manufacture.

Under gold monometallism the necessity of meeting competition with silver-using peoples, fostered by a bounty of 100 per cent in the shape of a premium on gold can not be avoided, but for our maufacturers to meet this competition successfully is impossible. All manufacturers, whether debtors in their individual capacity or not, have their share of fixed charges, charges calling for a fixed number of dollars to bear. Each must bear a portion of the national and State and municipal indebtedness, that becomes more burdensome as gold appreciates. Taxes to meet interest on this debt, taxes that can not be reduced, he must pay, whether profits are large or none, whether commodities are high or low. If he is indebted individually, as most of them are, he is just that much worse off.

Taxes, and interest, and rents he can not reduce, nor can he reduce his largest item of outlay, wages, in anything like proportion to the depreciation of silver as measured by gold. Attempts to cut wages must lead to strikes and lockouts, for the wage earner can not but resist such reductions. He buys at retail, and the butcher's and baker's and grocer's prices do not fall with wholesale prices, as is only natural, but much later, and then not so far. The result is, cuts in wages mean to the wage earner a lower standard of living such as alone the cravings of hunger for himself and family will force him to accept. And, if driven by hunger and suffering, the laborer loses hope and incentive, and he is no longer capable of the same effort or of performing the same amount of work as when he labors hopefully and ambitiously. For the manufacturer to cut wages in like degree with the fall in prices is impossible, and in attempting to do so he must destroy the superiority of his workmen.

To compete with Asiatic competition, fostered by the premium on gold, a bounty that we ourselves blindly pay to exporters in silver-using countries, is already ruinous. It must soon become impossible.

Gold prices have not fallen so far as the gold price of silver. The difference acts as a bounty on exports from silver-using to gold-using nations.

In this way blind adherence to the gold standard is enabling Japanese and Chinese to undersell us in our own markets. But it is not in this alone that we suffer from the divergence in the value of gold and silver, and it is not the bonus we pay exporters in silver-using countries that is alone undermining and must undermine and counteract any tariff that we vainly try to make protective under gold monometallism.

The same difference between the gold price of silver and the price of commodities in America and England and Germany and other gold-using countries acts as a protective wall around the silver-using world. Manufacturers, here or in England or Germany, sending their goods to silver-using countries ask gold in payment. This gold costs the people in such countries just twice as much to get as before the demonetization of silver, and unless the goods are offered to them at half price, the price asked represents an enhanced value to them. Manufacturers in gold-using countries can not reduce the price of their goods in any such proportion for reasons already given. The result is that the price of European or American goods has been enhanced in China and Japan, although our manufactures sell for much less in gold than formerly. The price to the Chinese and Japanese is not enhanced 100 per cent, which about represents the appreciation of gold in their money, for the gold prices our manufacturers ask are somewhat less than heretofore. But whether the price is enhanced 40 or 50 per cent, it is just so much protection. It drives the Japanese and Chinese to make for themselves what they can not, at the enhanced prices, afford to buy abroad. The result is that European and American goods are being crowded, not alone out of China and Japan, not alone out of India, despite the efforts of England and the closing of the Indian mints, but out of all silver-using nations. The markets of silver-using nations being closed against English and German manufactures, the pressure to sell them in America is much greater than it would otherwise be.

Thus our manufacturers, excluded from the Eastern markets, are forced to meet an unnatural competition, not alone with Chinese and Japanese manufacturers, but with European as well.

But this is not all. Seeking a market for their produce in England and Germany, our farmers are obliged to sell their wheat in competition with Indian and Mexican wheat raised on a silver and of Argentine and Russian wheat raised on a paper basis, while our planters have to compete with Indian cotton. Our competitors for the markets of England have been enabled, because of the appreciation of gold, to cut the price they ask for their wheat and cotton in half without reducing the amount of silver which they receive in payment. To meet this competition, our farmers and planters have been forced to accept lower and lower prices as the gold price of silver has fallen. Unlike their competitors, who are recompensed for the lower prices they receive by the premium in their currency of the gold they receive in payment, our planters and farmers, raising wheat and cotton on a gold basis, paying taxes and interest and other fixed charges in gold, and finding that the much smaller amount in gold which they receive and spend on a gold basis goes but little farther than heretofore in paying the cost of producing cotton and wheat and other produce, have been impoverished and ruined and are absolutely unable to buy manufactured goods liberally as heretofore.

Thus the gold standard destroys the home market for our manufactures. We must make the farmers prosperous before they can buy liberally manufactured goods, and they can not become prosperous while forced to sell their produce in competition with silver-using peoples and handicapped by the appreciating gold standard.

Until bimetallism is restored and the unfair advantage which the appreciation of gold has conferred on the silver-using peoples in competition with the gold-using is destroyed, no tariff can be made protective. The first step toward the reestablishment of a true protective system must be the restoration of bimetallism. Any attempt to restore protection without bimetallism will fail.

Protection must be united with bimetallism. To endeavor to make a tariff protective under gold monometallism is folly.

Also the editorial from the same paper of the same date, entitled "Cheapening of production not accountable for the fall in prices," and mark it Appendix B.

APPENDIX B.

CHEAPENING OF PRODUCTION NOT ACCOUNTABLE FOR THE FALL IN PRICES.

Improved methods of production, the introduction of economies, and the substitution of improved and labor-saving machinery, resulting in a reduction of the labor cost of production, do not of necessity lead to a fall in prices. Prices naturally adjust themselves to the money cost of production, for men will not permanently work at a loss, and if the price that can be obtained for a commodity is not sufficient to recompense those engaged in its production for their outlay of money, time, and energy, production will be curtailed until, as a result of the reduced supply, the price rises to a point that will repay those engaged in it for their expenditure of money and labor in production; and if, on the other hand, the price of any commodity rises much above the cost of reproduction, those engaged in less profitable employments will be tempted to embark in the production of that commodity by the prospects of larger profits, and production will be thereby increased until, as a result of the increased supply, the price falls back to a point that will not tempt further increase of production.

But the money cost of production does not always fall with the introduction of labor-saving machinery, resulting in a cheapening of the labor cost of production, and if the money cost of production does not fall, prices will not fall. Unless there is a change in the value of money, the cheapening in the cost of production of any commodity must lead to a fall in price, and the general introduction of improved methods of production and transportation to a general fall in prices proportionate to the saving of labor, time, and energy in production and distribution. But such a tendency of prices to fall consequent upon a cheapening of the actual cost of production may be entirely offset by an increase of the quantity of money in circulation and a fall in the price of money as measured by commodities.

The value of money is dependent upon supply and demand. When based on gold, as at present, the supply of money is limited to the amount of gold that is coined and available for coinage, for although paper money and bank credits are used extensively in exchanging commodities, such paper and credits are based on gold and redeemable in gold, and if the volume of gold is contracted the paper money and credits resting on gold must likewise be contracted. If the quantity of gold in use as money is increased, the quantity of paper money and bank credits based upon it may be increased; if the quantity of gold is contracted, the money and credits resting on such gold must be likewise contracted, just as a bank is obliged to contract credits when the cash in its vaults is depleted.

Those having money have but one use for it—to exchange it for those commodities they desire, and the greater the quantity of money in circulation the more money there will be to be exchanged, and hence the greater the demand for commodities. And as the quantity of money in circulation makes the demand for commodities, the quantity of goods in the hands of those desirous of selling them—that is, of exchanging them for money—constitutes the demand for money. It follows that the greater the quantity of goods on the market the greater the demand for money, and the greater the quantity of money the greater the demand for commodities. Thus an increase in the quantity of money, unless accompanied by a proportionate increase in the production of commodities, must lead to higher prices, while a decrease in the quantity of money must result in a falling off in the demand for commodities until a lower level of prices is reached.

A cheapening of the cost of production naturally leads to increased production and an increase in the quantity of goods in the hands of those seeking to exchange them for money, with the result that the demand for money is increased, money rises proportionately in value, and prices fall correspondingly. It is thus that improved methods of production tend to cause a fall of prices. But if the quantity of money happens to be increased so as to more than offset the increased demand, prices will rise despite cheapening of the cost of production, while, on the contrary, if the value of money is contracted simultaneously with the introduction of labor-saving machinery, resulting in increased production and increased demand for money, prices will fall much further than they otherwise would.

Thus the period 1849-1872 was one of generally rising prices, although this period was marked by an unexampled rapidity in the perfection of labor-saving machinery, introduction of economies in manufacture, and of great extension of transportation facilities. Production went forward with leaps and bounds. The demand for money was greatly increased; yet money did not rise in value, but fell, and prices did not fall, but rose. And why? Simply because the discovery of gold in California and Australia led to an addition to the quantity of money in circulation, which was more than sufficient to offset the increased demand. As shown by the Senate report on comparative prices, prepared by Prof. R. P. Faulkner, prices were nearly 30 per cent higher in 1872 than in 1849.

This is positive proof that cheapening of the real cost of production does not always lead to lower prices. When prices do not fall as a result of the introduction of labor-saving machinery, the wage earner, whose wages are of necessity dependent upon the price received by the capitalist for the joint product of labor and capital, benefits by receiving higher wages. When prices fall as a result of improved methods of production, the wage earner may be benefited by being able to buy cheaper; but he will not be benefited to the same degree, for he buys at retail and his wages are fixed by wholesale prices, and retail prices do not fall as rapidly as wholesale prices.

Since 1873 prices have fallen, as shown by the Senate report before referred to, down to 1891, and by tables prepared especially for the American since, 35.6 per cent. The question is, what has been the cause of this fall? Gold monometallists have attributed it to the introduction of labor-saving machinery and a general saving of labor and time in production.

Progress has undoubtedly been made in cheapening the actual cost of production since 1873, with a tendency to lower prices, but there can be no doubt that the fall in prices is due primarily and chiefly to the rise in the value of money. The greatest advance in improved methods of production has been made in manufacturing establishments, and if the cause of the fall in prices was the cheapening of production, the products of such factories would naturally show the greatest decline in prices. But such is not the case. On the other hand, it is agricultural products that have fallen furthest. As shown by tables based on 100 staple commodities, which we have prepared, the general level of prices has fallen 14.71 per cent since January 1, 1891. For the same period breadstuffs have fallen 40.41 per cent, while manufactures of iron and steel have fallen but 28.51 per cent, and manufactures of textiles but 9.44 per cent, while raw cotton has fallen 17 per cent and wool over 40 per cent

During these five years there has been little if any cheapening in the cost of production of agricultural staples, yet they have fallen in price much further than manufactured articles in the manufacture of which the greatest advances have been made toward cheapening production by the constant improvement of machinery. This fact disproves the assertion that the fall in prices is due to cheapening of the actual cost of production.

For the fact that agricultural products have fallen much more rapidly than manufactured articles there is only one explanation, and that is that our agricultural products were the first to come into direct competition with the products of silver-using countries. The appreciation of gold, of the money which silver-using peoples receive in payment for what they sell to gold-using peoples, and which they can exchange for double the amount of silver that they could twenty years ago, has greatly encouraged production and stimulated exports from silver to gold using countries. To increase the area devoted to raising wheat and cotton was the work of a season; gathering experience and knowledge and building the factories to make manufactured goods the work of a decade or more. The result is that while our farmers and planters have suffered from the competition of silver-using countries for years, our manufacturers are only now beginning to feel Asiatic competition. This is the explanation of the fall in prices that has been more marked in agricultural than manufactured articles.

Relief can only be found in a return to bimetallism, the restoration of the parity between gold and silver, and the inauguration of a true protective tariff.

Also, as illustrative of the growth of manufacturing industries in Japan, the following argument from the pen of Mr. J. P. Young, quoting from various newspapers, and published in the San Francisco Chronicle of December 13, 1895, and mark it Appendix C:

APPENDIX C.

On the 15th of June last the Japan Weekly Gazette published a memorial, drawn up by the Yokohama Chamber of Commerce, in which the fact was pointed out "that Japan is becoming a great manufacturing country and rapidly advancing to a position of marked prominence in many branches of the Eastern trade." Figures furnished by the Agricultural Department show that the first cotton-spinning mill was erected in Japan in 1863, but twenty years later there were only 16 mills in operation, with 43,704 spindles. Since then the industry has advanced very rapidly. At the end of 1888 the number of spindles had increased to 88,140, and five years later there were 46 mills, running 600,000 spindles. The memorial above alluded to, commenting on the department report, says that "there is a prospect of even more rapid development," and adds, "We think it unnecessary to refer in detail to the many other manufactures in which Japan is not only supplying home wants, but is successfully competing with Europe in the markets of China, the Straits Settlements, and India."

Regarding Japanese trade with the United States and India, the memorial says: "We anticipate that if exchange with America remains at a very low level and the rupee continues to be held above its bullion value in India, China will eventually furnish to Japan all the cotton she needs, except such staples as can not be grown on Chinese soil. In evidence of this possibility the import of raw cotton from China into Japan increased from 61,328,021 pounds in 1891 to 95,115,180 pounds in 1893." So, if the conclusion of these Eastern observers is correct, the fatuous monetary policy of Great Britain and the United States will make it impossible for either India or the United States to compete with China in the matter of supplying raw cotton to Japan. Thus we shall soon be deprived of the sorry satisfaction of furnishing the progressive island Empire with the raw material for manufacturing the goods she promises to ultimately deluge us with.

That there is no illusion about this matter will readily be conceded by anyone who has attentively read the letters of Frank G. Carpenter, who has been devoting some time to studying the abilities of the Japanese. It may be remarked here that Mr. Carpenter does not write from the standpoint of a student of money. He is simply a trained newspaper correspondent in a strange land making use of his highly developed faculty of observation. In a letter written toward the close of 1894 Mr. Carpenter remarked: "By the new treaty Americans can go into business anywhere in Japan. They can set up factories and employ Japanese cheap labor to make goods for America. * * * The Japanese have for some time realized that the markets of the world are open to them. They are now studying our (American) tastes and are manufacturing for our markets. They are fast becoming a nation of inventors. * * * There is an American firm in Kobe which is shipping vast quantities of rugs to the United States and which is introducing the manufacture into Japan in a curious way." The writer then goes on to relate that the factory turning out these rugs sent artists to all the great museums in Europe, who devoted themselves to copying the rugs exhibited, which, on their return, were reproduced by Japanese workmen, who skillfully imitated the most difficult designs and colors.

The information furnished by Mr. Carpenter can be supplemented by some obtained in the city. It is a well-known fact that agents of Japanese manufactories frequently pass through San Francisco. Some of these have freely talked about the development of their country, and have not hesitated to make predictions of great things to be achieved in the future. A local merchant relates that about a year or more ago a Japanese made inquiries regarding a certain silk fabric manufactured in New Jersey or Massachusetts factories which, up to that time, had not been produced in Japan. After ascertaining the probable extent of the demand, he inquired whether he could fill an order at a much lower price than the American factories could possibly afford to produce the fabric. Of course he received the order. A few months after a consignment of the Japanese silk, in every respect equal to the American, was received, and the prospects are that in the near future, as its manufacture develops in Japan, this silk will entirely supersede the product of United States or French factories.

It is also a matter of common report that trained Japanese mechanics are studying all of the Western processes of manufacture likely to be easy of adaptation in their country. Mr. Carpenter has spoken of their efforts in the direction of manfacturing a certain class of rugs which are now shipped in large quantities to this country, but he does not appear to have learned the fact that the Japanese are contemplating the manufacture of carpets. They have had expert men copying American and English looms, and they will not hesitate to employ their extraordinary imitative abilities in turning out large quantities of the cheaper grades of tapestry and Brussels carpets as soon as they can get their machinery made. And it may be assumed as certain that the manufacture of cheap goods will be speedily followed by that of higher grade articles in this particular line. Recent achievements of the Japanese indicate unmistakably that, their attention being once turned to a thing, they are likely to investigate it thoroughly and develop it to its fullest extent.

But it is not only Japanese enterprise and ingenuity that we are obliged to consider. The disparity in wages between Eastern and Western countries and the fact that they may be paid in money made of a metal whose value, measured in gold terms, has greatly depreciated, have attracted the attention of shrewd Americans, Englishmen, and other foreigners to Japan, and they are preparing to take advantage of the superior facilities offered by that country for the profitable pursuit of manufacturing industries, having for their object the supply of the Japanese home demand and for export.

The British Trade Journal of a recent date says: "Among the trades more recently introduced in Japan is the manufacture of watches. In 1893 Japan imported more than 103,000 watches from Switzerland, France, Germany, and the United States. The object of the new Japanese factory is to produce a watch of the cheaper kind. * * * But it seems not unlikely that the new concern will manufacture a better class of timekeeper if the demand should necessitate such a step." There s no doubt about this latter point. Information from another source than that above quoted makes it clear that the American who is at the back of this new Japanese enterprise is merely paving the way to the creation of a great industry in which he proposes to take advantage of the undoubted skill of the Oriental workingmen, in order to turn out both low and high grade watches which will successfully compete with the best watches made in the Western World.

In Great Britain, where this new manufacturing development in the Orient has attracted more attention than in the United States, a peculiar attempt to find consolation is noted. Commenting on a paper read before the Royal Colonial Institute by T. F. Whitehead, a member of the legislative council of Hongkong, in which he pointed out the rapid growth of Oriental manufacturing industries, a London journal said: "Mr. Whitehead's paper, it seems to us, leaves entirely out of calculation many of the advantages which may result to our commerce from the extension of Japanese industries, however much they may interfere with the exports of manufactured goods from Europe to Japan itself. The establishment of manufacturing industries there must necessarily be accompanied by a large demand for machinery, apparatus, tools, chemicals, and other raw materials, and for the higher classes of skilled labor which this country can provide."

That this is a perilously shortsighted view to take of the situation a moment's reflection ought to convince anyone. What grounds for felicitation can Great Britain find in the fact that just at present she is shipping considerable cotton spinning and weaving machinery to Japan and China? It is true the manufacturer of the exported machinery has been benefited, but how about the cotton spinners and weavers of England, whose products are to be displaced by those of Japanese weavers and spinners operating English machinery in their own country?

But even the newly created demand for English machinery can not be depended upon to last long. The imitative faculty of the Japanese is well known, and their disposition to make the best of it is also understood. It may be assumed that a people who speedily learn to reproduce the best class of marine engines, and who have access to cheap coal and iron, will not long neglect the opportunity to save their countrymen the trouble of importing cotton machinery from England or the United States, and thus at an early day even the small comfort of providing English rivals with the means for the undoing of England will vanish.

The condition of affairs existing in Japan is also met with in other parts of the Orient. The transference of the jute industry to India from Scotland is plainly attributable to the fluctuations in exchange since the demonetization of silver. The manufacture of jute was once confined almost wholly to Dundee, but now large quantities of jute are worked up on the Hoogly, near Calcutta, and in the near future the transfer will be complete, for the Scottish manufacturer can not compete with the subtle advantage enjoyed by the manufacturer in silver-using countries.

This advantage has also operated to deprive English shipbuilders of a share of trade. At a meeting of the China Mutual Steamship Company, Mr. Maitland, the president, remarked that "the working expenses had been considerably reduced, almost entirely by the great fall in the gold price of silver. * * * For the repairs of their steamers very large amounts of money were annually needed, and they had already commenced to make repairs in Singapore, China, and Japan. With the dollar at two shillings the skilled Asiatic will work for a month for less than a skilled British subject will work for a week." This testimony regarding the danger to the shipbuilding industry is supplemented by that of the chairman of the Peninsular and Oriental, the greatest steamship line plying between the Orient and Europe, who has not hesitated to predict that if the Chinese and Japanese continue to retain the advantage which the excessive appreciation of the value of gold gives them the new vessels of the company will be built in those countries, and he adds that it is not at all improbable that the Chinese and the Japanese in the near future will build ships to be operated in Western waters.

On the 20th of September, 1894, the Hongkong Press published an article from the pen of H. Kopsch, F. R. G. S., in which he pointed out the reason why the English shipbuilding industry was suffering through the appreciation of gold. He enforced his views by practical illustrations. "Some years ago," he said, "a mandarin sought to obtain estimates for a steam launch, in anticipation of his being permitted to introduce steam power on one of the lakes of the Empire. The tender submitted for the launch was £1,000, or 5,000 Mexican dollars. Subsequently the same officer renewed his inquiries, and was amazed to find that the launch, which he could have had built for 5,000 Mexican dollars when he first made his inquiries, would cost him 10,000 Mexican dollars under the changed conditions. Permission has since been given to navigate certain inner waters of China, but owing to the high price of gold the Chinese are themselves making the boilers and engines instead of getting them from England." This same writer also noted the fact that between 1884 and 1893 there were 399 steamers, aggregating 23,094 tons, built and engined in Hongkong, and he adds: "Twenty years ago had any one prophesied that Chinese would ever compete with British shipwrights and engine makers he would have been ridiculed; nevertheless the appreciation of gold has so reduced wages as to make it possible for China to compete with the West in the manufacture of articles for which the raw materials have to be imported."

If the Chinese are able to compete successfully even when compelled to import the raw materials, as in the case of the manufacture of steam launches, what will they not be able to accomplish when, under the impetus which the planting of industries in a country naturally gives to production, they begin to pay attention to the development of their iron and coal mines and to the expansion of the cotton-producing industry?

The extent and rapidity of this development should not be underrated or its significance misunderstood, as it seems to have been by some Englishmen and by our consul at Tientsin, who in a recent report to the United States Department of State said that he had received information from a reliable source that the customs taotai at that port, representing officially and as an individual the big cotton mills then in course of erection at Shanghai and elsewhere in Central Asia, had placed orders with a European firm in Tientsin for cotton-mill machinery amounting to nearly a million dollars (Mexican). Consul Reed, who gave this information, desired that the attention of American manufacturers of such machinery be called to the fact that many mills were springing up in various parts of China. This information was duly published in the consular reports issued by our Government, and was reprinted in one or two trade journals. It excited no comment, however, and no doubt those under whose observation it came only looked upon the item as something concerning the manufacturing of machinery. They did not perceive its more important bearing and that the temporary advantage which might be derived from the sale of some cotton machinery would be followed by the loss of the American cotton-goods trade with China, which aggregated $2,851,957 in 1894, $2,772,065 of which consisted of uncolored cloths, which may be easily made by beginners enjoying the peculiar advantages which the appreciation of gold and the state of the labor market have given the Chinese.

What these advantages are may be inferred from a report of the board of directors of Boyd & Co. (limited), a ship repairing and machine manufacturing company doing business in Shanghai, made to stockholders on the 30th of April, 1894. The report, after remarking that "the general working for the past year shows a favorable result, which has been largely contributed by the local industries which are springing up around us," goes on to predict still greater activity, provided certain restrictions which the Chinese have placed about manufacturers are removed. Discussing this phase of the subject the North China Daily News says: "If this discouragement were only withdrawn and private capitalists and companies were allowed to undertake the business, Shanghai in two or three years would be a forest of chimney stacks, and the demand for machinery would startle the manufacturers in Lancashire. The cotton is to be had on the spot, labor is inexhaustible and very reliable; coal is cheap. There are no embarrassing factory acts, so that the machinery could be run twenty-four hours a day and seven days a week, and there is an unlimited market at a price for all that is produced. Once withdraw the present restrictions and there will be a wonderful outburst here [Shanghai] of industrial activity."

That these restrictions will be removed is now quite certain, for the official class who hoped to enjoy a monopoly of the profits arising from the new dispensation are beginning to realize that the course pursued by Japan is by far the one most calculated to advantage them, and mandarins who have hitherto opposed the creation of joint stock companies are now favoring that sort of enterprise.

These facts have not escaped the observation of workingmen in Great Britain. The labor leaders in that country long since recognized that they were injured by the new competition called into existence by the appreciation of gold, and many of them have become active bimetallists, and are doing much to promote a sentiment in favor of silver in England. These labor leaders have clearly perceived that which presumably acute English statesmen have overlooked, namely, that political supremacy is dependent on commercial activity, and that the power of the British Empire must begin to wane if, owing to a persistent adherence to a suicidal monetary policy, nations that have hitherto been dependent upon the Western World for manufactured products, and which, under normal conditions, would continue to be, are given such advantages that manufacturers operating in countries on a gold basis can not compete with them. To these workingmen the predictions of such men as Sir Thomas Sutherland are full of meaning. When he declared that in the near future the steamers of the Peninsular and Oriental line, instead of being built on the Clyde, would be turned out of the yards on the Yangtze in China, they realized that thousands of their fellow-workingmen are in danger of being thrown out of employment, for they are perfectly convinced, after a study of the question, that the extension of the principles which make possible the fulfillment of Sir Thomas's prediction regarding the transference of the shipbuilding industry to China must result in similarly effecting all industries not exclusively the property of gold-standard nations.

An English journal, early in the present year, remarked: "Japan has certainly prospered on cheap silver. Through the instrumentality of the white metal she has made large strides toward industrial independence and has begun to be recognized by the older manufacturing nations as a formidable competitor. Japanese cotton and linen goods and other manufactured products are invading markets where, a few years ago, they were unknown, and it is interesting to note that the increased importation of such articles into the United States is beginning to cause uneasiness to American manufacturers." If the latter statement is true the American manufacturers have effectually succeeded in concealing their uneasiness. The manufacturing industry in the United States is a powerful one, and if those concerned in it once awaken to the disadvantages under which they are laboring in their competition with the East they will speedily make their influence felt. But it is reasonable to assume that the American manufacturers are still in the dark and agree with the Boston Herald that the people of silver-using countries are on a lower plane of civilization and their efforts to develop manufacturing industries are therefore to be despised. Meanwhile Japan, one of the silver countries on the lower plane of civilization, is increasing her productions at a rate which seems rapid when compared with our own advantages. We have made some progress in the production of pottery, but we venture to say that the Japanese, who in 1884 employed 19,000 workmen in turning out 73,500,000 pieces, and four years later employed 27,000 men, who produced 126,000,000 pieces, a rate of increase that has been well maintained since, have no reason to shrink from a comparison. The extension of their cotton and silk industry has already been noted as being on a threatening scale, menacing a competition which Western people will not be able to stand up against.

The Textile Mercury, an English trade publication, expressed the belief a few days ago that the mischief had already been accomplished, and remarked: "It is high time for the English cotton spinner and manufacturer to look out for suitable fields to which he may emigrate." The writer added: "It really looks as if the growth of England's cotton industry at home had reached its limit, and that English capital engaged in the manufacture of cotton goods would hereafter be forced to seek locations in India and China in order to find profitable employment. * * * English manufacturers can only hope to maintain their supremacy in the Eastern markets by producing the goods on the spot."

The question for American manufacturers to consider is whether they could maintain themselves against a competition which has nearly proved fatal to Lancashire. Should there be an exodus of English capital to the Orient for the purpose of establishing manufacturing industries in China and Japan, how could we in this country hope to successfully exclude the flood of cheap goods that would be poured into the United States? The present tariff scarcely offers any obstacle to the European manufacturer operating under all of the disadvantages incident to the gold standard. How, then, could we expect to successfully compete with the same manufacturer after he has transferred his machinery to a country where labor is phenomenally cheap and is compensated in a metal which, when measured in terms of gold, is likewise cheap? The manufacturer, under such circumstances, would ask in vain for an increase of the protective tariff, for the enlightened opinion of the agriculturist would be against the granting of such a request, while the producer is subjected to the destructive influence of a constantly contracting measurer of values. When the money of the world was composed of gold and silver the farmer could afford to stand shoulder to shoulder with the manufacturer in the United States and assist in building up a great manufacturing industry. The achievement of such a result meant for him increasing markets near his own door, and that, translated into plain English, meant increased profits through the diminution of cost of transportation and the elimination of the middleman. But the changed conditions preclude the idea of agriculture making common cause with manufactures. The farmers are now perfectly aware that the tremendous fall in the price of their products is due to the appreciation of the value of gold, and they will not be so foolish as to consent to rivet their shackles more firmly by assisting in artificially raising the prices of manufactured products while no steps are taken to prevent the depreciation of the prices of the products of the soil.

If this view is correct, unless something is done to restore silver, and thus put all nations on a plane of equality, the gold-using countries must prepare to have their markets invaded by the manufactures of the silver-using countries, not only by those of the Orient but those of Russia as well. The Textile Mercury, in the same article in which it bewails the decadence of the English cotton industry, also describes the prosperity of the Russian cotton manufacturer. It says, while the English cotton manufacturer is in dire distress, "in Russia the trade is in a highly prosperous condition. The mills of Moscow and other cotton spinning and weaving districts are paying dividends of from 25 to 33 per cent. Spinners have all their production bought up into the middle of next year. A manufacturer who wants yarn now can only purchase it at enhanced values from the middleman or speculator—it is not to be had from any other source." Russia, according to the theories of the Boston Herald, should be on a still lower plane of civilization than the silver-using countries of the Orient and of Central and South America, for its chief currency is an inconvertible credit note, although the legal unit of money is the silver ruble of 100 kopecks. But instead of Russia being in a condition to excite the commiseration of philanthropists in gold-using countries, she actually is enjoying a degree of manufacturing prosperity which fills with envy the ruined cotton manufacturers of England and the United States.

[Mr. TUCKER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. KEM. Mr. Speaker, it is not my purpose at this time to undertake to discuss the principles involved in this question. In the first place, the time at my command is too limited; and, secondly, I do not believe that anything that may be said on this floor at this time will change a single vote on this proposition. But I do desire, Mr. Speaker, to call attention to one or two statements that have been made on this floor relative to the attitude of the Populist party on this question. The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WILSON] the other night made the bold, bare, unsupported statement that the Populist party was not in favor of bimetallism, that the Populist party was not a bimetallist party; and that statement was practically reiterated yesterday by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MCRAE], upon the Democratic side. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, with all the emphasis I have at my command, that the statement was both uncalled for and unsupported by any fact or evidence in this House, in the Senate, or in the country anywhere. And I am astonished that gentlemen will stand before this assemblage and make such statements as that in the face of the facts contained in the record of the proceedings of this body for the last five years.

Mr. Speaker, when I severed my connection with the Republican party I did so because I believed that party was no longer the friend of the great common people of this country. And after five years' experience in the halls of legislation I now no longer believe, but know, that that party is not the friend of the common people. Let us go back for about thirty years, to the time when Thaddeus Stevens, the great, eloquent old commoner from Pennsylvania, stood on the floor of this House and so valiantly fought the insertion of the exception clause in the greenbacks. Start from that point, and extend your investigations all through the legislation of the Republican party and its attitude on financial questions down to the present moment, and you will find that at every turn and at every opportunity that party, as represented in the halls of legislation, at this and the other end of the Capitol, have stood up wherever and whenever the opportunity offered and struck down the money of the people and step by step have forced us into the terrible conditions financially that the country is in to-day, under their management and control.

I have sat in my place here, Mr. Speaker, and listened to the discussion of these questions on the part of the Republican and Democratic members of this body. I have listened to the talks of both the Republicans and Democrats, each blaming the other for the condition which we are in and under which we are suffering now. Both of them were right and both were wrong. They were both right in that they accuse each other of the responsibility, and they are responsible. The Republican party is responsible for enacting the law which destroyed the money of the people, and the Democratic party is responsible, by its Administration, for carrying out that law to the very letter. Hence they are both wrong and both right, although neither may be responsible wholly for the condition that exists, yet jointly they are both responsible. The Republican is the greater sinner, because all financial law of the last thirty-five years is Republican law.

Mr. Speaker, from the time the exception clause was put upon the greenbacks adverse legislation has grown steadily on and on and all financial legislation has militated against the great mass of the people.

The gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WILSON], regardless of these facts—regardless of the fact that all the laws that have been placed upon the statute books that have destroyed the money of the people, destroyed the prosperity of our country, that have tended to reduce the volume of the currency, that have destroyed silver and wiped it out of existence as money are the results of Republican legislation—stands here and has the hardihood to say to us that, after all, they are the only party in this country that favors bimetallism. I deny this position. I say go to the RECORD and examine the facts; examine the attitude of the Populist party and the attitude of the Republican party and the Democratic party with reference to silver, and it will bear me out in saying that the Populist party is to-day the only party—the only bimetallic political party in existence in the United States of America. It is the only party that has in view and at heart the great interest of the people. Go to the RECORD. You do not need to take my assertion for it, but go to the RECORD and see what it shows on that question. It will show that at every opportunity, upon every question where an opportunity was offered, the Representatives of the Populist party on this floor and upon the floor of the Senate have, to a man, without a solitary exception, voted for bimetallism.

I call attention further to the declarations in the various platforms. My friend from Montana [Mr. HARTMAN] has just read in your hearing the declaration of the Republican party in its platform relative to bimetallism. In the first part of that declaration they declare themselves in favor of bimetallism; but, Mr. Speaker, it is a condition with a string tied to it to pull it back at their own convenience and at their own will, and they did pull it back in the last national campaign. The Democratic platform starts out with practically the same declaration, and they have tied a string to it also in order that they may pull it back at their own convenience. We saw in the last political campaign members of both political parties going over the country proclaiming themselves in one locality as bimetallists, in another in favor of monometallism, a sort of political trickery, a good deal like the old darkey's fish trap, which was arranged in such a manner as to catch them both coming and going. And in view of that fact, every man here upon this floor, whether he be honest enough to own it or not, knows this to be true, that you can not stand here and say honestly that yours is the only party that is true to bimetallism, that your policy is the only one by which you can secure bimetallism, in spite of the fact that after thirty years of these two parties controlling this Government we find to-day the result in the condition of the country and in the fact that silver has been stricken down and destroyed. No member of either party can say of a truth that his party is in any sense a silver party.

I have no objection to the Republican party being in favor of monometallism if it believes it to be the true policy; nor do I object to the Democratic party accepting that theory. But let them be honest about it. If a man believes it he should stand to that declaration. If he believes in monometallism let him so declare. But what I do object to is this method of procedure on the part of the Democrats and Republicans alike seeking to fool and hoodwink and befuddle the people until they do not know the facts on which they are asked to vote. The Republican party will be quite in harmony with its action for thirty years if it will in the coming national convention declare itself in favor of monometallism; if it will do this, then its declarations will be in harmony with its actions, and the people will know where it stands and what the true meaning of its political action on this question is.

I am gratified, Mr. Speaker, to know that at last the great Republican majority of this House is brought face to face with the plain proposition of free coinage. They will have to say by their votes whether the Republican party is in favor of silver money or not. There is no way of dodging the issue, and when the vote is recorded the people can see for themselves just what it is in favor of.

I am not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet, but I will predict that when the vote is taken it will show a very large majority of the Republicans on this floor recorded against free silver and in favor of gold alone. This would seem to be the only thing necessary to at last convince the people that this party is against silver, and I am pleased that the time is drawing near when this deception must cease and the party stand out uncovered in all of its iniquity, side by side with the Democratic party.

Let us throw this question open, fair and free, aboveboard, to the voters of this country, and let them decide the question. When they do that, gentlemen, I promise you for one that when the decision is rendered by the people in an intelligent manner, under conditions by which they may know what they are voting for and who their friends are, then I say that if they decide that they want a gold basis, gold monometallism, I will acquiesce in that position, and I will cease to agitate the money question in this country. But I say to you here and now that so long as you seek to prevent the people from casting an intelligent ballot along this line, as you have all these years by masquerading behind silver while establishing a gold standard, I will fight you; I will oppose you. I may be whipped, but like my friend, the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON], I will always be ready to fight you until you are driven from under cover and this question is settled under conditions which will place you before the people for just what you are worth. When this can be done you will be relegated to the shades of the past, where you ought to have been years ago.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. KEM. I can not submit to a question, because my time is practically up.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the record shows that the Populist party is the only true bimetallic party upon the floor of this House and upon the floor of the Senate; that it is the only true bimetallic party in existence in the United States of America, and it is my firm conviction, sir, that the people of this country will never get bimetallism until a sufficient number of them unite themselves with the Populist party to carry that party into power.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Will you allow a question now?

Mr. KEM. I have not the time.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. You could have answered it while you were pausing.

Mr. KEM. I hope the gentleman will not interrupt me. I did not interrupt him the other night. I have stated facts which I said the record will bear out.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Do you believe every dollar of the United States should be redeemable in coin?

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman, in spite of my objection the gentleman has injected his question into my speech and I will answer him. The gentleman asks me if I believe every dollar issued by the United States should be redeemable in coin. That has nothing to do with the proposition at all, one way or the other. The question is as to whether the Populist party is in favor of bimetallism, and I say to the gentleman from Idaho that the record shows that the Populist party is in favor of bimetallism; that there has never been a vote cast upon that proposition but what every member of the Populist party voted for it on every occasion and at all times. The platform so declares.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. You have not answered my question.

Mr. KEM. I say, if you turn to the declaration of the Populist platform on that position, you will find that there is no string to that declaration, as there is to the Republican and Democratic declarations.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Answer the question. Do not avoid it.

Mr. KEM. The free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, pure and simple——

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Answer my question. Do not avoid it.

Mr. KEM. I have answered the question. It is not proper for me to go outside the province of this question and answer the gentleman any question he may see fit to ask; the gentleman can not side track me in that manner.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 59 minutes a. m., Friday, February 7, 1896), the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 7, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed joint resolution (H. Res. 89) concerning the erection and completion (except heating apparatus) of the United States post-office building at Bloomington, Ill.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bill was taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 1591) to extend the mineral-land laws of the United States to lands embraced in the north half of the Colville Indian Reservation—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina states that he rises to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. TALBERT. It has been brought to my notice that I have been misrepresented by the press of the country, unintentionally, I have no doubt, for I can not believe that the press of the country desires to misrepresent members upon this floor. And in rising, sir, I do not rise to apologize for or to retract anything that I have said on that occasion, but to reecho and reiterate every word and sentiment that I uttered on that occasion. On last Wednesday evening, when the present bill was under discussion, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. PEARSON] saw proper, while making his speech, to go out of his way to unkindly criticise the State of South Carolina, which I have the honor in part to represent upon this floor, the great and grand and glorious State of which I am proud, and a State that is as true and as loyal to the flag today as any State in the United States.

In his remarks he criticised the prominent part that South Carolina took in the act of secession in 1861. In the course of his remarks, as I understood him, he took occasion to say that North Carolina had followed South Carolina out of the Union in secession, and that North Carolina, and South Carolina, too, had gotten whipped. As to that, I have nothing to say. I only, in a jocular way, remarked to the gentleman that he was mistaken; that South Carolina had never been whipped; that she wore herself out trying to whip the other fellow. But, Mr. Speaker, when he said in substance that he was ashamed of such action on the part of his State, I rose, possibly in an unparliamentary manner, and in the heat of the moment I impulsively said that South Carolina was not ashamed of the part that she took in it; that she was proud of it, and that I for one indorsed secession then. I thought we were right. I think so yet, and that under the same circumstances, surrounded by the same conditions, that I would do the same thing again.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I repeat it——

Mr. BARRETT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARRETT. The point of order is that I ask that the words of the gentleman be taken down and read at the desk.

Mr. TALBERT. I said, Mr. Speaker, that——

The SPEAKER. One moment.

Mr. BARRETT. I desire to have the words taken down.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks that the words of the gentleman be taken down.

Mr. TALBERT. I am willing, Mr. Speaker, for my words to be taken down, and I propose to stand by every word that I utter upon this floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to resume his seat. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts insist that the words shall be taken down?

Mr. BARRETT. I ask that the words be taken down, because, as I understood the remarks of the gentleman from South Carolina, his statement was in direct violation of the oath that he took at the bar of this House at the opening of this Congress. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the words.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the heat of the moment I impulsively said that South Carolina was not ashamed of the part that she took in it; that she was proud of it, and that I for one indorsed secession then. I thought we were right. I think so yet, and that under the same circumstances, surrounded by the same conditions, that I would do the same thing again.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the gentleman was repeating what he said previously for the purpose of making some modification, as the Chair understood.

Mr. BARRETT. I raise the point of order that the rule of the House which provides that when a declaration, made either inside or outside of the House, for which when made a gentleman might properly have been called to order, and the words are repeated here, it is in order for any member of the House to make the point of order——

Mr. CRISP. This is not debatable.

The SPEAKER. One moment. There is one more line to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Now, Mr. Speaker, I repeat it——

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a resolution which I am now engaged in preparing.

Mr. TALBERT. I was about to explain my position——

Mr. CRISP. I move, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from South Carolina be permitted to explain.

Mr. BARRETT. I have risen to a point of order, which must be settled by the Chair.

Mr. CRISP. I move, and that is the only motion proper under the rules, that the gentleman from South Carolina be permitted to explain. The Chair will find such motion provided for in clause 4 of Rule XIV.

Mr. BARRETT. I have risen to the point of order, and on that point of order I am entitled to a decision; and if the point of order is sustained by the Chair I will offer a resolution which I am now preparing.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read clause 5 of Rule XIV.

The Clerk read as follows:

If a member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk and read aloud to the House; but he shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, the point of order I desire to call the attention of the Speaker to is this——

Mr. CRISP. Clause 4 also bears on the matter.

Mr. BARRETT. The point of order, Mr. Speaker, I wish to add, is that it has been held in this House that where a member of the House, either in a debate or in a published utterance outside of the Hall of the House of Representatives, has made statements which might have been called in question in the House, and has deliberately reiterated them as his own deliberate judgment, that that reiteration and repetition becomes in the purview of this rule a new statement, upon which any member can raise the point of order when made. The gentleman from South Carolina has deliberately reiterated his statement that under certain circumstances he believes in secession; and I demanded that those words be taken down, as they have been, and upon that statement, when properly called to the attention of the House, I now propose to offer a resolution of censure. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. When the Chair called attention to what had been said, that the gentleman was repeating it, the Chair did not understand the last sentence, which is a repetition of it. The gentleman will send his resolution to the desk.

Mr. McMILLIN. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Massachusetts is leaving wholly out of mind a matter that ought to be taken into consideration in connection with this proposed censure, and that is the declaration the gentleman from South Carolina made in the beginning of his remarks, one I certainly think ought to be taken into consideration in connection with the other, in which he said that he had no such intention as that for which the gentleman proposes to offer a resolution of censure.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I suggest to the Chair that the gentleman very properly made the point of order, and the gentleman from Massachusetts having given notice that he will offer a resolution, I think he should be permitted a reasonable time to put it in writing before further debate takes place on this question.

The SPEAKER. This debate is only by sufferance.

Mr. McMILLIN. I have requested permission of the House to make this statement.

Mr. BOUTELLE. It is not in order.

Mr. McMILLIN. I will make an agreement with the gentleman from Maine that if he will not be in order I will be.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I hope some other gentleman on that side will come to the same resolution.

Mr. LACEY. The Chair has not ruled whether this is in order or not. Must not a ruling by the Chair necessarily precede any resolution?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is in order under the fifth paragraph of Rule XIV.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, may I ask why the motion I made is not in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman upon that point.

Mr. CRISP. Rule XIV, paragraph 4, provides that—

If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order; in which case he shall immediately sit down, unless permitted, on motion of another member, to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case without debate; if the decision is in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise; and, if the case requires it, he shall be liable to censure, or such punishment as the House may deem proper.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have never known a case in my experience, and I submit to the Chair whether he has ever known a case since he has been a member of this body, when, a gentleman being called to order for words spoken in debate, and a motion being made by another member that he be allowed to explain, that motion has not been entertained and submitted to the House.

Mr. BARRETT. The Chair will allow me to say that, owing to the noise in the Hall, I have been unable to hear the statement made by the gentleman from Georgia, and am therefore unable to say whether I should agree to his proposition or not.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia suggests that under paragraph 4 of Rule XIV he is entitled to make a motion that the gentleman from South Carolina be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. CRISP. My motion was that the gentleman be allowed "to explain." That is the language of the rule, and it certainly never was contemplated in any legislative body that a motion of censure should be submitted before the member had been given an opportunity to explain his words. That is the very purpose of the rule.

Mr. BARRETT. The rule which the gentleman from Georgia has invoked reads as follows:

If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order, in which case he shall immediately sit down, unless permitted, on motion of another member, to explain, and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case without debate.

I do not object to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT], at the proper time, being allowed to explain the statement twice made by him with deliberation, that, under certain circumstances, having taken the oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States, he would attempt to overthrow and humiliate it; but I do claim that the rule does not give any right to postpone the present consideration of the resolution which I propose to submit to the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Would any action in the nature of explanation or remarks on the part of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] or of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] be subject to the interpretation that it was "intervening business" which would so operate as to preclude action upon the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, that the matter may be clearly understood—I do not regard it as of any particular importance——

The SPEAKER. It is very desirable that we should proceed in order.

Mr. CRISP. I was about to say, Mr. Speaker, that I thought it very desirable that the House should proceed in order. Now, that there may be no doubt about the proposition, I will call attention again to the point I have already made, as it appears that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] did not hear me. The gentleman from South Carolina rose in his place this morning to make a personal explanation, or rose to a question of privilege. Pending his remarks the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT], as he had a right to do, called the gentleman from South Carolina to order for words spoken in debate. Now, the question is, what, under the rules, must be done in this condition of affairs? Paragraph 5 of Rule XIV, provides that—

If a member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk and read aloud to the House; but he shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to the censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened.

Paragraph 4 of the same rule provides that—

If any member, in speaking or otherwise, transgress the rules of the House, the Speaker shall, or any member may, call him to order—

That was done in this case by the gentleman from Massachusetts—

in which case he shall immediately sit down—

That is, the member called to order—

unless permitted, on motion of another member, to explain—

Now, he can not make any motion himself, but some other member may move that he be allowed to explain—and the House shall, if appealed to, decide on the case without debate.

That is, if appealed to by a motion such as I have made.

If the decision is in favor of the member called to order, he shall be at liberty to proceed, but not otherwise; and if the case require it, he shall be liable to censure, or such punishment as the House may deem proper.

Now, in Jefferson's Manual we find stated the rule in the British Parliament:

Disorderly words are not to be noticed till the member has finished his speech—

We have changed that here so far as the time of making objection is concerned—then the person objecting to them, and desiring them to be taken down by the clerk at the table, must repeat them. The speaker then may direct the clerk to take them down in his minutes; but if he thinks them not disorderly, he delays the direction. If the call becomes pretty general, he orders the clerk to take them down as stated by the objecting member. They are then a part of his minutes, and when read to the offending member he may deny they were his words, and the House must then decide by a question whether they are his words or not. Then the member may justify them or explain the sense in which he used them or apologize. If the House is satisfied, no further proceeding is necessary.

Mr. Speaker, our rule is founded on that. The gentleman from Massachusetts calls to order the gentleman from South Carolina, whereupon the gentleman from South Carolina must immediately take his seat, which he has done, unless he be permitted on motion of some other member—some member other than himself—to explain. I have made the motion that he be permitted to explain.

Mr. CANNON. Will my friend allow me a question?

Mr. CRISP. I will.

Mr. CANNON. I was not in the Hall when the occurrence referred to took place. I have read the words that were taken down——

Mr. BARRETT. I think I am entitled under the circumstances to be heard in reply to the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The House will be in order; gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. CANNON. I have heard what the gentleman from Georgia has said since he has been on his feet the last time. I have read the words that were taken down. Now, I desire to ask the gentleman from Georgia whether he understands that the gentleman from South Carolina was in the midst of what he claimed to be an explanation of the words used in debate yesterday or the day before, and that he desires now to make further explanation. I ask that question so that I may know how to vote on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, as to what the gentleman from South Carolina desires I have no means of knowing. As to what that gentleman said I have the same means that every other member who was present has. The gentleman rose in his place and said he desired to make a personal explanation or to present a question of personal privilege, and at the time when he was called to order he was proceeding to make remarks in relation to what took place the other night.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Allow me one question. If I understood the gentleman from South Carolina aright he said, after the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that he was about proceeding to explain what he had said on the previous occasion.

Mr. CRISP. I understood him so to say. But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] does not seem willing that the gentleman from South Carolina should have the opportunity to explain, although the rule says that any member other than the member called to order may make such a motion as I have made, and that the House may, if it desires to do so, give the member called to order the right to explain.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I beg the gentleman from Georgia to listen to me while I explain the sequence of what has occurred. On Wednesday night I was one of the few members of this House who, braving the action of the elements, were present at the meeting here for the discussion of the bill now, or a few moments ago, under discussion in the House. To my surprise I heard the remarks made by the gentleman from South Carolina at that time, and I supposed that some member older and more experienced than myself would take proper action on the subject. But several moments having elapsed, the point of order became applicable from the fact that the attention of the House was not promptly called to the subject. I allowed it to drop, thinking that perhaps the gentleman from South Carolina had, in a moment of excitement, made a statement of treason to the Constitution of the United States which reflection and time for consideration would prompt him to disavow. This morning, to my still greater surprise, he rises and reiterates that assertion that under certain circumstances—he having within two months taken the oath of office carrying with it the oath of allegiance to the Constitution of the United States—under certain circumstances he would approve and indorse and participate in secession. Immediately upon that statement being made I rose in my place and demanded that the words be taken down, thereby raising a point of order. The gentleman might have been allowed to proceed under the ordinary interpretation of clause 4 of Rule XIV if he had simply violated the rules of this House, under which he might very properly have made immediate explanation, for which the gentleman from Georgia might have asked leave that he be given time.

But upon the words being taken down I offered immediately a resolution and asked the Speaker to give me time to prepare it and put it in proper form. While that offer was pending, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] rose in his place and desired to make a motion, as he claimed, as a matter of right, that the gentleman from South Carolina be permitted to explain.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I claim that the resolution I offered was a resolution of privilege——

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to do so, but I must call the gentleman from Massachusetts to order. The question, and the only question, is whether my motion is in order; and it is not a debatable proposition.

Mr. BARRETT. But the motion I made, the resolution I offered and have sent to the desk, was a resolution of privilege.

Mr. CRISP. But the gentleman offered no resolution, and can not do so until after the motion I have made, which has priority, is determined.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I insist that the gentleman from Massachusetts be permitted to make his statement.

Mr. CRISP. There is only one thing to be done, and that is to consider the only resolution permissible under the rules, which I have offered.

Mr. BARRETT. I offered a resolution as a matter of privilege to the House——

Mr. CRISP. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will have to take his seat until the point is decided.

Mr. BARRETT. I should like to be heard upon the point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, all this is unseemly.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] that he understood the gentleman from Georgia to move that the gentleman from South Carolina be permitted to explain; to ask that the motion be submitted to the House. The Chair thinks that has been the usual custom, to submit such a motion to the House for explanation, pending any action on the part of the House, which is taken subsequent to the explanation.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, if my resolution may be considered as pending I should be very glad, as I said before, to allow the gentleman from South Carolina to explain.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia as made is that the gentleman from South Carolina be permitted to explain.

Mr. BARRETT. What becomes of my resolution?

The SPEAKER. The resolution can be presented, if the explanation is not satisfactory to the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that I requested of the Chair and of the House that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] be given opportunity to obey the rules of the House, which require that his resolution be reduced to writing.

The SPEAKER. Precisely.

Mr. BOUTELLE. And that while he was doing it, after having notified the Speaker of his resolution, while he was using such time as was necessary to the preparation of the resolution, and keeping the floor, he certainly could not lose the privilege of the floor, and the gentleman from Georgia——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks under the rule that the House has a right to say whether it will listen to an explanation from the gentleman of the remarks that he made on the floor of the House.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Undoubtedly, but that is not the point. The point is whether the gentleman from Georgia can rise while the House is awaiting the reduction to writing of a regular resolution and make a motion to take precedence of the resolution itself.

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House and the practice under it seems to give to a member the right to make that motion and the House the right to pass upon it.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I beg the Speaker's pardon for the suggestion that my impression is that the resolution always has preceded the motion, that after the person requiring that the language shall be taken down has offered some resolution calling for the action of the House in a certain direction then, and only then, is the motion in order that the gentleman proceed in order; and if the Speaker please, I think, on reflection, he will see that the motion to be permitted to explain and to proceed in order is an alternative to the proposition for some action in derogation of the language, and therefore that the affirmative proposition of the gentleman, who has asked that the language be taken down, is the pending business.

The SPEAKER. The House will please be in order.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask just one parliamentary question. Having risen in my place and offered a resolution which is in order under the rules of the House, and not having yielded the floor, is it in order for the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to demand as a matter of right to make a motion to allow a certain other gentleman to proceed when I am entitled to the floor under the rules of the House to debate the subject-matter that I have submitted? I had the floor when the gentleman from Georgia rose——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Georgia to rise when the words were taken down and to make the motion.

Mr. BARRETT. I beg the pardon of the Chair. I offered the resolution and then the gentleman asked that the gentleman from South Carolina be allowed to explain.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine and see from the Clerk what the condition of affairs is.

The Chair is informed by the Clerk that his impression is correct with regard to the time when the gentleman from Georgia rose——

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. We can not even hear the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. The question will be taken upon the motion of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I take it for granted that whatever may be the technical point in the rule in this matter the House does not propose to act upon a resolution of this importance without giving the gentleman from South Carolina an opportunity at least to explain. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I was going on to say that——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of order. The House is in such confusion that we can not hear even the motions which are made. The chronology of these events are plain enough to me, but gentlemen of the House can not understand them because they can not hear what is said. I hope if this matter is going to rise to some importance that we shall have a chance to hear for ourselves the words as they fall from the lips of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has suggested to the House several times the desirability of order. The House has come to order and then immediately lapsed into disorder. If the House will be kind enough to be in order continuously until this matter is finished, there will be less misunderstanding in regard to it.

The gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, as I was going on to say, I rose to correct the misinterpretation, possibly more than the misrepresentation, that was made by the press of the State. I believe that it was done unintentionally. I have no idea that the press of the State desire to willfully misrepresent any member upon this floor, and the distinction between what I did say and what I meant and what was in the papers is simply and distinctively this:

As I said in the outset, that South Carolina to-day stood as loyal and as true to the flag of the United States as any State in the United States, and that the circumstances and conditions that existed when South Carolina seceded can not and never will exist any more, and I am glad of it. [Applause.] And when I spoke of the question of secession, sir, while South Carolina seceded, as she thought it to be her duty, with the light before her then, it is quite different to-day; and I did not say that I wished to violate the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution by advocating secession now, because those circumstances and conditions can not and never will exist again.

That great question of secession, Mr. Speaker, has been submitted to the arbitrament of the sword, the only place that it could have been settled, and has been settled and settled forever; and I am glad of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And I stand here ready and willing, as I have done on other occasions, to extend the right hand of fellowship to the men who wore the blue, whom I had met under the red blaze of battle, and to tell them now that that war of thirty years ago is over, and let us stop waving the bloody shirt, fill the open chasm, and be once more a united people with one flag, one country, one aspiration, and one motive governing us all. While I believe we were right in 1861 and actuated by patriotic motives, I did not want to be put in the ridiculous attitude thirty years after the war had ended and the question of secession had forever been settled, to be held up as an ignorant fool, advocating secession to-day, and I meant no such thing; and my language has been misinterpreted. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is my position; and I am ready to-day—while I look with pride upon my past life as a Confederate soldier, I look down with contempt upon any Southern man who would apologize for his action as a soldier; while as gallant to-day, and while he and I are ready to take up arms in the defense of our common country, the greatest, grandest nation on the face of the earth, it ill becomes a man from the South to bemean the people he represents, and that is the sentiment I wished to reiterate, and not anything that was unfriendly to the Government of the United States. It is not in me. With that explanation, Mr. Speaker, I am done.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BARRETT. Is the resolution now offered by me pending, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is at liberty to offer a resolution.

Mr. BARRETT. I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, That the words of Mr. TALBERT of South Carolina in declaring that "in the heat of the moment I impulsively said that South Carolina was not ashamed of the part that she took in it; that she was proud of it; and that, for one, I indorsed secession then; I thought we were right; I think so yet, and that under the same circumstances, surrounded by the same conditions, that I would do the same thing again. Now, Mr. Chairman, I repeat it," are treasonable and seditious, in violation of the oath taken by said gentleman at the opening of this House.

Be it further resolved, That said statement is—

Mr. BARRETT. I ask the Clerk to read it, as I wrote it off hurriedly: That the said words—are seditious and treasonable, in violation of the oath taken by said gentleman at the opening of the present session of Congress, etc.

The Clerk read as follows:

That said words are seditious and treasonable, in violation of the oath taken by said gentleman at the opening of this session.

Be it further resolved, That said statement is hereby censured by the House, and that it be stricken from the record.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I desire to know if it is in order to make any remarks upon that resolution?

Mr. BARRETT. I think I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to disturb the gentleman from Massachusetts, but to make this parliamentary inquiry. Is that resolution subject to any discussion; is it subject to remarks?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is, but will hear anybody who has anything to say to the contrary.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to move to refer this resolution, together with the gentleman's explanation, to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. It would be in order.

Mr. DALZELL. I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CANNON. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANNON. If I can have order.

The SPEAKER. The House must first be in order. Gentlemen will please take their seats.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to know whether this would be in order as a motion: "I move in view of the explanation of the gentleman"——

Mr. BARRETT. I am entitled to the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to submit my parliamentary inquiry. I suppose that is always in order.

Mr. BARRETT. I can not understand the proposition of the gentleman. I am entitled to the floor, and desire to be heard.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Illinois has risen to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARRETT. I had been recognized, and would be only too glad to have an opportunity to proceed.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen can not be interrupted when on the floor with a parliamentary inquiry unless it relates to something a member has said.

Mr. CANNON. It does relate to this controversy.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CANNON. I desire to know whether it would be in order to move as follows:

"I move, in view of the explanation of the gentleman from South Carolina"——

Mr. BARRETT. I do not submit to the gentleman's motion.

Mr. CANNON (continuing). "That the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts do lie upon the table." [Cries of "No!" on the Republican side, and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELLE. I think the man who makes that motion ought to lie on the table.

Mr. CANNON. I will make it when I get the opportunity.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, in order that I may get back and the House may get back to the true position in this matter, the Chair and the House having heard from the gentleman from South Carolina his explanation as to whether or not his remarks made on the floor this morning were in order, I desire—— [Great disorder in the Hall.].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend until the House comes to order.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit me, I desire to make a single suggestion to him as well as to the House. It is this: In view of the fact that the gentleman from South Carolina made an original statement, which has been taken down in writing, and has since made an explanation, and that explanation is not before us so that we can carefully examine it before we have any debate on the subject, I suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts whether it would not be well to refer the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary and have it brought back to the House for deliberate consideration. [Cries of "Yes!" "No!"]

Mr. BOUTELLE. We do not want any lawyer's opinion on this question.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances any suggestion made to me by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], who is very properly and deservedly the leader of this side of the House, would be promptly acquiesced in by me; but I desire first to ask the gentleman from South Carolina a categorical question, his answer to which may or may not remove this matter entirely from the consideration of the House. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina—and I wish to know whether he is now listening to what I say—— [Cries of "He is not!" "Order!" "Order!"]

I ask the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] whether he will rise in his place and distinctly, succinctly, and definitely withdraw any remark made by him on this floor which carries with it, directly or indirectly, any implied threat on his part of secession under any circumstances whatever. [Derisive cries on the Democratic side.] Unless the gentleman will withdraw his remark and make this apology to the House, this resolution is going to be voted upon. [Cries of "No!" "Let it be voted on!" "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. Speaker, the great Democratic party on that side of the House by their gentle shouts of "No" advise the gentleman from South Carolina, as their spokesman, not to withdraw his remark, not to say that he disclaims any statement which gives the slightest color or intimation of an intention, under certain circumstances, to lead in a secession movement against the Government of the United States which he has taken an oath to maintain.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. BARRETT. That is not a point of order. Any point of order must be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. WILSON of South Carolina. The point of order I make, Mr. Speaker, is that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] has no right to dictate to the gentleman from South Carolina any answer to any question that he propounds to the gentleman from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would sustain that point of order, if it was a point of order.

Mr. TALBERT. I have stated my position, and have not another word to say. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!" on the Republican side.]

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, unless the gentleman from South Carolina asks me to yield to him in order that he may make such a direct retraction as is due to the House—which I now pause for him to do—I shall move the previous question on this resolution. [Cries of "Move it!" on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, do I understand that the gentleman from South Carolina desires that I shall yield to him that he may make such an apology or retraction? [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARRETT. I do not yield the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. I want to make this parliamentary inquiry: If the motion for the previous question is voted down, will it not then be proper to refer this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. BOUTELLE. How does the Speaker know whether it will be "proper" or not?

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, in order that there may be no misunderstanding, I again ask, will the gentleman from South Carolina retract the words which he has uttered? [Disorder in the Hall. Derisive cries on the Democratic side.]

Then, Mr. Speaker, upon the pending resolution I move the previous question and demand the yeas and nays. [Cries of "That is right!" on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] demands the previous question upon the resolution which he has offered.

Mr. BARRETT. And I ask that the vote be taken by yeas and nays.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, is it not now in order to make a motion to refer the pending motion for the previous question——

Mr. RICHARDSON (interposing). Mr. Speaker, I must ask for order. We can not hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER (to Mr. DALZELL). The Chair thinks it is in order.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Let the rule be read.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, we must ask for order. We can not hear what the gentleman from Pennsylvania is saying.

The SPEAKER. The House will come to order after a while, I have no doubt. [Laughter.]

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the words of the gentleman from South Carolina, taken down at the instance of the gentleman from Massachusetts, together with the explanation made by the gentleman from South Carolina, be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order. A motion to refer the resolution of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be in order under the rules.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, I make that motion.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion for the previous question the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] moves that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McMILLIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BARRETT. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BARRETT. Mr. Speaker, is a motion to commit or recommit in order until after the previous question shall have been determined? Is it not in order after the vote on the previous question?

The SPEAKER. The language of the rule is: "It shall be in order pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered," etc.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I rise to a point of order. Is this motion debatable?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. BOUTELLE. Is it in order to ask for the rereading of the resolution?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order; but that can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE and others objected.

Mr. CRISP. I make the point of order that the motion to refer is not in order pending the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on that point.

Mr. CRISP. I call the Speaker's attention to clause 4 of Rule XVI:

> When a question is under debate, no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question (which motions shall be decided without debate), to postpone to a day certain, to refer, or to amend, or postpone indefinitely; which several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order.

This is a matter "under debate." The gentleman from Massachusetts has demanded the previous question, and a motion to refer is secondary to that. The other rule—the rule as to recommitment—is a different proposition entirely. But here is a proposition not to recommit, but to refer. A proposition to recommit involves the idea that the matter under consideration has once been reported by a committee; and, indeed, the rules of the House contemplate that no measure shall be considered until it has first been reported by a committee. Therefore the proposition to recommit applies to a different state of affairs from that now presented. It applies to the consideration of a matter which has been reported by a committee. It stands on entirely different grounds. The rule which I have just read has always been the rule; it is the rule of general parliamentary law. The other rule is an innovation, an addition to ordinary parliamentary rules.

The rule I have cited is, I repeat, general parliamentary law; the motion to recommit is an additional right granted under our rules, and is intended to apply only to matters that have been reported from committees.

The SPEAKER. The last sentence of clause 1 of Rule XVII reads:

> It shall be in order, pending the motion for, or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee.

That seems to be this case.

Mr. CRISP. What does the Speaker do with the other rule which I have just cited?

The SPEAKER. The Speaker thinks both rules can be harmonized.

Mr. CRISP. How?

The SPEAKER. By putting the question to the House.

Mr. CRISP. No. We may as well be right about this; and I respectfully suggest that the way to harmonize these two rules is to hold that, the previous question having been demanded, a motion to refer can not be voted upon until the previous question is ordered; but a motion to recommit may be voted upon either before or after the previous question is ordered. That is the way in which to harmonize the two rules.

The SPEAKER. But unfortunately the rule says distinctly that—

> It shall be in order, pending the motion for, or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the Speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit.

Mr. CRISP. Unfortunately for the position of the Speaker, the other rule, reciting the motions "to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a day certain, to refer or to amend, or to postpone indefinitely," declares that these "several motions shall have precedence in the foregoing order."

The SPEAKER. The question before the House is, Shall the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I wish to know whether, if the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania prevails, the Committee on the Judiciary will have, with the resolution referred to it, the explanation of the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. DALZELL. Of course.

Mr. WILLIAM A. STONE. They will have all the information they can get.

Mr. CANNON. If the committee will have, along with the resolution, that explanation, I am for this motion; otherwise I should be glad to move an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can understand for himself what the Judiciary Committee would do if the question were submitted to them.

Mr. CANNON. Then I move an amendment—— [Cries of "No!" "No!"] Yes, yes. I move an amendment adding that the explanation of the words referred to, as made by the gentleman from South Carolina, be referred with the resolution to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. DALZELL. That is what I sought by my original motion; but the Speaker ruled that that part of my motion was not in order. If the matter goes to the Judiciary Committee, that committee will, of course, inquire into it fully.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken. Before the announcement of the result,

Mr. BOUTELLE said: Mr. Speaker, I ask, if I may be permitted to do so—and I think I ought to be [cries of "Regular order!" from the Democratic side], notwithstanding the dissenting opinion of the little knot of members on the other side [cries of "Regular order!"]—I ask that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts may be read intelligibly to the House, so that all may know its purport, that it is simply a demand for an expression on the part of the House whether that sort of treasonable language shall be permitted here. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BARRETT. I demand a division on the motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 154, noes 41.

Mr. BARRETT. I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOUTELLE. I ask now that the resolution be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the resolution be again reported to the House.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I object.

Mr. BARRETT. I ask that the pending question be stated to the House. I demand, as a matter of privilege, the statement of the question.

Mr. WASHINGTON. I will withdraw my objection to the reading of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. If there be no further objection, the resolution will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. BARRETT. I now ask the Chair to state the pending question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the resolution just read be committed to the Judiciary Committee, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 201, nays 71, not voting 84; as follows:

YEAS—201.

Abbott,	De Armond,	Long,	Simpkins,
Acheson,	Denny,	Loud,	Skinner,
Aitken,	Dingley,	Loudenslager,	Smith, Mich.
Allen, Miss.	Dinsmore,	Maddox,	Snover,
Allen, Utah.	Dolliver,	Maguire,	Sorg,
Andrews,	Downing,	Mahon,	Southwick,
Apsley,	Draper,	McCall, Mass.	Spalding,
Arnold, Pa.	Eddy,	McCall, Tenn.	Sparkman,
Arnold, R. I.	Ellis,	McClure,	Spencer,
Avery,	Erdman,	McCreary, Ky.	Sperry,
Baker, Kans.	Evans,	McCulloch,	Stahle,
Bartholdt,	Fischer,	McDearmon,	Steele,
Bartlett, Ga.	Fletcher,	McEwan,	Stephenson,
Bartlett, N. Y.	Fowler,	McLachlan,	Stokes,
Beach,	Gillet, N. Y.	McLaurin,	Stone, C. W.
Bell, Colo.	Gillett, Mass.	McMillin,	Stone, W. A.
Bell, Tex.	Griswold,	McRae,	Strait,
Berry,	Grosvenor,	Mercer,	Strowd, N. C.
Bishop,	Hadley,	Meredith,	Sulzer,
Black, Ga.	Hall,	Meyer,	Swanson,
Boatner,	Harmer,	Miles,	Tarsney,
Bowers,	Harris,	Miller, W. Va.	Tate,
Broderick,	Harrison,	Milnes,	Terry,
Brosius,	Hart,	Mondell,	Towne,
Brown,	Henderson,	Money,	Tracewell,
Brumm,	Hendrick,	Neill,	Tracey,
Buck,	Henry, Conn.	Newlands,	Treloar,
Burrell,	Hermann,	Northway,	Tucker,
Burton, Mo.	Hicks,	Otey,	Turner, Ga.
Cannon,	Hilborn,	Patterson,	Turner, Va.
Catchings,	Hitt,	Payne,	Tyler,
Clardy,	Hooker,	Pearson,	Underwood,
Clark, Iowa	Huff,	Pendleton,	Updegraff,
Cobb, Ala.	Hulick,	Perkins,	Van Voorhis,
Cobb, Mo.	Hull,	Phillips,	Walker, Mass.
Cockrell,	Hutcheson,	Powers,	Walker, Va.
Codding,	Hyde,	Price,	Wanger,
Coffin,	Kem,	Pugh,	Washington,
Cooke, Ill.	Kendall,	Reyburn,	Watson, Ind.
Cooper, Fla.	Kerr,	Richardson,	White,
Cooper, Tex.	Kiefer,	Robbins,	Wilber,
Corliss,	Knox,	Robertson, La.	Williams,
Cox,	Kyle,	Robinson, Pa.	Willis,
Crisp,	Lacey,	Royse,	Wilson, N. Y.
Culberson,	Latimer,	Russell, Ga.	Wilson, Ohio.
Cummings,	Lawson,	Sayers,	Wilson, S. C.
Curtis, Iowa	Layton,	Settle,	Woodman,
Curtis, N. Y.	Lester,	Shafroth,	Wright.
Dalzell,	Lewis,	Shannon,
Danford,	Linney,	Sherman,
Daniels,	Little,	Shuford,

NAYS—71.

Anderson,	Doolittle,	Howe,	Reeves,
Bailey,	Dovener,	Howell,	Sauerhering,
Baker, N. H.	Fairchild,	Huling,	Smith, Ill.
Barney,	Faris,	Hurley,	Southard,
Barrett,	Fenton,	Jenkins,	Stallings,
Boutelle,	Gamble,	Lefever,	Stewart, N. J.
Brewster,	Gibson,	Leighty,	Stewart, Wis.
Burton, Ohio	Graff,	Linton,	Strode, Nebr.
Calderhead,	Griffin,	Mahany,	Sulloway,
Colson,	Hager,	McCormick,	Tawney,
Connolly,	Halterman,	Minor, Wis.	Thomas,
Cook, Wis.	Hardy,	Morse,	Wadsworth,
Cooper, Wis.	Hartman,	Murphy,	Walsh,
Cousins,	Hatch,	Overstreet,	Warner,
Crowther,	Heatwole,	Owens,	Wilson, Idaho
Crump,	Hemenway,	Pickler,	Wood,
Curtis, Kans.	Hepburn,	Poole,	Yoakum.
Dayton,	Hill,	Quigg,

NOT VOTING.—84.

Adams,	Bromwell,	Fitzgerald,	Hubbard,
Aldrich,	Bull,	Foote,	Hunter,
Atwood,	Chickering,	Foss,	Johnson, Cal.
Babcock,	Clark, Mo.	Gardner,	Johnson, Ind.
Baker, Md.	Clarke, Ala.	Grout,	Johnson, N. Dak.
Bankhead,	Cowen,	Grow,	Jones,
Barham,	Crain,	Hainer, Nebr.	Joy,
Belknap,	Crowley,	Hanly,	Kirkpatrick,
Bennett,	De Witt,	Heiner, Pa.	Kulp,
Bingham,	Dockery,	Henry, Ind.	Leisenring,
Black, N. Y.	Ellett, Va.	Hopkins,	Leonard,
Blue,	Elliott, S. C.	Howard,	Livingston,
Lockhart,	Milliken,	Parker,	Strong,
Lorimer,	Miner, N. Y.	Pitney,	Taft,
Low,	Moody,	Prince,	Talbert,
Marsh,	Moses,	Raney,	Tayler,
McCleary, Minn.	Mozley,	Ray,	Watson, Ohio
McClellan,	Noonan,	Rusk,	Wellington,
McKenney,	Odell,	Russell, Conn.	Wheeler,
Meiklejohn,	Ogden,	Scranton,	Woodard,
Miller, Kans.	Otjen,	Shaw,	Woomer.

So the motion of Mr. DALZELL was agreed to.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

On motion of Mr. DALZELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BUSINESS OF THE JUDICIARY COMMITTEE.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to ask unanimous consent that it be permitted to sit during the sessions of this House.

There was no objection.

NICARAGUA CANAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

To the House of Representatives:

Pursuant to the request made in a House resolution passed on the 30th day of January, 1896, I herewith transmit the report, with accompanying maps and exhibits, of the board of engineers under the provisions of chapter 189, of laws of 1895, for the purpose of ascertaining the feasibility, permanence, and cost of the construction and completion of the Nicaragua Canal by the route contemplated and provided for by the act which passed the Senate January 28, 1895, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Maritime Canal Company of Nicaragua,' approved February 20, 1889."

GROVER CLEVELAND.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. 3009) granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota; and

A bill (H. R. 3728) to amend section 21 of an act entitled, "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. 4991) to open forest reservations in the State of Colorado for the location of mining claims; and

Joint resolution (H. Res. 79) granting use of White Lot and Monument Grounds to "The Committee of 1896."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. 1447) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate Lieut. Commander R. G. M. Brown, now on the retired list, to be a commander on the retired list; and

A bill (S. 1740) to amend section 5294 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relative to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or mitigate fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and for other purposes.

A further message from the Senate, by Mr. Cox, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the following order:

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that the Senate has elected WILLIAM P. FRYE, a Senator from the State of Maine, President of the Senate pro tempore, to hold and exercise the office in the absence of the Vice-President from time to time, during the pleasure of the Senate, in accordance with the terms of its resolution passed March 12, 1890.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 879) to amend an act entitled "An act to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory."

CHAPLAIN AT WEST POINT.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill on the Speaker's table (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309 of the Revised Statutes, relative to the chaplaincy at West Point, be taken up, that the Senate amendments be disagreed to, and that the House agree to the committee of conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309 of the Revised Statutes.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. HULL. I move that the House disagree to the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I will ask the gentleman to state the nature of the original bill.

Mr. HULL. It is simply to provide for a chaplain at West Point, instead of having him appointed as a professor.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I remember the bill now.

Mr. CANNON. What is the matter at issue?

Mr. HULL. It is simply a question of salary.

Mr. CANNON. Whether he shall have $2,500 or $3,500?

Mr. HULL. Whether he shall be paid as a captain or as a lieutenant-colonel.

The motion of Mr. HULL was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HULL, Mr. TRACEY, and Mr. MCMILLIN.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, after conference with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, I ask unanimous consent that the pension session for this evening be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks that the usual pension session this evening be dispensed with, stating that he does so in accordance with an arrangement with the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. PICKLER], chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. Is there objection?

Mr. PICKLER. I understand that if the Calendar of private pension bills shall become crowded we shall have no difficulty in getting an extra night or some extra time for the consideration of business on that Calendar, and I give way for that reason.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine.

There was no objection.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, before moving that the House resolve into Committee of the Whole, I desire to see if some arrangement can not be made with reference to debate in Committee of the Whole. I have conferred with gentlemen upon all sides of the House with reference to time, and while I desired very much that the general debate might be closed to-day, yet I have found on inquiry that there was a desire that it should continue through to-morrow. I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the general debate in Committee of the Whole on the bill to which I have referred shall terminate at the close of the legislative day of Saturday. I put it in that form with the view of hereafter asking that the House take a recess on Saturday until 10 o'clock on Monday morning, so as to give two hours in that morning for further general debate, and that there be a session this evening also.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that the general debate in Committee of the Whole shall close at the close of the legislative day of Saturday. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of California. Mr. Speaker, I should like to inquire what length of time the gentleman from Maine proposes to give for five-minute debate?

Mr. DINGLEY. Of course that is a matter that is entirely in the control of the committee when we shall reach it. That will be entered upon on Monday, and I have no desire at all to restrict that debate beyond what may seem to be reasonable and proper.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COLSON. I object.

Mr. DINGLEY. What is the objection? Is it to the arrangement as to the time for general debate?

Mr. COLSON. I object to closing general debate at the time stated by the gentleman from Maine, because there are many members here who have had no opportunity to discuss the question before the committee. I think every Representative upon this floor should be accorded the right to be heard upon this important question. Therefore I object.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 2904; and pending that motion, I move that general debate in Committee of the Whole close at the termination of the legislative day of Saturday. I desire to make a statement in connection with that, by general connsent, that the intention is to have an evening session this evening and to-morrow evening, and also a session from 10 to 12 on Monday, so that gentlemen can see that it gives a very wide range.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to move an amendment. I should like to get the consent of the gentleman from Maine to it. I know, as do all members of the House, that the gentleman always intends to give everybody a chance and to be perfectly fair. I will suggest that it will be much more satisfactory, and I will move, as an amendment, to strike out the words "legislative day of Saturday."

Mr. DINGLEY. The arrangement which I suggested will carry it until 12 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand; but it will not give a Monday night session.

Mr. DINGLEY. That will be given if desired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I move to strike out those words "legislative day of Saturday" and substitute "legislative day of Tuesday."

Mr. DINGLEY. I want to call my friend's attention to the fact that on Monday the bill will be open for debate under the five-minute rule, and it seems to me that is the most instructive debate after all.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is perhaps the most instructive part of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MCMILLIN. Will the chairman of our committee permit me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I submit that motion, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MCMILLIN. I do not think there is any disposition to unnecessarily prolong this debate; but I find around me a large number of gentlemen who have not had an opportunity to speak, and who wish to be heard; and it seems to me that instead of closing general debate on Saturday, and having the five-minute debate on Monday, it could be arranged so that general debate shall close with the Monday session, and that will give an opportunity for a number of gentlemen to speak. This is a very important question, whether we consider it from the standpoint of the Senate bill or the House bill; and therefore I hope the gentleman from Maine will consent to fix the closing of general debate for Monday evening instead of Saturday. That will give a number of gentlemen an opportunity to speak who otherwise would not have any chance, and the gentleman will also remember that this question has been of such general importance that quite a number of gentlemen opposing this bill have occupied more than an hour, and thereby cut off a portion of the time which could have been allowed to others.

Mr. DINGLEY. I will withdraw my motion at the suggestion of gentlemen around me, because I wish to be as liberal as possible in the allowance of time, although we have a number of appropriation bills on the Calendar that we desire to have acted upon as early as possible, and will modify my request so that all general debate in the Committee of the Whole shall terminate with the legislative day of Monday.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And I withdraw my motion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Maine moves that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering House bill No. 2904.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

BOND REDEMPTION FUND.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. "The gentleman from Massachusetts" declines to be recognized for thirty minutes, but will speak in his own right, and under the rules, for an hour, if he chooses, if he speaks at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to state to the gentleman from Massachusetts what he already knows—that time for debate is limited. A very large number of gentlemen have come to the Chair and remarked that they desired to speak, and a hundred names, or nearly that number, the Chair has marked upon the list of gentlemen who desire to speak. The Chair has endeavored to arrange with the different gentlemen for the time that they shall occupy, among others with the gentleman from Massachusetts. The Chair has had an arrangement with him from the beginning of the debate until yesterday afternoon that he was to be recognized for thirty minutes, and the Chair tried to recognize him for that time, as the committee well knows, on yesterday afternoon; but because the committee saw fit to extend the time of some gentlemen that arrangement was interfered with. The Chair still desires to carry out the arrangement with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and recognizes him for thirty minutes.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will say that the Chair has declined to "carry out that arrangement," as the Chair told me last evening that he did not know when he could recognize me, or whether he would recognize me at all, and he repudiated the arrangement he made with me; and further, he repudiated the arrangement that——

Mr. CANNON. The Chair recognizes you now.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No, sir; not in my own right. [Continuing:] The arrangement that had been made between the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN] and myself, that I was to have fifty minutes of his time, the Chair [Mr. PAYNE] repudiated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman for thirty minutes.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I must be recognized in my own right as a Representative to speak on this floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that it would be impossible to carry out the arrangements already made if the gentleman is to be recognized in that way. If the gentleman declines to be recognized for thirty minutes, the Chair will be compelled to recognize some other gentleman.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The gentleman from South

Carolina [Mr. McLAURIN] made an arrangement with me on this floor yesterday afternoon that he was to give me fifty minutes. Besides that I was entitled to fifteen minutes that the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] did not use, and when I sought to carry out that arrangement and add that to the fifteen minutes, the Chair declined to carry it out and he declined to agree to recognize me at all, saying, "Perhaps he could do so and he would see about it." The Chair has not recognized the agreement that he made between himself and me, and when the presiding officer refuses to do so, I am compelled to ask to be recognized, if at all, in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that he desires to do no injustice. The Chair on yesterday apportioned out the full time until 5 o'clock, and the gentleman from Massachusetts knows it as well as the Chair knows it. After the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] had occupied thirty minutes and the Chair had called the gentleman to order because his time had expired, an effort was made to extend the time of the gentleman from California. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McLAURIN] offered to give him his time. Previous to that the gentleman from South Carolina had taken the floor and occupied it for ten minutes in his own right and had yielded the floor without reserving a moment of his time. After the gentleman from Massachusetts had yielded to the gentleman from California the whole of his time, the Chair was informed by some member that the gentleman from Massachusetts was to have the remaining time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McLAURIN], and the Chair responded that the gentleman from South Carolina had no time, and in fact the Chair had not understood that any such arrangement had been made. That was all that transpired yesterday on this subject, and after the gentleman from Massachusetts had yielded his time to the gentleman from California the Chair carried out the other arrangement with the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SETTLE], who occupied the time until nearly 5 o'clock. The gentleman from Massachusetts did not ask to have the ten minutes yesterday afternoon, and of course the Chair could not give it to him if he did not want it. Now the Chair has offered the gentleman from Massachusetts to recognize him as the first speaker this morning for thirty minutes and has done so.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I wish to say that these arrangements for time are not made under the rules of the House, and I have a right, as the Representative of a district in this Congress, to stand upon my right under the rules, and I wish now to be given my full time. The gentleman from South Carolina said on this floor six times yesterday that he yielded me his time. I read from the RECORD:

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.
Mr. JOHNSON of California. I ask unanimous consent to continue my remarks.
Mr. BOWERS. I ask that the gentleman have fifteen minutes more.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] is entitled to the floor.
Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will consent to an extension of the gentleman's time if I can have the floor when we commence the session to-morrow.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not make that promise, as the time is already parceled out.
Mr. McLAURIN. I am entitled to fifty minutes as a member of the committee, and I yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from California.
The CHAIRMAN. It can not be done under objection.
Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. Chairman, I believe I am entitled to that time, as I understand it, as a member of the committee.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chairman does not recognize the gentleman from South Carolina.
Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. McLAURIN. I should like to know if the objection of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SETTLE] extended to my granting a portion of my time to the gentleman from California?
The CHAIRMAN. Debate upon this question is out of order. Objection has been made. [Cries of "Regular order."]
Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will yield to the gentleman rather than have this discussion go on all night.
The CHAIRMAN. How much time does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?
Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I desire to have thirty minutes to discuss this question. If I can not have it at any other time, I want it now.
Mr. McLAURIN. I will yield time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] myself.
Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will yield all my time to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON], with the understanding that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McLAURIN] is to give me his time. [Applause.]
Mr. McLAURIN. Yes; I will give the gentleman my time. [Applause.]
The CHAIRMAN. What portion of his time does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] yield?
Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. All of it—thirty minutes. [Applause on the Democratic side.]
Mr. McLAURIN. And I will return the same amount to the gentleman from Massachusetts out of my time. [Applause.]

And he repeated that statement six times in a loud tone of voice in the presence of the presiding officer, and the Chair then thought he thoroughly understood that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McLAURIN] controlled fifty minutes, as is plainly shown by the Chairman [Mr. PAYNE] saying, "It can not be done under objection."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts doubt the word of the Chair when the Chair states that he did not hear that statement made by the gentleman from South Carolina?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I have no parliamentary right to question that, but it is not my fault. This is very extraordinary. The arrangement was made on the floor in the full hearing of all the members, and if the Chair has any defect of hearing, as we all know he has [laughter], and did not hear it, I do not propose to suffer by that. [Laughter.] Now, I am standing on my rights and I want my hour, as the rules give me.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. Chairman, may I say just a word?

The CHAIRMAN. Under the practice of the House the Chair has recognized the gentleman for a certain length of time, and has made the limitation of time a condition of the recognition. The reason for that is that members who desire to speak, and who are ready to speak, can not be recognized under any other arrangement. Therefore the Chair proposes to recognize the gentleman from Massachusetts now for thirty minutes, and if the committee desire after that to extend his time, that is for the committee to determine and not for the Chair. The Chair is simply trying to carry out the wishes of the committee and the House in limiting this debate.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. Chairman, may I be permitted to say a word? There seems to be a misunderstanding in regard to this matter of time. On yesterday morning I desired a few minutes, and spoke to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER], who agreed to allow me ten minutes. I then went and spoke to the presiding officer and that was agreed to, and, having an understanding with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. WHEELER] that the time I occupied then was to be returned out of my time, when I completed my remarks I failed to use the formal words "I reserve the remainder of my time," because I supposed I was speaking in the time of the gentleman from Alabama. On yesterday evening I offered to give the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] as much time out of mine as he had granted to the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. The gentleman from Massachusetts having yielded his time, relying on that understanding, I think it would be a gross injustice to him to limit him as is proposed, and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed to proceed for thirty minutes more.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I decline to speak under an old arrangement repudiated by the Chair. The presiding officer sat in this chair right in front of me here and was just rising from it to go and take the Speaker's chair when I said to him, "I decline to be recognized by you for thirty minutes, and I propose to get the floor for an hour in my own right." Now, the Chair says that it was under an arrangement that I was to speak for thirty minutes. I say deliberately that it was not so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated distinctly that the arrangement all the time down to last evening was that the gentleman from Massachusetts was to be recognized for thirty minutes, and the Chair has not broken that arrangement, but proposes to carry it out.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts desire thirty minutes more?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes, sir; I do.

Mr. CANNON. Then, Mr. Chairman, under the circumstances I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts have thirty minutes in addition to the time for which he is recognized by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. KEM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire as to whether that will interfere with the rights of any other member who has been promised time to speak.

The CHAIRMAN. It will not interfere with the rights of any member upon the other side of the question.

Mr. KEM. But will it interfere with the right of any member?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, in view of the list which he has before him, that some members upon the same side of the question with the gentleman from Massachusetts must have their time cut down. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that the gentleman from Massachusetts be allowed to proceed for thirty minutes in addition to the thirty minutes for which the Chair has recognized him?

There was no objection; and Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts was recognized for one hour.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

During the delivery of Mr. WALKER'S remarks the Committee of the Whole rose informally; and Mr. DINGLEY having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, the following business was transacted:

By unanimous consent, the Committee on Naval Affairs was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 153) authorizing the persons therein named to accept certain decorations and testimonial from the late Hawaiian Government, and the same was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 5566) to prohibit prize fighting and pugilism and fights between men and animals, and to provide penalties therefor, in the Territories and the District of Columbia.

COIN REDEMPTION FUND.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union resumed its session.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, in opening my remarks I wish to say to the House that what I have done with reference to the Chairman has been done under compulsion in protecting my own rights and the rights of all other members of this House. Having been placed by the Speaker of this House in the third most responsible official position in this country on matters now in question, I felt compelled to speak. I did not at first propose to do so, for I thought I had exhausted in previous speeches what I had to say on this subject. It was only because of the gross injustice done me by the present occupant of the Speaker's chair that I took the course I have taken.

Mr. Chairman, let me say, first, that this question is purely an economic question. The fact that silver has been used in any previous time, in any particular manner, is nothing to the point at issue in this discussion. It is as much out of order, in being urged as a reason why we should grant the free coinage of silver, to quote any previous condition of silver as it would be to urge the fact that our forefathers rode in ox carts, subsequently in stagecoaches, to say that therefore we should not ride in steam cars, and to argue that therefore we ought to use ox carts, stagecoaches, and that such vehicles ought to be treated by law and in every other respect as steam cars.

But, Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that the position of the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] and of the other gentlemen from the so-called silver States is the taken on this floor by any Representative of any State since 1860. What position do they take on this floor?

MOST REMARKABLE OF ANY POSITION

The gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON] says:

> The American people are fighting among themselves because they do not look on both sides of the question of the money of the country. The men from the East are for gold; the men from the West, like the knight in the legend, are for silver.

Mr. Chairman, there never was a statement made on this floor in behalf of the silver cause that was more variant from the facts than that statement—never.

The gentleman says again:

> There are 9 States of this Union polling 37 electoral votes that are solid for free silver.

And the gentleman might have added that 7 of those States have 14 Senators and only 7 Representatives. Now, what is the position of those States. They are gold measure of value States, beyond reach of the legislation of these United States. We can no more reach a single obligation payable in those States than we can reach obligations payable in Great Britain. There is not a single one of those States in which every time obligation is not principal and interest are made payable in gold. It is so in California. That is the universal rule. I hold in my hand a copy of the ordinary notes used in those States. They are made payable "for value received in United States gold coin."

PRACTICALLY WRITTEN IN GOLD;

Mr. HARTMAN. I desire to interrupt the gentleman. I can not speak for California, but I say that the gentleman's statement is absolutely incorrect as to the State from which I hail. Our notes are not made payable in gold; they are payable in lawful money of the United States.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The gentleman has interjected that into my remarks. I repeat that in all but exceptional cases, a comparatively few cases, where the transactions are not large and where the parties are the common people who are not posted in the

CUSTOMS OF THE COMMERCIAL CLASSES;

with these exceptions their notes are payable in gold. Furthermore——

Mr. HARTMAN again rose.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I decline to yield for any further statements of that kind. The gentleman having interjected that statement into my remarks, I can not give him the opportunity to repeat it fifteen or twenty times. [Laughter.]

Furthermore, what are the facts with regard to those States? The banks of those States are gold banks. They hold seven and a half million dollars in gold. They hold only eight hundred and nineteen thousand dollars in silver—just enough for the purpose of small money under five dollars among their people. They are beyond the reach of legislation. Being safe themselves, they would degrade us. Ah, but says the gentleman from California again—

> I wish to do right by our voters. I wish to do right by the people. I wish that we would do something in regard to this question. I do believe in my party doing something for the cause of silver. Do something to cause its rehabilitation as the money of the nation. That is all I ask.

That is all they ask, is it? But what is this they ask? They ask that all the States this side of the Mississippi River shall be degraded to

A SILVER MEASURE OF VALUE,

to a silver standard with Mexico, China, etc., when, as I said before, no law of Congress, no legislation which by their votes they force on us, can reach those nine States. There may be a few exceptions in one of the States or in certain sections; but where there is one neighborhood in any of those nine States whose obligations are not all written in gold, there are ten times as many sections from Texas and up, west of the Mississippi, and, in fact, all over this country, whose obligations are written in gold. At least one-quarter of the obligations all over this country are now written in gold—I am speaking of the obligations of sharp, shrewd, keen men of affairs. But, while keeping their dollar whole, they would cut our dollars in two that are received by the unthinking, the careless, the wage worker, and all who adhere to old customs throughout the United States in taking and giving notes.

So that these men in coming here and taking the position they do, throwing themselves across the ordinary legislation of the country they demand that no legislation shall be had unless it be first to degrade all the money of the rest of the country to the level of the silver measure-of-value countries, while not a hair of their heads is touched and themselves retain the honest gold measure of value to their people. Those States making this demand have a population, eight of them, of only 1,377,000; they have 16 Senators to enforce their demands, but happily only 10 Representatives.

TO LEGISLATE BY FORCE,

A gentleman sitting near me states that in South Dakota there is an express statute prohibiting gold contracts.

Mr. GAMBLE. With the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I desire to state that he is mistaken as far as the legislation of my own State is concerned. If South Dakota is included in the list of States which he has read as adhering to the gold standard, he is in error.

In 1891 the legislature of that State enacted that it should be unlawful for any person in the State, whether it be the mortgagee or the owner of any kind of evidence of indebtedness, or his agent, to require that the interest or principal, or any part, should be paid in any certain kind of lawful money, such as gold, silver, or any specific kind of money, and the debt should be deemed satisfied and fully paid when the specified amount stated in the debt, with legal interest, was tendered in any money that was legal tender for public or private debts.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I am glad one of those States has and came back into the Union in 1891. I do not wish to do injustice to anyone and am glad to be corrected. This list of States and the facts I have stated were given to me by the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON], and so far as he is concerned his design and purpose, by his own confession, is as I have stated.

REPUDIATED MONETARY SECESSION

Now, Mr. Chairman, this is not a question of coinage at all. Grant free coinage to-day, and instead of having more silver dollars coined you would have none. There would be no object in coining them. Every ounce of silver the world over would be potentially at the doors of the mint, physically not an ounce; because we have now more silver coin than the people can use even with free coinage and there would be no inducement to bring it here. We can only use what coin people will carry. They have free coinage in Mexico, and more dollars per capita than the average circulation per capita in that country. Circulation per capita in Mexico is $5, and they coin more than $5 per capita each year and it does not add a fraction of a cent to the volume of silver in circulation. It is all exported. This is purely and solely a question of taking from us the old gold measure of value and giving us in exchange a measure of value strange to us—the silver measure.

THEY COIN IN MEXICO EVERY YEAR

I have been asked to state what the effect would be of the free and unlimited coinage of silver by this country alone. I have indicated already part of what I believe would be the effect, but the result of it in this country must inevitably be to put us on a silver measure of value, excepting in the States forcing it upon us, and that immediately. There is not a Government or a merchant or trader in the world that pays the slightest attention to coinage. It has not the slightest significance in values. On the 1st day of every month in this country, and in every other country, there is giving the value of the moneys of the other countries named in invoices and on which duties are paid on goods imported in exactly the grains of silver or gold of the gold or silver coin that happens to be the measure of value for each particular country.

A STATEMENT SENT TO ALL THE CUSTOM-HOUSES

This simple and incontestable fact disputes every one of your theories about unlimited coinage of silver. Grant free coinage to-day, and it is inconceivable to every man who is a merchant or has had his attention called to the matter, or who has had the slightest thing to do with foreign commerce or largely with domestic commerce, how we could do so and not cut our dollar of account and payment down to one-half its present value. Furthermore, the result would be wrought out in doubling the price to our people of every dollar's worth of merchandise imported from abroad, and at once. And the doubling the price of the merchandise manufactured in this country would soon follow, because there is made by the steamboats and all quick and cheap transportation throughout the world.

A WORLD'S PRICE LEVEL

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I would like, with the gentleman's permission, to ask him a question just there.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I believe the gentleman is a protectionist?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I am.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. And I would be glad to ask the gentleman what would be the effect, if his statement is correct, that if we coin silver it would double the cost of imports from foreign countries into the United States? Would it not give us the very best protective tariff we have ever had in this country? [Applause.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. It certainly would give us the most protective and the worst tariff we have ever had, by absolutely putting a stop to all foreign commerce for awhile. Just as sure as the sun is to rise, and until readjustments were made, it would also in the country by doubling to him the cost of everything he consumed; and therefore, as markets are in wages, and wholly in wages, in the long run it would inevitably shut up, and at once, one-half of the factories in the country. Is there a man present who will deny it? Do you not admit it? Must it not inevitably be the effect? Why, there is no more doubt of it, Mr. Chairman, than that we are sitting here on these benches. You double the cost to the consumer of every article he buys, and you at once halve his power to buy, and you halve the market and shut up half the factories and workshops. Do you doubt it? If so, I yield to any man who will express a doubt and tell me why not, who desires to contradict the statement.

HALVE THE WAGES OF EVERY WORKINGMAN

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. I will take advantage of that——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Well, I will yield for a question. [Mr. ALLEN of Utah advanced from his seat in a further corner toward the area in front of the Speaker's chair.] I decline now to yield longer. I yielded for a question, but I did not yield for floor walking. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, now, again, we have talked much about an international conference; that we would coin silver at 16 to 1 in connection with all the rest of the world. Do you know what that means? Call your conference, and I am in favor of it; make your trial, and I am in favor of it, as a practical demonstration of the impossibility of doing anything

TO INCREASE THE PRICE OF SILVER

by legislation or by diplomacy. Call your conference, I say; make your agreement between all the nations of the world; enter into your binding treaty obligations, and it will not affect the relative price of gold and silver by the smallest fraction of a penny. It can not. It is not possible to do it. It is not a question of coinage even. It is a question of the metal of account, and of values, and of prices, the world over, and if you grant free coinage to-day at 16 to 1 and open all the mints the world over, "chaos would come again," or no effect would follow. The millions, billions, trillions, and so on, to figures past the comprehension of man, involved in the value of the total of all existing things of exchange could by no possibility be readjusted for many generations to the new conditions of value, of account. The stupendous results proposed would stop any trying of the task. The task would be to of every existing thing, immediately double every debt, double every wage paid, or halve prices in every gold-measure country.

DOUBLE THE PRICE IN EVERY SILVER COUNTRY

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. May I ask the gentleman a question now?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes, if you will ask it standing where you are. [Laughter.]

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Is it not a principle of the Republican party that we ought to have high prices and high wages?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No, sir.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. It is not?

Mr. HARTMAN. Yes.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I beg your pardon. I [to Mr. HARTMAN] think I am to answer the question, not the gentleman from Montana. [Laughter.] I have one associate Representative on this floor in the gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE], and I do not propose to take on any more. [Laughter.]

The rule of the REPUBLICAN PARTY MAKES HIGH WAGES

and cheap products. [Applause on the Republican side.] That is the effect of Republican legislation.

Mr. STEPHENSON. And sound money?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. And sound money; yes, I accept the amendment inadvertently omitted. I should have put it in a little later. High wages, shorter hours, sound money, and cheap products. [Applause.] Those are the effects the Republican party strives for. No Mexican wages.

Now, again, Mr. Chairman, they say, "If you will grant us free coinage of silver it will go a great way toward meeting the competition we are to have from silver measure-of-value countries, where they are making rapid strides in manufacturing with our machinery." Yea, yea, so it will, by halving the wages of every American workingman. It will have a great effect. I grant it; but at a price in suffering, misery, and starvation that will set the civilization of this country back a century, or rather that will more than a century in the next two hundred years.

HINDER THE PROGRESS OF CIVILIZATION

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Certainly; yes.

Mr. ALLEN of Utah. Then, on your theory, if products are to be low, the farmer is to work for low wages, and the man who works in a factory in New England is to have high wages. I think the gentleman is driven to that conclusion.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Perhaps; but "the gentleman from Massachusetts" is of a different opinion about the "driving"; that is all. I want to say to the gentleman from Utah that the farmer on the average farm to-day can get twice and a half in gold for a day's work on the farm, in the price of his products—twice and a half what he could before 1855, and I will show you that before I get through, if my time holds out, if the Chairman remains complacent—and the House also. [Laughter.]

Now, I want to repeat here what I have said in every speech that I have made on this subject: that there is an inexorable world's measure of value which no nation and no individual has ever been able to vary by the slightest fraction for eighty years. Is it coinage? Nay, verily, it is

A SIMPLE GRAIN OF UNCOINED GOLD.

It measures the price of every dozen of eggs in the remotest hamlet touched by commerce in any country, as it does the building of the largest steamship that ever floated in any navy. When the price of anything sold (which is a subject of commerce), is given in silver it is the number of grains of silver that will buy a given number of grains of gold that are asked for it. Every price is brought to that test at last, as it was here throughout our war of secession. It can no more be evaded or changed or shirked or got away from than we can get away from breathing air or drinking water. They may do the latter in some States, but not the former. [Laughter.]

There is no evidence now submitted, and there never has been since this discussion began, that prices have been very largely—and I mark my words, as I always do every word I utter in this House, in their limitations—there is no evidence that prices anywhere the world over have been very materially affected by the disparity and the departure of the price of silver from the value of gold. The have been a very serious hindrance to trade; not its steady depreciation. There is not only a world measure of value, but there is a world price; and a grain of silver and a grain of gold will buy just as much in any village in China, or India, or Mexico, or the United States, or Great Britain, or France, as in any other country and no more; each precisely the same, lacking commissions and transportation. This is susceptible of proof beyond controversy. Think of the speech on economics that we got from the gentleman from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. Not a single fact, statement, or inference in it material to the issue. Every existing obligation in this country is honestly payable in gold values. Every existing obligation was made in gold values. We have been on a gold measure of value only since 1834, with the exception of the period of the suspension of specie payments, from 1862 to 1879.

FLUCTUATIONS IN THE PRICE OF SILVER

Another thing. They talk about the value of gold. They get up to discuss the question, and state it as a fact that gold does not vary in value, that it does not go up, and that it does not go down in value. Stationary as the heavens. There are a great many speeches made on this floor that are clipped from other speeches, and when once started they keep going from generation to generation, the same as

M'DUFFIE'S SPEECH ON FREE TRADE.

It has been repeated on this floor ever since 1832. Why, I know when the free traders get up precisely what they are going to say, if they have any wit, for I have read McDuffie's speech; and there never has been a speech made since his day that begins to be as able as McDuffie's in 1832. His logic is irresistible, if you admit his premises, and his ability has not been excelled from his day to the present.

So we are told a good deal about bimetallism. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] told you accurately what bimetallism is. Any device which causes a reasonable quantity of two metals to freely circulate together is bimetallism. It is impossible to have bimetallism upon any other plan but a forced plan, one of treaty or law. It never has existed except on trade lines, on mercantile lines, on laws of commerce, except it has been controlled by law and forced by law, and one metal usually has been a token to the other and commanded the other, one being acknowledged as the real measure of value. It has been so as to gold for centuries.

We have the coinage of gold in every silver measure-of-value country there is in the world, but it is not bimetallism? We had in this country from 1792 to 1834 laws granting legal bimetallism; but we were practically

ON A MONOMETALLIC SILVER MEASURE OF VALUE.

Every candid man admits we have had laws granting bimetallism and providing for it, but we have always been a monometallic nation, on silver, up to 1834, and on gold since until 1878. From 1878 we have been a bimetallic nation upon the only practical ground upon which, under existing circumstances, a nation can by any possibility be bimetallic. This silver discussion in this country, first begun as greenbackism and the heresy as regards legal-tender paper notes in unlimited quantity, and then silver being substituted for greenbackism, has cost this country millions upon millions and billions upon billions; taken out of whom? Every dollar of it out of the wage worker, to go into the pockets of the speculator and the manufacturer and the men who conduct the great enterprises of the country, to again be dissipated in failures and disasters and in various monetary crises that have overtaken the country, all finally at the expense of each.

Mr. TERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. In a minute. Let me give you this fact, that $2,000 compounded semiannually at 3 per cent will amount to $4,086.80 in twenty-four years; and only $1,000 at 6 per cent, compounded semiannually, will amount to $4,132; that is to say, you can borrow $2,000 at 3 per cent if sure of payment, as in the case of the Government and others to-day, or you can borrow $1,000 at 6 per cent to be compounded; each amounts to the same sum in twenty-four years; and every business man and every other wise man cares more for good credit and ultimate wealth than he does for immediate profit. Now I will answer the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. TERRY. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he said that bimetallism implies circulation of both metals?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. TERRY. If that be true, and you have a gold standard, does that imply that you have a gold circulation?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No, sir; not at all. The measure-of-value metal does not even indicate what really is. The gold coin of this country today only circulates in California and a few Western States as currency. It is held for a measure-of-value metal by institutions where written obligations meet and are settled as scales stand in shops and factories to weigh or a measure to measure.

THE COMMON MONEY OF THE PEOPLE

Mr. TERRY. If a gold standard does not imply a gold circulation, why, then, does the gentleman argue that a bimetallic standard necessarily implies a bimetallic circulation?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. From the fact that while the gold only circulates potentially the cheaper money—the silver—actually circulates, each at parity. It is not practical to circulate gold dollars under $5, and it is practical to circulate ones and twos in silver. In this country the advocates of free silver have taken every action they could take by buying it and piling it up before the eyes of the people to frighten the country, thus discrediting it and depreciating its price. There are no two opinions on this point among business men and financiers, that the price of silver would not now be as low by 25 per cent if this country had never cursed it by legislation.

TO DESTROY THE COMMERCIAL VALUE OF SILVER

It is the unanimous opinion of financiers; and they know as much about finance as a farmer does about farming, as a doctor does about medicine, or as a shoemaker, as I am, about shoemaking. Why talk this nonsense about silver? It is no better and deserves no more legislation than wheat, gold, cotton, corn, or oats, and coining gold is no more to it than measure or weight is to the others. The measure of all things is human effort. Human effort—price of human effort—makes the price of all articles of commerce. No article has a basic price that exceeds the price of human effort. Now, by human effort gold has depreciated, as measured in wages, 51½ per cent since 1840, and the production has increased one-third. Silver has depreciated 73.9, while its production has increased threefold. Furthermore, the use of metal money of any kind has increased in its efficiency by thousands of folds. Take $1,000 in gold to-day and it will do what it would take $3,000,000 to do by the methods of eighty years ago.

All admit as economists that

INCREASING THE EFFICIENCY OF ANYTHING

is equivalent to increasing it in quantity. Horses for use, cars for use, wagons for use, plows for use, carriages for use, increasing their efficiency, is equivalent to multiplying them. Here is an object lesson in economics. Since 1840 gold measured in products has depreciated 44.7 per cent. Silver has depreciated 71.2 per cent. Since 1873 gold has depreciated 12.6, and silver 57.6. Overproduction has increased, and cheaper labor cost, and these together account wholly for the depreciation in prices, the cost of labor being less because of greater efficiency, greater skill, and the wonderful machinery used. In 1873 the grains of this country that were produced per capita were 35.6 bushels; in 1892, 51.3, half as much again, and actually a less percentage exported in 1892 than in 1873.

Why, Mr. Chairman, the gold measure-of-value countries produce 80 per cent of all the wheat that is produced in the world, and there is not an economist who has any reputation, or even one with no reputation, for that matter, but believes and thinks he can prove, as I believe he can, that the one-third of any product which averages to costs the most makes the price for the whole body of that product. This can be proved in a dozen ways, and it can be proved in a dozen ways that the even to the smallest iota by the product of wheat in a silver measure-of-value country; and it is impossible that it should be so affected while 80 per cent of the wheat is produced in gold measure-of-value countries.

PRICE OF WHEAT NEVER HAS BEEN AFFECTED

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. BRUMM. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the cost of human effort makes the price of all things?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes, ultimately.

Mr. BRUMM. That is, that the question of supply and demand is not a factor in the price of any commodity?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Supply and demand is not an abiding factor in the price of any commodity. I make the broad statement that supply and demand is never an abiding and controlling element in determining the price. It influences prices; it does not fix them.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman permit me to give an illustration?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes; but be quick about it, and speak so we all can hear. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. I will make it loud enough. [Speaking very loudly.] Suppose that in a winter which is very cold the ice is frozen thickly—I am assuming that this case occurs before the method of manufacturing ice artificially was known—suppose that in a very cold winter the ice is frozen thick and it costs comparatively little to house it; and next, suppose that the succeeding summer is very hot. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts say that the heat of the summer, which is a reason for an increased demand for ice, will have no effect upon the price regardless of what it cost to house that ice? [Applause.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I think the House will thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania for not asking a personal question and in private in debate, as is the bad custom in this House—a custom, I observe, which is tolerated by the Chair whoever may be the occupant. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, is not that a rich question? I went out once to talk to a polytechnic school in Worcester, and was propounding this same doctrine, and the president of the institution was so surprised that he inadvertently exclaimed, "How about pears? How about the price of pears?" Pears in economics!

ICE IN ECONOMICS! PEARS! ICE!

[Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. Ice is a commodity, is it not?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Commodity, yes; and so is dirt a commodity. So is water in a drought.

Mr. BRUMM. Ice used to be a luxury, but it is now an absolute necessity.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. But does any man doubt that the price of ice, in any series of ten years, is fixed by what it costs to produce it, sometimes more and sometimes less—but averages that? Are the profits on the average more to ice dealers than to dealers or producers of shoes, coats, or hats?

Mr. BRUMM. What accounts for it?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Supply and demand.

Mr. BRUMM. Certainly.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Who said that supply and demand did not influence price? Nobody but you. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRUMM. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I understood his answer to be directly this—because I put the question in that way—that the

COST OF HUMAN EFFORT MAKES THE PRICE

of all things, and when I asked the gentleman whether supply and demand was not a factor in making the price, he said "No; practically not at all."

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I say again, practically not at all. Supply and demand influence price. If you have an oversupply of anything the price will go down to cost, or even below it.

Mr. BRUMM. Permit me to say now——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No; I am not going to let you do all the talking. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, when you come to supply the vacuum that is made by consumption, I say that not a single shoe, or boot, or yard of cloth, or anything else will be produced that can not be sold at a profit upon the wages that enter into its cost; and the gentleman knows it. Every man knows it.

Mr. BRUMM. One word more. I assert that the cost of an article is no factor at all in the price, except up to the point of competition. That is all I want to say. Now you disprove that.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Who doubts that? That is what I have been trying to say, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania has said it more emphatically than I have, why the House is under obligations to him. [Laughter.] Of course it is the cost in wages of human effort, when a commodity is produced that fixes the price. When the judgment is wrong as to the quantity required, when mistakes are made in producing commodities, or when earthquake or flood intervenes, or excessive heat or cold, then cost may have little or nothing to do with price within a limited area; but, taking the world over, in economics the cost of producing an article makes a basal line below which prices will never go, in normal conditions. Above that line supply and demand affect prices very materially; below the line production stops.

IN NORMAL QUANTITY AND IN NORMAL CONDITIONS,

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will be glad to yield to my colleague from California.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Does not monopoly absolutely control prices in certain cases?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I decline to go into that subject, because it is a subject which would take a whole afternoon to discuss, and my time is limited.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Let me substitute "monopoly" for "ice." [Laughter.]

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I will, however, say to the gentleman, that monopoly in nine cases out of ten overreaches itself and reduces the price below what it would have been if there were no monopoly.

Mr. MAGUIRE. But not when the monopoly is sustained by law.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I can not yield further, because I have but little time and I am somewhat of "surrounding conditions" when my time expires. [Laughter.]

SUSPICIOUS OF THE PROBABLE MERCY

Now, let me give you the prices of products for a series of years, in crucial years: 1857 was a famine year, which those of us who were in business and had our fortunes swept away remember well. Again, nothing can be proven in economics by statistics from 1856 until you come to 1880, when we resumed specie payments. We have to skip that period; 1860 is a dividing line between the present and the past which those of us who study economics understand. I can not stop to explain.

Now, from 1840 to 1855 cotton sold in New York at an average price of 8.7 cents in gold; from 1885 to 1890 the average price was 10.4 cents in gold—one quarter higher. Did the depreciation of silver make its gold price higher? What has free coinage to do with those prices? Yet those are the prices you must take from official sources.

Now, I want gentlemen to listen to this, if they will. From 1840 to 1855 the average price of wheat in Chicago was 65 cents a bushel in gold; from 1885 to 1890 the average price was 85 cents in gold. Enormous overproduction, intermixed with have since sent it down out of sight at some times. But those are exceptional conditions. The farmers will soon regulate that matter.

CONSIDERATIONS OF SUPPLY AND DEMAND,

From 1840 to 1855 the price of corn in Chicago averaged 33⅓ cents a bushel in gold; from 1885 to 1890 the average price was 40½ cents a bushel in gold, one-quarter higher. From 1840 to 1855 the average price of hogs in Cincinnati was 3⅜ cents per pound, live weight, in gold; from 1885 to 1890 the average price was 4⅞ cents a pound in gold, one-third higher. And, gentlemen, it cost the farmer during the years from 1840 to 1855 one-third of his crop to get it to New York and Chicago and Cincinnati; to-day not over one-twentieth, taking them all together.

Having given you these prices, I say, without fear of contradiction, you may put the question to any 12 men, I care not where you may find them, whether the effort of the farmer to-day will not give him in gold dollars at the home where he raises his products as it would in times previous to 1860, and the unanimous answer will be yes.

TWICE OR THREE TIMES AS MUCH INCOME

Now, I want to go a little into the business of shipping gold, if you will allow me. The fact of whether the balance of trade is for or against a country or whether the trade is large or small is no indication of the sum of the export or the import of gold into or from the country. That the balance of trade is for or against a country is not the slightest indication even whether gold will be imported or exported. There is no such thing as trade between one country and another. The buying of an article by a citizen of New York from a citizen of London has no more significance, so far as the movement of the measure of value metal is concerned, than the buying of a similar article by a citizen of New York from a citizen of Brooklyn. To maintain otherwise is all nonsense and fustian and contrary to the facts. It betrays a want of investigation that makes a man who will maintain any such position almost unworthy to discuss economic questions.

Now, I have very voluminous tables on this subject, eight of them, which I have had made for me, besides a great many others, in the departments which I have been working on during the last two months. Those tables, bearing on these economic questions, I will present to the House a little later in connection with the banking question. They will open the eyes of gentlemen on this floor to the real financial situation. But to-day let me say only this: Our over imports was, in 1891, $142,000,000, under normal conditions, before politics had disturbed any of these things. In that same year, when we had a balance of trade in our favor of $142,000,000, the net exports of gold were $34,000,000. What does that prove on the gold question? Absolutely nothing. The United States accumulated, during the suspension of specie payments, $308,000,000 of gold, and India, a silver measure-of-value country, has accumulated that amount of gold in the last few years, as can be proved.

EXCESS OF EXPORTS OF MERCHANDISE

Mr. MAGUIRE. Does not that abnormal condition simply show that we are publicly and privately mortgaged to Europe, and are sending gold there to meet our obligations?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. It shows absolutely nothing.

Now, let me say to my colleague there is no such thing as ever paying a loan that is made in what is called solid securities; it never can be paid in the sense usually understood. It can never be paid by any moving of the thing upon which the security is given. Giving such security is the making of an actual sale with the right of repurchase.

Mr. MAGUIRE. The interest is paid.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No; nor the interest either, excepting out of the products that the man who obtains the loan gets out of that property or some other; or else the man who makes it comes in possession; and he can not move anything that is the basis of solid securities. When and the capitalists in Eastern cities built it up, Chicago was as rich the day after they did it, so far as solid investment, products, and buildings were concerned—it was Chicago just as much—as it was twenty years afterwards, after the citizens of Chicago, out of the products from this real estate or other products that were handled in Chicago, had paid all those mortgages and owned the city themselves. You can not restore to a lender to take away solid property once created. Can you dig up the railroads and send them to Europe, the bonds of which are owned in Europe? Neither can you restore such a loan by shipping gold. You can only buy back the property you bonded by paying the bonds in products. All trade is product for product; not with gold, but by gold as a measure only, the thing measured and delivered being the ordinary products of commerce or more bonds and stocks.

CHICAGO BURNED DOWN

Gold in shipment stands as the measure, just as the regulator stands on the engine controlling its movements. When there is a demand for gold shipment, it is physically never. Stocks and bonds are always sufficiently depreciated in price to be shipped in place of gold.

POTENTIALLY SHIPPED IN IMMENSE QUANTITIES,

In Great Britain total imports and exports of gold as compared to total imports and exports of merchandise, are $7 in gold to $100 in merchandise. In the United States $7 in gold to $100 of merchandise. In France and Germany it is somewhat less. In Great Britain the imports and exports for a normal year were $3,600,000,000, or $4 of visible gold to each $100 of commerce, the visible gold being $145,000,000. In the United States the exports and imports amounted to $1,800,000,000 and the visible gold $288,000,000, or $16 to each $100. In France and Germany the ranges are between these figures.

In Great Britain the excess of imports over exports amounted to $614,800,000, or $17 to each $100 excess of imports over exports, being $4⅛ of net gold imported to each $100 excess of imports of merchandise over exports of merchandise. In France and Germany it was somewhat less.

Now, this whole talk about the quantity of gold is also an illusion. If every country should adopt a gold measure of value to-morrow at the commercial ratio of 32 to 1 it would give you that is now hoarded. Not a dollar would be sent from one country to the other, or need to be. Silver would be the money of the people of silver-value countries, as it is here, and they would only retain as much gold as was necessary for the foreign-trade demand and no more. The United States is in an abnormal financial condition, such condition as you do not dream of, as I hope to show you a few days later. All we want is to establish our credit. It is something that we should guard with the most jealous care, and no discussion of the silver question should make us lose sight of the importance of it. We must not undermine the credit of the nation to accommodate the silver States or anybody else. [Applause.]

MILLIONS AND BILLIONS OF THE GOLD OF COMMERCE

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Will the gentleman now permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. If my time has not expired.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. You said you were in favor of bimetallism. I would like to ask what kind?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Such as is in Germany, France, and as we have to-day—the only possible bimetallism.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Have we not trimetallism as much as bimetallism in principle?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes; as a matter of fact we have it quadruple, because WE HAVE NICKEL, COPPER, SILVER, AND GOLD.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Are they all not redeemable in gold, and is not that the measure by which their value is determined?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Certainly, and just as paper is. They are on the same basis.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Therefore we have more than bimetallism.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes; if I have any time left.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I understand you to say that the question of the value of wheat was determined solely by the production?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. No, sir; I did not. I beg pardon. I said by the labor cost that entered into the raising of wheat, all along the line. Its basial price being the labor cost of the most costly third.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well. And you stated that wheat had been driven down by overproduction?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes; and cotton and nearly every coarse farm product, excepting pork and beef.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I hold in my hand a statement which I will read.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Very well. I will not yield to the gentleman to incorporate a statement in my remarks. If he wants to put in a question, I have no objection. I decline to have anything read.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Then I will ask, from the statement of the Secretary of Agriculture that the production of wheat from 1885 to 1892 did not vary more than 10 per cent, how can you make out that the price varies more than 10 per cent?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Let me say in answer to the gentleman that here for many, many years. And let me say again that there is no question whatever but that the statistics which I have given you are reliable, and not a single figure have I given that has not been furnished me by the Departments, and acknowledged to be reliable.

WE HAVE HAD OVERPRODUCTION OF WHEAT

How much time have I, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has three minutes.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Now let me say right here something which I forgot in my speech, that there never was an act done by Congress since this Government was formed that was passed with any fuller knowledge or any more deliberation in purpose than the leaving of the coinage of silver out of the codified coinage laws of 1873. Never. There never was an act that was any more fully indorsed by men of all parties and all sections, particularly by the silver States, than that act was. One of the most enthusiastic indorsers of that act was who, in a speech recorded in the first column, page 178, of the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 1, part 2, Forty-third Congress, first session—and I want all you silver men to read it—said:

THE HON. JOHN P. JONES, OF NEVADA,

Does this Congress mean now to leave entirely out of view and discard forever a standard of value? Did any country ever accumulate wealth, achieve greatness, or attain a high civilization without such a standard? And what but gold can be that standard? What other thing on earth possesses the requisite qualities? Gold is the articulation of commerce. It is the most potent agent of civilization. It is gold that has lifted the nations from barbarism. So exact a measure is it of human effort that when it is exclusively used as a money it teaches the very habit of honesty. It neither deals in nor tolerates false pretenses. It can not lie. It keeps its promises to rich and poor alike.

And Senator STEWART was equally emphatic in his approval. "It can not lie," says Senator JONES. Ah, I wish gold was as well as of measures of value. [Laughter.] "It keeps its promises to rich and poor alike."

THE STANDARD OF SPEECHES ON THIS FLOOR

And what does Senator STEWART say in the second column, page 1392, volume 2, part 2, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Forty-third Congress, first session? The following is an extract from a speech of Hon. WILLIAM M. STEWART, of Nevada, made in the Senate February 11, 1874. Senator STEWART was then and is now as much interested in silver as any man in this country.

I want the standard gold, and no paper money not redeemable in gold; no paper money the value of which is not ascertained; no paper money that will organize a gold board to speculate in it.

Also, on February 20, 1874, he said:

By this process we shall come to a specie basis, and when the laboring man receives a dollar, it will have the purchasing power of a dollar, and he will not be called upon to do what is impossible for him or the producing classes to do, figure upon the exchanges, figure upon the fluctuations, figure upon the gambling in New York, but he will know what his money is worth. Everybody knows what a dollar in gold is worth.

Mr. WILSON of Idaho. Was not that speech delivered a year after the demonetization of silver?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Yes, certainly, and in justification of it and commending it, after cool reflection upon it of a year, which makes it a thousand fold more important than if it had been delivered in the debate and pending the legislation which he so heartily and enthusiastically commends.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate for the country that a purely scientific problem directly affecting the public welfare should have become involved in partisan politics. It is unfortunate for any servant of the people in these halls to be made to feel that his political fortunes depended on his action when called upon to decide for his country an issue of such moment. We are all men, and I shall not pause to speculate how far our judgments may be obscured or our actions determined by considerations personal to ourselves. I will say, however, it is our duty to deal frankly with the country and with one another, and as best we can, and as patriotically as we can, to discuss this great problem in the light of reason and common sense.

The issue, Mr. Chairman, is not whether we shall elect to adopt a bimetallic standard of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. If that was the question it would carry in this House by a practically unanimous vote. It is not a question of choice. It is not a question of desire. It is one of power.

The issue is not whether this country will unite with other commercial powers in cooperating to restore the bimetallic standard. The Fifty-third Congress, almost without dissent, passed a law, and it was approved by the President, which authorized the appointment of commissioners to attend an international conference, when it should be called by any of the commercial powers.

The issue is not whether we are to have the gold standard. I was glad to hear the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], one of the ablest champions of the doctrine of free coinage, say in his address this morning that this country was now on the gold standard. We are at the gold standard, and it is not a question of whether or not we shall adopt the single gold standard, because that has already been accomplished.

It is not whether we shall abandon silver as money. I would be very glad to vote for that provision in the Senate substitute which eliminates from circulation bank notes below the denomination of $10. I would be very glad to go further than the substitute, and vote for a law to eliminate all kinds of money below that denomination, except silver and its paper representatives, so as to make a vacuum for silver and to give it the largest possible place in our circulation.

Mr. Chairman, the real question and the only question for discussion is whether this country can, independently of all other countries, establish a bimetallic standard of gold and silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and retain silver in concurrent circulation with gold. I say this is the only issue, because no American statesman, so far as my observation and reading go, has gone so far as to openly declare that he preferred a silver to a gold standard.

In the discussion of this question it is important for us to get at the root of the matter. In my judgment, the main thing is to arrive at a proper comprehension of what is meant by the term standard money. What is standard money, Mr. Chairman? I define it to be money coined out of a substance the commercial value of which is exactly equal to the purchasing power of the money after it is coined. It will be seen that free and unlimited coinage is necessarily the essential feature of standard money. Gold is the standard of this country. By the laws of the United States all the gold in the world, owned by all the people in the world, can be lawfully brought to the mints of the United States and there coined into money, without charge for mintage, at the rate of 23.22 grains of pure gold to the dollar. As all the world has the right to convert its gold into American money at that rate, it follows necessarily that the commercial value of 23.22 grains of gold is exactly equal to the purchasing power of the dollar into which it is coined. Take up the morning paper and you will find that the Mexican dollar is quoted at 53¼ cents. What does that mean? It means, under the laws of Mexico, that 377 grains of pure silver shall constitute a dollar and the mints of Mexico shall be thrown open to the unlimited and free coinage of silver at that rate. It is the standard money of Mexico and the result is that the purchasing power of the Mexican dollar is exactly equal to the commercial value of 377 grains of pure silver.

Gold being our standard of value, it follows that it not only measures the value of all properties, but measures the purchasing power of all other kinds of money. The greenback note tendered at a subtreasury is redeemed in gold, and therefore it is at a parity with gold. The Treasury note when presented is likewise redeemed in gold, and is therefore as good as gold. We have coined a limited number of silver dollars, and the law declares that they shall be full legal-tender money, and shall be received in payment of all public taxes and public dues. As long as the Government receives them in payment of all obligations due it at par with gold, and, on the other hand, pays gold on all its own obligations, they will remain on a parity with that metal. And so the purchasing power of the silver dollar does not depend upon the commercial value of the substance which composes that dollar, but it depends upon the commercial value of the gold which composes the gold dollar; and so the gold dollar not only measures all values, but it measures also the purchasing power of all other kinds of money in our circulation.

I propose to deal very candidly with the advocates of free coinage. The proposition which now comes to us from the Senate is to establish the independence of silver. Our free silver friends have insisted that silver has been discredited; that it has been denied access to the mints; that it is not standard money, and that its dignity as money of ultimate redemption has been destroyed. It is now proposed by legislation to declare that silver shall be standard money; that it shall be independent money; that it shall no longer lean dependent upon gold, but that it shall depend upon its own merits and become, like gold, independent standard money of ultimate redemption.

Mr. Chairman, the purpose is that all the people in the world holding all the silver bullion in the world, or that shall hereafter come into the world, shall have the lawful right to bring it to the mints of the United States and to coin it into American dollars at the rate of 371¼ grains of pure silver to the dollar.

Mr. COLSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PATTERSON. I hope my friend will permit me to proceed with my argument without interference. I think it is better. Now, as 371¼ is 16 times 23.22, it follows that this measure coming from the Senate, if it should be enacted into law, would give us a ratio of 16 to 1. And so the proposition is for this country to establish the free, unlimited, and independent coinage of gold and silver into standard money at that ratio. I admit that if the commercial value of the substanee out of which the gold dollar is coined is equal to the commercial value of the substance out of which the silver dollar is coined the purchasing power of the two dollars will be equal and a bimetallic standard would result. The law which I desire to expound is this: If the commercial value of the substance out of which the silver dollar is coined has a lower commercial value than the substance out of which the gold dollar is coined, both being independent money, the purchasing power of one will be unequal to the purchasing power of the other, and the dollar which is coined out of the substance of the greatest commercial value will be worth more as bullion than as money, and will retire from circulation.

Let us see how the law operates. By to-day's quotation the substance out of which the silver dollar is made is worth 52 cents. The substance out of which a gold dollar is coined is worth, in the market, 100 cents. Therefore, in the open market you can exchange 371¼ grains of pure silver for only 52 cents in gold, whereas in the same market you can exchange 23.22 grains of pure gold for enough pure silver to coin 192 cents at the ratio of 16 to 1. Are we able to maintain a bimetallic standard on such a basis as this? Who would use gold in our circulation when he could take 23.22 grains of that metal and exchange it for sufficient bullion to coin 192 cents of full legal-tender standard money?

Now I have given you the reasons which underlie a law of universal application—a law that is as exact, that is as unvarying in its operations as the law of gravitation.

I have not time to go into the history of other countries, but will briefly refer to the operation of this law in our own financial experience. In 1792, when the ratio of 15 to 1 was established, it was believed by Mr. Hamilton that he had conformed the coinage to the commercial ratio, and all the statesmen of that day recognized the existence of this law and the absolute necessity of conforming legislation to it. But in a very few years the commercial value of silver slightly declined, and the result was that the substance in the gold dollar was worth a little more than the substance in the silver dollar, and immediately, under the operation of the law I have explained, gold retired from circulation and this country was forced to a silver basis. We all know that Thomas H. Benton and other American statesmen testified to the fact on the floor of the Senate in 1834 that gold had been absent from our circulation for a period of more than thirty years.

Why was this act of 1834 passed, changing the ratio from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1? What motive was it that controlled the statesmen in the days of Andrew Jackson in making this change in the coinage ratio?

The object was the restoration of the gold currency. Andrew Jackson, Thomas H. Benton, Daniel Webster, John C. Calhoun, giants in those days, recognized this universal law; and, for the purpose of restoring the gold currency, went to work to conform the legislation of the country to its mandate. They all insisted on the restoration of that currency, and they all insisted that it could only be restored when the coinage ratio was changed so as to make the substance in the gold dollar equal, or less than equal, to the commercial value of the substance in the silver dollar. Nay, more. If gentlemen will take the pains to read the debates which took place at that time, they will find that Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Benton, and other American statesmen, contended that gold was the preferable money metal, and, over the opposition of the friends of the United States Bank, they passed the act of 1834, fixing the ratio at 16 to 1, when the commercial ratio was in point of fact 15.58. So they purposely and intentionally made gold the preferable metal, but they did their work more perfectly than they intended, for ten years had not elapsed until silver was practically retired from the circulation of the United States.

It will be remembered that from about 1845 to 1853 the people used "shinplasters," little slips of paper representing the 5, 10, 25, and 50 cent coins, and they were driven to the use of these shinplasters in their daily transactions because, under the operation of the law of 1834, not only the silver dollar, but the small coins were driven out of circulation, so that the people did not have change for small transactions. So complete was the operation of the law I have invoked in that instance that in 1853 the Congress of the United States passed an act reducing the silver in minor coins and declaring that the half dollar, the quarter dollar, the dime, and half dime should be coined at the rate of 384 grains to the dollar, and should be a legal tender for only $5. I call the attention of the committee to the historical fact that when the Committee on Ways and Means, in a Democratic Congress, reported that bill it was openly declared upon this floor that the country was then upon the gold standard, and it was the purpose and object of the committee that silver should occupy a subordinate relation to gold.

Let us see for a moment what the operation of this law was from that time down to the breaking out of the civil war. From the 1st day of January, 1835, after the passage of the act of 1834, down to the 1st day of January, 1862, when specie payments were suspended during the war, this Government coined $55,000,000 in silver, only $1,700,000 of which were silver dollars, the remainder being subsidiary coins. During that time we coined nearly twice as much in 5-cent pieces as was coined in silver dollars. But we coined during the same time in gold the enormous sum of $353,000,000. Where is the man who can deny the assertion? Where is the man who can refute the proposition that this country in that day and generation was practically, and to all intents and purposes, on a gold standard? When specie payments were suspended both gold and silver disappeared from circulation by the operation of the law which I have explained, and more gold and silver retired from the country during the period of suspension than the sum total of all the greenback and national-bank note currency then in circulation.

During the period of suspension came the act of 1873. I am not going to discuss the righteousness of that legislation. I have always expressed regret that this country had not then united with the Latin Union for the purpose of retaining and maintaining, if possible, the bimetallic standard. But the act was passed; its work has been accomplished, and we, in common with the other commercial powers of the world, are on a gold basis. The main fact which I wish to impress, in all solemnity, upon the members of this committee is that from the organization of the Republic down to the hour when the free-silver propaganda was inaugurated, in 1876, no American statesman ever disputed the law which I invoke to-day; and I think I can safely challenge every free-silver advocate in this House to point to one American statesman, from the days of Washington down to Samuel J. Tilden, who ever intimated by speech or vote that this country alone could maintain the bimetallic standard at a ratio which differed from the commercial ratio of the two metals. It was in 1876 that the agitation for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 was begun. What a spectacle, Mr. Chairman, has this country presented to the enlightened world since that time! I have seen members of Congress, in defiance of the law which I have invoked, deliberately vote for the ratio of 16 to 1, then 17 to 1, then 18 to 1, then 19 to 1, then 20 to 1, all in one day, on a succession of roll calls. Tell me, Mr. Chairman, what would the statesmen of the days of Hamilton and Jefferson have thought of a performance like that? Tell me what the statesmen in the days of Jackson and Benton, of Calhoun, and of Webster would have thought of such reckless defiance of a universal economic law?

When silver and gold are on a parity an ounce of silver is worth about $1.29. Yet in the history of this controversy, from 1876 down to the present hour, the advocates of free coinage have never inquired into the relative commercial value of the two metals. When silver fell to $1.20 an ounce they were in favor of free coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1. When it fell to $1.10 an ounce they were in favor of the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. When it fell to $1 an ounce they were in favor of the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. When it fell to 90 cents, then to 85 cents, then to 80 cents, then to 75 cents, then to 70 cents, they were still in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. And to-day, when an ounce of fine silver is worth only 67¼ cents, these same devotees of silver cry out for the free coinage of silver at the same old ratio of 16 to 1.

Mr. Chairman, have I not stated the facts of history truly? I see in his seat my friend from Georgia [Mr. TURNER], who honors me with his attention. I ask him what would Georgia's greatest statesman, Benjamin H. Hill, have thought of a proposition such as the one now proposed? When 371¼ grains of pure silver were worth 87 cents he denounced a measure for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 as a "pickpocket" bill. What would he say if he were here to-day, confronted with a proposition to coin silver into standard money at the same ratio, when 371¼ grains of pure silver are worth only 52 cents?

I am also honored with the attention of a Representative from the State of Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]. What would L. Q. C. Lamar, the brightest jewel in the crown of that State, say if he were here shedding luster on American legislation, as he did in the days gone by, when brought face to face with such a measure as this? These Halls once reverberated with his matchless eloquence when he exposed, with unanswerable logic, the absurdity of adopting a coinage ratio in defiance of an economic law of universal application throughout the commercial world.

Mr. Chairman, this is a new era in finance! You can not find any statesman outside of America—not even the bimetallists of Europe—who will advocate a doctrine directly opposed to the universal experience of mankind.

The position taken by the sound-money men that the bimetallic standard can only result where the coinage and commercial ratios correspond is so invulnerable to assault, so fortified by reason, and so illustrated and exemplified by all experience that the advocates of free silver can not assail it. They have avoided all reference to it in the discussion of this question when it is possible to do so. Some of them in this debate have been driven to admit that the passage of this act would force gold to a premium, while others attempt to escape the inexorable logic which environs this measure by insisting that while it would not result in retaining gold and silver in concurrent circulation it would secure an alternating standard of the two metals. That is to say, when gold became more valuable commercially than it was as money it would retire, and then when silver became more valuable commercially than as money gold would return and silver retire, and in that way the United States would alternate, first leaning upon one standard and then upon the other, thereby securing an alternating currency of gold and silver.

If all the commercial powers in the world were attempting, as in the past, to maintain the bimetallic standard, and the ratios fixed by them respectively conformed as near as might be to the commercial ratio, then it is altogether possible that the circulation would in some degree alternate; but this, Mr. Chairman, is altogether speculative and the idea advanced by my friends is altogether chimerical. When you take into consideration that all the commercial powers in the world have suspended the free coinage of silver, there is no room for the discredited metal to alternate with that metal which enlightened mankind has adopted as its measure of value. Suppose we had adopted the ratio of 16 to 1 twenty years ago, would it have returned even once during all that period? And now that silver has declined until the bullion in a silver dollar is worth only 52 cents, is it not absolutely certain, in view of all the conditions which environ the commerce of the world, that gold would be driven out of our circulation and would, so far as we can judge of the future, never return?

Sir, the Bland-Allison Act was passed in February, 1878, as a substitute for a free-coinage bill. The silver in a silver dollar was then worth 87 cents. That act was passed in utter disregard of the commercial value of the two metals. Here was the first blunder which led up to the catastrophe of 1893. That law has now been repealed. But I ask you, now that it has passed beyond the heat of partisan discussion, to consider it in the light of reason and common sense. Here was an instance where the most enlightened, the greatest, and most powerful of all the Governments of the earth entered the open market and purchased silver bullion under a law which required it to coin at its mints bullion which cost it 87 cents into a dollar, impressed with all the qualities of full legal-tender money; and to coin such dollars to the extent of at least 24,000,000 annually. The profit made by the transaction was to be covered into the Treasury. Nothing could rescue the Government from the charge of jugglery and dishonesty in a transaction like this except its implied promise to maintain the dollar so coined on a parity with all other forms of currency.

If there is any obligation resting upon the United States more sacred than every other, it is its duty to maintain these dollars on a parity with gold. Otherwise we would have the spectacle of this Government purchasing silver bullion with gold and then coining that silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and sending it out into circulation to be received in payment of its own obligations and the obligations of its citizens. As the coinage of silver under the Bland-Allison Act was in direct violation of an economic law, for the observance of which I am contending, it follows that our silver currency thus coined is, to the extent of the difference between its purchasing power and commercial value, fiat money, and depends on the disposition and ability of the United States to maintain it on a parity with our other currency. Hence these silver dollars remain with us, and will remain with us for all time to come. You can not send out into the arteries of foreign commerce coined money discredited in this manner. It is only secure in its purchasing power within the jurisdiction of the Government creating such a currency. It is a governmental contrivance, and not the money of commerce.

Then came the act of July 14, 1890, by which Congress authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to go into the open market and purchase each month for all time to come 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion, and to issue in payment Treasury notes. The act then required that the silver so purchased should be coined at the ratio of 16 to 1 and employed by the Government in the redemption of its notes. I put it to the committee as a question of honorable and fair dealing by a government, Was that act not a financial monstrosity? Was not that kind of jugglery and profit making by a government at variance with every principle of sound finance? There was but one provision of the law which rescued the United States from national dishonor, and that was the provision which required the Government to maintain the parity of all its money. But this injunction was not sufficient to prevent the catastrophe which followed.

The whole commercial world took alarm and the question was naturally asked, How long can a Government, however great and prosperous, issue this paper money in the purchase of silver bullion on the terms required by the act, and indefinitely, without involving its Treasury in such a condition that it could not maintain a parity between its paper currency and gold? An assault was almost at once made upon the Treasury reserve, and for four or five years we have either been drifting into or have been in the midst of a great financial disaster. Can the seigniorage, so called, which the Government has made on this transaction, or the profit which it has made under the Bland-Allison Act, repay the American people for the losses which they have sustained growing out of the instability of our currency incident to such legislation? Was the Treasury of a great Government ever before in times of peace in such a dilemma? With more than 400,000,000 silver dollars in circulation, with $346,000,000 of United States notes payable on demand, constituting a part of its currency, and with $155,000,000 of Treasury notes outstanding, given in the purchase of silver bullion, and these Treasury notes accumulating every month to the value of 4,500,000 ounces of silver, and with the obligation resting upon the Government to maintain a parity between all its dollars, how was it possible to avoid disaster?

With a large proportion of the representatives of the people clamoring for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 and demanding that the Secretary of the Treasury should, without regard to law and the just obligations of the Government, pay silver in the redemption of its notes; with shylocks preying on the Treasury reserve and the marts of trade and commerce everywhere in doubt and confusion as to what the result might be, I submit the spectacle is not one which reflects credit on American legislation. No such flagrant violation of the established and recognized laws of finance has occurred in modern times. Lying at the root of our trouble is the universal knowledge of the operations of the law which prohibits the concurrent circulation of gold and silver coined at a ratio disproportionate to the market ratio without the aid of the Government in maintaining the parity.

The Senate has passed the measure before us. The American people await the action of this House, confident that it will maintain the honor of the Government and the integrity of the currency. But the truth is that the conviction prevails in every commercial community throughout the United States that this Senate substitute would destroy the parity between gold and all other forms of currency and would impair and contract public and private credit to such an extent as to involve the American people in a catastrophe which would destroy all prosperity and entail upon them an era of financial disasters from which this generation could not recover.

Mr. NORTHWAY. Would it disturb the gentleman at this point if I were to make a single suggestion?

Mr. PATTERSON. I have only a few moments, and would prefer to proceed without interruption.

Mr. NORTHWAY. I agree with the gentleman in his views, and I want to hear him on one point which I was about to suggest.

Mr. PATTERSON. Probably I shall touch upon it. This is the condition of affairs to-day. It has been the condition of the country, except when ameliorated by the sale of bonds to replenish the gold reserve, since the panic began in 1893. To-day its solvency and the parity of its money depend absolutely upon the patriotism of its citizens in standing by it in the hour of its need, and their confidence in their immediate Representatives on the floor of this House and in the Executive at the other end of Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. Chairman, I have now traced the history of our financial legislation in respect to the coinage for more than one hundred years, and I think I have demonstrated the unvarying operation of the law which forces one standard money out of circulation where the substance out of which it is coined is more valuable than the substance out of which is coined some other standard money. Our experience is in accordance with the teachings of science and the practical judgment of the business world. No evasion is possible. The commercial world understands, scientists understand, and the people will understand that the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, when the commercial ratio is 32 to 1, means only one thing, and that is silver monometallism for the United States. I beg the advocates of free coinage to look abroad over the world and challenge them to point to a single country where the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold is authorized by law which is not admittedly on a silver basis. Take this fact in the light of the teachings of science and in the light of our own experience as a nation, and it is impossible for them to escape the imputation that their purpose is not to advance the cause of bimetallism, but to force this country to a silver standard.

Mr. Chairman, the only remaining question for discussion is whether it is advisable for this country to abandon the gold standard, which it now has, and deliberately adopt for itself the single standard of silver. I admit that when I first began to investigate this subject I was fascinated with the idea that the United States might unite all the American Republics upon a silver standard, construct the Nicaragua Canal, open up trade with the East, and compete with England for the trade of the world. But as I proceeded in the investigation I saw this was a delusion and a dream. I hope the committee will bear with me while I give some of the reasons which influenced my judgment. To precipitate the country to the silver basis would produce inextricable confusion in every department of business. Suppose you elected a President and Congress pledged to the passage of such a law.

The President elected would not take his seat until the 4th of the following March, and the Congress elected would not assemble until the first Monday in December following the inauguration of the President, and then it would probably take six months before a law could be passed and put in force. In the meantime the wildest confusion would ensue. Every bank and every holder of gold would hoard it. Creditors everywhere would enter into a fierce struggle to secure the better money in payment of their debts. That debtor who would not renew his debt payable in gold would be driven to the wall. American securities would be forced upon the market. A government which had borrowed gold dollars worth 100 cents for its people, and had then deliberately enacted a law whereby it proposed to discharge its obligations in dollars worth 52 cents, would be discredited throughout the world. Its securities and the securities of its citizens would be everywhere discredited, and the rush that would be made for liquidation would be irresistible.

As we are a government of the people, both people and Government would share the same fate. For years the investors of money in the United States have been taking their securities payable in gold. The banks have to-day the gold very largely in their reserves. The great life insurance companies, which have insurance on the lives of the American people amounting to $7,000,000,000, have been for years collecting their premiums in gold or its equivalent and investing them in gold assets. The election of a President and Congress pledged to the free coinage of silver would at once result in the withdrawal of every dollar of gold from the Treasury, in the payment by banks of silver to their depositors, in the payment of silver by the life insurance companies to their policy holders, and force on the market great quantities of property to be sold for debts payable in gold. In the meantime all kinds of business would be paralyzed, manufactories would be closed, labor would be discharged, and we would have in a most aggravated form all the adverse conditions which existed during the panic of 1893.

Again, the wit of man could not devise a scheme better suited to place the property of the country more absolutely at the mercy of organized and aggressive capital. If it was the purpose of its advocates to create a moneyed aristocracy and a race of peons out of the freemen of America, a more effective plan than this could not be adopted. Be it remembered, Mr. Chairman, that an unstable and fluctuating currency always enriches the few and impoverishes the many. Once disturb and derange the medium of exchange and all will be confusion and disaster.

Again, Mr. Chairman, gold is the money of commerce; and, whether we retain the gold standard or abandon it, we can not conduct our foreign trade on any other standard. It is the money of all the countries to whom we sell our farm products. We neither export cotton, wheat, corn, meat, butter, or other farm products to the silver-standard countries. It is not a matter of choice with us. We are compelled to sell our products to gold-standard countries or go out of business. The prices of our products are all, therefore, measured in gold. As it is now, we measure products in terms of gold, not only in foreign countries, but in our own. Our merchants take into consideration only the rise and fall of the commodities they buy and sell, and they are not afflicted with any doubt in respect to their money. If we were on a silver basis, then our products would be purchased in silver and sold in gold, and as silver rises and falls in terms of gold like other commodities there would arise an additional risk to the merchant; and every additional risk is another burden on the producer. If the purchasing power of a silver dollar compared with gold was 50 cents to-day, and cotton was worth 8 cents per pound in gold, the cotton buyer could not afford to pay 16 cents in silver per pound, because by the time he delivered the cotton the silver might have declined to 49 cents, and the loss would be his.

This explains why manufacturers and merchants in silver-standard countries are at a great disadvantage in conducting their business. It is a double risk; risk in the stability of prices and risk in the stability of their money. They are eaten up by the money changers, and at last the loss falls on their customers.

Again, the matter of interest cuts an important figure in the solution of this problem. Sound money and a low rate of interest are inseparable. After the war, when greenbacks were our only currency and gold was at a high rate of premium, the rate of interest, like the rate of exchange, was very high. One per cent a month was the usual rate of interest, and I remember that in addition to that 2½ per cent was charged the farmers for advances. Frequently more than half the debt of the farmer to his merchant was composed of usury. Now all that is changed and we have a uniformly lower rate of interest. This must also be taken into consideration when we think of going to a silver standard, for the matter of interest, like the matter of exchange, would then enter into the calculation and very seriously embarrass commerce.

But, Mr. Chairman, agriculture, commerce, and manufactures can not prosper in countries which are denied the use of the best money. To show this it is only necessary to call attention to the gold and silver standard countries. Here are the gold-standard countries: The United States, England, France, Germany, Russia, Belgium, Denmark, Holland, Norway, Sweden, Austria-Hungary, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Switzerland, Servia, Greece, Bulgaria, Egypt, Turkey, Australia, Canada, Cuba, Brazil, and Chile. Of these, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Brazil, and Chile have recently gone to the gold standard.

Here are the silver-standard countries: China, Japan, India, what are known as "the Straits," the Central American States, the South American Republics, except Brazil and Chile, and the semi-civilized nations of Africa.

You will see from this enumeration that there is not one silver-standard country on the globe which could be classed as a prosperous, enlightened, and progressive nation. All of the enlightened countries have suspended the free coinage of silver and adhere to the gold standard. If we should abandon it we would take a step backward.

The fact can not be disguised that as civilization advances the preference for gold has been everywhere manifested throughout the world. It is an evolution giving expression to the choice of enlightened mankind for the best money attainable.

Again, Mr. Chairman, another consideration which has influenced my judgment is that all gold countries largely use silver as money, whereas silver-standard countries do not use gold at all in their circulation. The truth is, sir, that the gold-standard countries use more silver in their circulation than the silver-standard countries, notwithstanding the latter have more population than the former. I do not mean by this that there is no gold whatever in silver-standard countries, but I do mean that it is not used as a circulating medium. Therefore, if we pass an act for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, it means the establishment of the silver standard and the immediate exclusion of gold from our country. While it may have the effect to give us dollars of less purchasing power, it will give fewer of them. We now have, according to the best estimates, about $600,000,000 of gold in circulation, and free coinage means the loss to the country of all this gold in the form of money. It will be hoarded at once, and either kept as treasure or sold to foreign countries, for no man would use it as money when he could use something only half as valuable.

Again, Mr. Chairman, there is another lesson to be learned. The advocates of free coinage are always insisting on a larger volume of money. It may seem singular, but it is nevertheless true, that invariably the gold-standard countries have the larger circulation. France, the United States, Germany, and England, in the order I have named them, have a larger circulation than the other countries, and they all have the gold standard. I have made a careful investigation of the matter, and I have not been able to find any silver-standard country which has a per capita circulation exceeding $5. The United States and Mexico are adjacent American Republics. I think I am safe in saying that the United States is the most prosperous gold-standard country in the world, and that Mexico is the most prosperous silver-standard country. A recent comparison shows that Mexico has only 43 cents per capita in gold, which does not circulate; 17 cents in paper, and $4.31 in silver, making a total per capita circulation of $4.91; whereas the United States has $9.01 in gold, $9.18 in silver, and $6.15 in paper, making a total per capita circulation of $24.34. How do you account for this significant and important fact? It shows, in my judgment, conclusively that the volume of money follows always a large volume of business.

Sir, the idea that money precedes prosperity is a mistake, but wherever prosperity sets in there money invariably goes. When the conditions are favorable for investments, money will be forthcoming; and when they are unfavorable it will remain away. A good and fruitful soil, tilled by thrifty and industrious farmers, who diversify their crops and make year by year a surplus of products, will present a condition of affairs which will invite investment in that community; money will increase in volume and general prosperity prevail. The same applies with equal force to nations. Those Governments which are not advancing, and in whose confines all opportuity is lost and stagnation prevails, require no great volume of money. The autocratic few live in listless idleness, while the masses are in a state of peonage. But when there is a quickening impulse, demanding money to set in motion the wheels of progress and to send thrift and prosperity through the arteries of commerce, then it will make its appearance and perform its functions. These conditions not only require money, but the best money. And here lies the reason for the phenomenal fact that prosperous and enlightened countries all have a gold standard and a greater volume of money than the silver-standard countries.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is even a greater reason to influence my vote on this measure. The dignity of labor must be preserved if we would preserve our free institutions. The great majority of mankind must labor for their daily bread. I do not say it for political effect, but I utter a great truth which right-thinking men everywhere in the world will approve when I lay down the proposition that it is the chief end of good government to secure for its citizens the right to labor under the most favorable conditions. The men who work are the true soldiers in the army of civilization. I have repeatedly said that a day's work was the true unit of value, and that that community was the most blessed and enjoyed the greatest prosperity where a day's labor brought to the toiler the most comforts of life.

We all know, sir, that in times of distress the masses who labor suffer most. We have had a recent experience. In 1893, when the great panic swept over the country, the rich, notwithstanding their material loss, still lived in comfort; but the poor—the men who worked for their daily bread—were thrown out of employment. When commerce was paralyzed and manufactories were shut down, men with brawny arms were left without work and their children to cry for bread. It is in such times that our free institutions are put to the severest test. They call for the exercise of the best thought and the highest patriotism on the part of those who have been intrusted with the duty of making and administering the laws.

Agriculture, commerce, and manufactories can only prosper in the enlightened, progressive countries which have adopted the gold standard; and I now assert that men who labor are dependent on these conditions for their well being, and that there is not a silver-standard country in the world where they earn wages sufficient to maintain them in comfort and independence.

Before the death of the lamented Judge Gresham I called at the State Department and requested to have tables made up from the consular reports showing the weekly wages paid labor in all the countries of the world, classifying them as gold and silver standard nations; and it is a comparison between the wages paid in the different countries of the world that bears me out fully in the assertion that I have made so often and so emphatically, that laboring men do not earn wages sufficient to maintain them in comfort and independence in any silver-standard country on the globe.

Notwithstanding all we have heard from our free-silver friends to the contrary, silver-standard countries are the abode of petty tyrants and miserable serfs and dependents. As silver declines the prices of the necessaries of life improve, but wages do not advance in proportion, and the misery of the poor keeps pace with the instability and depreciation of the currency.

Sir, gold is sometimes called the money of the rich, and silver the money of the poor, by the people who try to persuade the poor to adopt their financial vagaries. The rich, and especially the rich in money holding, may fatten on a depreciated currency, for it furnishes unending opportunities for speculation. Not so with the man who labors. He has neither the means, the opportunity, nor the information on which to speculate. He only knows that he gets such a wage in money, and if the money is bad he is indeed unfortunate. Of all men he who works for a wage is interested in securing for the price of his toil money which is equal in purchasing power to the best money; and of all men he is most interested in securing for his country conditions of prosperity, because it is on the prosperity around him that he depends for employment.

Sir, we hear a great deal said about the oppression of the debtor class, and it is assumed that the poor are generally debtors and those who conduct the business of the country are the creditors. This is all a mistake. The wage earners of the country are, almost to a man, creditors, whereas the merchants, manufacturers, and traders of the country are generally debtors. The men and women of the country who work for wages and salaries are creditors every week to an enormous amount, whereas the business men are constant borrowers. Both classes are equally interested in the cause of sound money, because business can not be conducted satisfactorily with an unsound and fluctuating currency, and the people who work for wages and salaries can not get employment and neither can they rely for their support on wages which are not paid in money as good as any other. All alike are interested in seeing that every dollar is as good as every other dollar.

Again, Mr. Chairman, I belong to the party of tariff reform. The people, and especially the people of the Southern States, have felt most keenly the unjust, excessive, and oppressive tariff laws. For more than twenty-five years our party has waged a relentless war on the Republican party in an effort to lift the burden of oppressive taxation from the shoulders of the people. Class legislation, by which the substance of one man is taken in order to enrich another, has been the long-continued aversion of the party to which I belong. How often have you heard free-silver Republicans on the floor of the House declare, during the present discussion, that the silver standard would operate as a high protective tariff?

Sir, the liberty of commerce and sound money go hand in hand. If we expect to continue to sell our products in the markets of the world and continue our trade relations with other nations, we must, in order to compete with such countries as England, France, and Germany, maintain for our merchants the standard of commerce.

Sir, it has been stated time and again that we have had a very great appreciation of gold since 1873 and a very great decline in values. It is not my purpose to enter upon a critical discussion of this question. I propose to call the attention of the committee to one great fact in our history, which, in my judgement, refutes the proposition. It is logically and ridiculously absurd to argue that the decline in prices of commodities, brought about by the marvelous inventions and improvements of the age, is the result of the fall in the price of silver. The truth is that silver itself is a commodity, and, like all other commodities under modern conditions, it can be produced at less cost than formerly, and it has declined for the same reason that wheat has declined and manufactured products have declined. But the great fact which stands out in our history is that during the very period referred to we have had a marvelous accumulation of wealth in the United States.

It must be conceded by every thoughtful student of the history of his country that the United States was practically on a gold standard from 1850 to 1860. Leaving out the decade in which the war took place, we had from 1870 to 1880 another period of ten years when the country was on a depreciated paper basis. Then another ten years, from 1880 to 1890, when we were admittedly on a gold standard.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the very important fact to which I desire to call the attention of the committee is that in 1850 we had a population of 23,191,876. In 1860 it had increased to 31,443,321. In 1850 the wealth of the United States amounted to $7,135,780,228. In 1860 it had increased to $16,159,616,068. Now, during that period we had 35 per cent increase of population and 126 per cent increase of wealth. This was under the gold standard.

In 1870 the population of the United States amounted to 38,558,371, and in 1880 to 50,155,783, showing 30 per cent increase in population. In 1870 the wealth of the United States amounted to $30,068,518,507, and in 1880 amounted to $43,642,000,000, showing only 45 per cent increase. Now, in 1890 our population amounted to 62,622,250 and our wealth to $65,037,091,197, showing an increase of wealth amounting to 49 per cent. Now, these two decades, from 1850 to 1860 and from 1880 to 1890, being the decades in which we had not only the gold standard but the greatest public confidence in our currency, were the decades in which we have had the largest increase of wealth during our national history.

I do not pretend to say, Mr. Chairman, that this wealth was justly or equally distributed. I contend that under the operation of unjust tariff laws and other legislation it was not distributed as it would be under just and equal laws. But this is not the fault of the currency. The currency affects alike all sections and all classes of our people.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, a controlling reason with me is the enormous production of gold in recent years and now going on all over the world. For years back it was predicted that we were on the eve of a gold famine. Our free-silver friends still cling to this gloomy prophecy and never tire in declaiming about the appreciation of gold and its insufficiency to supply the demands of commerce. The truth is that under modern conditions in this age of telegraphy and railroads and steamships money can perform five times the service it could two hundred years ago. Credit and confidence constitute the foundation on which modern commerce rests. It is not the transferring of actual money, but the transfer of credits, redeemable in money, which causes the wheels of commerce to move.

Thomas H. Benton once said on the floor of the American Senate, during the discussion which resulted in the passage of the act of 1834, that all mankind had a predilection for gold. I do not subscribe to the idea that the free coinage of silver has been suspended by the commercial powers on account of the overproduction of that metal, but I insist that this has been brought about by the exercise of this predilection on the part of enlightened mankind for the better money. It has been an evolution growing out of the fact that the increased production of gold has enabled the commercial world to make its selection of the best money.

From the time Columbus discovered America, in 1492, down to and including the year 1895, the world produced $8,780,467,400 in gold. And of this amount it produced $5,830,602,400 within the last fifty years. In other words, the world produced $2,949,865,000 more gold within the last fifty years than it produced in the preceding three hundred and fifty-three years.

Nor is this all. The world produced $787,463,000 in gold during the first fifty years of this century; and in the last five years it produced $815,378,800, or $27,900,000 more within the last five years than it produced in the first fifty years of this century. Owing to modern improvements and new discoveries, low-grade ores are now being treated everywhere profitably, and the production of gold is on the increase in every continent of the world. In 1895 it produced over $200,000,000, and it is now confidently predicted by the best authorities that the world's production will amount to over $300,000,000 in the year 1900.

I say that in view of these incontestable facts it would be, for this reason, the height of folly for this Government to abandon the gold standard; and in view of all the reasons which I have given it would be a crime against civilization for this great country to commit such a folly.

Mr. Chairman, I will not trespass further on the time of the committee. This question, so vital to the public welfare, is one of absorbing interest to me. Sir, I hope my patriotism is sufficiently broad to embrace the whole country, but I admit that I am provincial in my sympathies and aspirations. When I look across the Potomac I see a land whose sad memories and glorious history are dear to my heart. How we have struggled to bring the States of the South into the constellation of the Union with undiminished honor and dignity; how we resisted the effort to reverse the order of civilization through the means of universal negro suffrage; how we persisted until the last vestige of Federal interference in our local affairs has been removed; how we have labored to achieve commercial liberty for the whole country; and how, with the cooperation of our friends in the Northern States, we at last built up a great national party, will make one of the brightest pages in American history. I fondly believed the hour had come when no obstacles would stand in the way of unsurpassed prosperity for our people.

It seemed to me that the difficulties in the way of the development of our marvelous resources had all disappeared. It was then, in the zenith of our hope, that this silver question, like a bird of evil omen, came into our horizon to divide our councils, to blight prosperity and engender bad blood, and to entail defeat and disaster on our party. How singular it is! We have coal and iron, and gold and copper, and limestone and marble, and timber, and all the products a fruitful soil can yield—in short, everything but silver—and silver is the cause of our dissensions! I would turn from the spectacle in despair if I did not believe the South would come out of the discussion on the side of good government and sound money. Our people will soon see that this measure which comes to us from the Senate is the work of the silver-mine owners, who represent a very small fraction of the American people. When they take into consideration that there are ten silver-mining States, which have 20 Senators in the other end of the Capitol and only 14 Representatives in this, and that New York has 34 Representatives here and only two Senators there, and when they receive the intelligence of the great majority which this House will record against this measure, they will see that the American people are in no humor to commit this stupendous folly.

Sir, so far as I am concerned, I would, for their good name and their prosperity, rather vote against this measure and trust to the future to vindicate the righteousness of my action and the integrity of my motives than to give it my support and secure thereby a seat on this floor for the remainder of my life. I intend to stand in the breach and warn the constituency I represent against the impending danger to their prosperity, even though I may there find my political grave. [Great applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is recognized for thirty minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of pleasure and interest, as I always do when that gentleman speaks, to the speech just made by my friend the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON]. I have known him for a long time, and have known him to be always able and wise and sincere. He will therefore excuse me, I hope, if I paraphrase a part of his speech. I state to you, Mr. Chairman, solemnly and most boldly, without any fear of successful contradiction, in the words of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] that there exists to-day upon the face of the globe not a single nation of people standing in the forefront of civilization, leading in the march of advancement and of culture, with strong armies and great commerce, or with great literatures, not a Christian or a civilized people who do not wear long-tailed coats. [Laughter.] And there is just as much reason to believe that the fact that all have prospered in enlightenment and Christianity and literature is due to the fact that they do wear long-tail coats as to believe, from anything which he or anybody has ever said, that they have prospered because they happen now to have a gold standard. These same countries, France, England, Germany, and the United States, led all the nations in prosperity prior to 1873, when they did not have a gold standard, with the exception of one of them. And that one, England, saw her most glorious day prior to 1816, when she adopted the gold standard.

They have always led, because they have implanted in them by race, instinct, and heredity the qualities which have enabled them to acquire through the ages by conquest of the wilderness, and through conflict with other men, the moral and mental sinews that make them the leaders of the world. They are not great because they have money of a certain color; they are not great because they have a tariff of a certain character; they are great because they belong to a race of men who have always been great, whether with silver or gold, with monometallism or bimetallism, whether under kings or Presidents. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Tennessee says, and other gentlemen have said, that there exists not upon the face of the globe a country which he and which other men call a free-silver country that has not silver monometallism. But there did exist such countries at one time; and France, while it was an Empire, and later on, while a Republic, maintained a parity between the two metals, and had not only a bimetallic standard, but a bimetallic circulation for seventy-odd years. And it was not aided, as the gentleman from Maine, Governor DINGLEY, says—and, by the way, whenever I speak of the gentleman from Maine, I speak of him with that feeling almost of affection which all members of this House feel for him—it was not, as he says, because France and later on the Latin

Union were aided by the balance of Europe at that time. As a matter of fact, on one side was gold monometallic England and on the other side were silver monometallic Holland and silver monometallic Germany, and across the water was the United States of America, not aiding to maintain the parity at the ratio of 15½ to 1, but with a conflicting legislative ratio, thereby destroying the perfectness of the parity from time to time.

My friends, it is true there is not a people to-day whose mints are open to silver that is not upon a monometallic silver basis. It is also true that there is not to-day a country whose mint is open to the free coinage of silver that stands even in the list of respectables in point of wealth, commerce, and business. It is not the mill that gives value to the flour; it is not the stamp upon the coin that gives value to the coin. It is the use of the wheat after it has been ground, behind the mill, that gives value to the flour. It is the use of the money after it has been stamped, behind the mint, that gives value to the money. If you can grind wheat freely and in unlimited quantities, and if there is somebody somewhere with stomach and appetite back of the mill, furnishing an insatiable demand for the supply of wheat ground, it will sell; and when you coin money and turn it out of the mint, if there is somewhere back of it a force which can utilize it, it will sell; it will exchange for commodities, and it will do everything else that you want done with minted metal or money.

Now, my friends, let us see. The gentleman from Maine, Governor DINGLEY, said if France and the Latin Union could not maintain a parity, why should we, solitary and alone, attempt it. My answer is twofold. First, that France and the Latin Union did maintain a parity. It is true that they did become frightened for fear the day might come when they could not, and they came to the conclusion not to continue it; but so long as they tried it they succeeded. That is the first answer. The second is this, that the commerce of France, Switzerland, Belgium, Italy, and Greece, composing the Latin Union, all put together, foreign and domestic, does not equal the interstate commerce alone of these United States. The statement has been made, and I believe it to be true, that the interstate commerce of the United States alone is equal to the entire commerce of continental Europe. This leaves Great Britain out of account. You will observe Great Britain's cooperation is not needful for bimetallism. This fact was inductively demonstrated from 1816 to 1873.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us see. My friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] and others say "you are going to open your mints at a ratio of 16 to 1 and all the silver in the world (and the gentleman said its vast 'stock on hand as well as the annual production") will seek your shores.' Let us see how it could. Now, it is universally admited by the advocates of free coinage and the advocates of the gold standard—it is one of the few things in which they agree—that were free coinage once inaugurated the value of the bullion and the value of the coined silver would be the same, whatever that value might be. They can not differ one iota. Whether silver would be depreciated, as measured in gold, or not, the value or selling price of the silver bullion will be the same as the value or selling price of the silver coin at that time. In every free-coinage country to-day the value of the silver coined is the value of the silver in bullion; but as they do not furnish use sufficient behind the mints to bolster the price of the silver bullion up, the consequence is that the price of silver coin goes down.

Our contention is that the people of the United States, with their enormous uses for money, their unprecedented productive and consuming capacity (according to Mulhall equal to that of England, Germany, and France), their taxes, their public and private debts, their domestic, interstate, and foreign commerce, all on a gigantic scale, would furnish this needed use, this demand; that this increased demand for silver, coupled with the thereby decreased demand for gold, would bring the two bullions, as well as the two coins, together on a plane of intervaluation corresponding with the ratio of 16 to 1 fixed by law.

Now, it being accepted as a truth that under free coinage of silver the bullion and coin value of silver would be the same, how could all of the world's stock on hand of coined silver, or any of it come to the United States? Whether we succeed in maintaining a parity between gold and silver or not, why and how could this silver come to us? What object would there be in sending it to the United States? If its coinage value after it was coined here as money would be no more than its bullion value before it was coined, why send it across the sea and pay freight and insurance to coin it at a rate of 16 to 1, when it is already circulating in Europe on a parity with gold, at a ratio of 15½ to 1 and in India and the East at its bullion value at a ratio of 15 to 1? There would be a loss either of 3 or of 6 cents an ounce besides the freight and the insurance en route. So, my friends, one need not take into account the stock of coined silver on hand. Nor even that which is in the form of spoons and other articles of commerce or of vertu. There would be no temptation to mint them, because the price of new silver out of which new spoons, etc., must be made would have gone up proportionately. All you have to provide for, then, is the annual production of the silver mines of the world.

Now, if I stand in my little town of Yazoo City to-day and offer 15 cents a pound for cotton, and it is a fact (and is believed to be a fact) that I have the money to buy all the cotton that can be brought to me and the business in which to use it after it is brought to me, then, for the present crop at any rate, I can fix the price of cotton all over the world at 15 cents a pound in Yazoo City, and for other places at 15 cents per pound less the profit and transportation thither. So it is with money. It is not the number of mints; it is the character and importance of the mints which is to be considered. But just at the point reached by me the analogy between money and cotton ceases. No man could for an indefinite length of time, no matter if he had all the wealth of the world, offer 15 cents a pound for cotton and maintain the price, because cotton is a thing of growth, of expansion, infinite in its possibilities.

Nature and human skill and capital and human enterprise may be brought to bear to raise more and more cotton every year, so that even if one should be able to fix the price of the world's crop this year the cotton raisers would go on and double up the crop upon him year after year, until finally he would find it impossible to meet the supply. But observe that is not the case with silver. You can not make silver to order. You neither sow it nor do you reap it. You must find it and mine it, and so far in history the world has never been struck by any flood of either gold or silver such as some gentlemen here seem to anticipate. Therefore I think it is fair to assume that the average annual product in the past is a fair index of the annual average product in the future. The world's annual product may of course increase absolutely, but it is doubtful whether it will increase in relation to the uses to which it is to be put.

We have a right to judge the future by the present and the past. Even if true, the fact that the production of silver is growing from year to year, so frequently cited as a reason for maintaining its demonetization, is the strongest possible reason why it should be restored as a standard money metal. I had the honor once before on this floor to demonstrate this proposition and also that the production of silver had not increased from year to year proportionately with the increase of population, business, manufacturing, railroading, iron, etc.

I here reproduce some of the figures. They constitute Fact 4 of my speech on this subject delivered on August 22, 1893:

FACT 4.

The annual increase of gold and silver since 1860 has not been as great as the annual increase of population, of commerce, of railroads, of cotton, of grain, and of pig iron in the United States for the same period.

	1840.	1860.	1870.	1889.	1890.	Increase.
						Per cent.
Gold and silver (world's supply)		$167,000,000			$311,000,000	86
Population		31,400,000			62,600,000	100
Railroad mileage		30,626			166,702	444
Leading railroads of the United States:
Mileage			15,501		63,477	309
Freight movement, tons			396,000,000		4,938,000,000	1,147
Passenger movement			1,732,000,000		6,421,000,000	277
Banking power	$450,000,000		$2,200,000,000		$5,150,000,000	*390 †134
Grain product, bushels		1,240,000,000		3,454,000,000		178
Cotton, pounds		1,836,000,000			3,629,000,000	98
Pig iron, tons		821,000			9,200,000	1,206

* First period. † Second period.

The table published under the head of Fact 4 is especially important, as showing the danger of relying on one metal only when both put together do not keep pace with the world's growth in population, nor transportation, nor banking power, nor grain, nor cotton, nor pig iron.

Assertions that silver fluctuated violently and is depreciating rapidly from natural causes grow out of the fact that the assertors have reference to the price of silver in gold.

But in addition to the fact that necessarily silver does not fluctuate any more in terms of gold than gold does in terms of silver, it is a fact that the price of all commodities, as expressed in the amount of silver bullion for which they would at given times exchange, has varied less than their price, as expressed in the amount of gold bullion for which they would exchange.

Even the production of gold has been growing the last few years pari passu, or almost pari passu, with that of silver. In short, Mr. Chairman, God has managed things more wisely in the storehouses of nature than politicians imagine. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we may consider the annual production as the only thing which we have to take into account. I have already explained that the stock on hand, of coin or ornament, need not be considered in connection with the question of free coinage. Now, what have you got with which to meet this annual production? You have here a Federal Government that collects nearly $500,000,000 annually in taxes. You have here governments that collect for township and municipal and county and State purposes twice as much. You have therefore, say, $1,500,000,000 per annum of taxes alone to be paid, for every dollar of which the legal-tender standard silver money of the United States could answer a purpose. You could coin $1,000,000,000 more silver than you have before you overtopped the capacity of tax consumption alone. In addition to that you have a vast amount of private indebtedness and public indebtedness which can be paid in that money. Back of all that; and infinitely exceeding it all, and growing in a geometrical ratio, stands the colossal figure of our commerce, bestriding, like a beneficent, but insatiable giant, a whole continent. There is your demand, and compared with it what signifies the little annual production of a couple of hundred million dollars of silver? All you want is a demand, a use, equaling or overtopping the possible supply. Have you it not?

Mr. HILL. Why not pay it in paper?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will come to that in a moment, though perhaps I may as well touch that question now, if the gentleman will remind me to return later to the point in hand. When you use paper money, or so-called paper "money," there is no use for the paper itself. It is not the commodity of payment. It is simply a promise of or a draft on the agreed commodity of payment. When I pay you this one-dollar bill, you do not accept from me this piece of paper of a certain length and breadth as of itself indemnity for debt or commodity. You accept a promise to pay $1 in coin. It is not the paper itself which is paid or is accepted, or which is of value; it is the thing called for by it whose value is reckoned. Therefore you may increase your paper currency indefinitely and it would not increase the actual money behind it. You might as well talk about increasing the number of bales of cotton in a warehouse by increasing the number of warehouse receipts as to talk about increasing the quantity of money by increasing the number of paper orders or promises to pay money. Solvent paper answers all the purposes of money as a medium of exchange. It answers no purpose as a standard or measurer of values.

Now, where money has a real value, where it is a real standard money—and standard money was correctly defined by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] awhile ago as being that money which has unlimited access to the mints—a real standard money, then, which has unlimited access to the mints, is always worth as money precisely the value of the material out of which it is made. Any other form of so-called money—currency—has exactly the value of the standard money, if at par with the standard money. An increase of drafts, checks, clearing-house receipts, bills of exchange, paper currency; in short, of credit appliances representing money as a medium of exchange; is very far from being an increase of the supply of the money which measures. Just the contrary, it is an increase of the demand on money, of the strain which it must bear.

If the increase is disproportionate to the increase of the redemption fund (standard money behind it), it is only a question of time when the entire fabric of credits must shrivel to due proportion in the blast of the "panic." If this were not true, $100 in coin would answer the purposes of trade as well as the world's stock of eight billions of coin. Therefore the case of money is not at all analogous to that of paper.

Now, as to this talk about the "Christian and civilized nations" being for gold monometallism; I observed one thing the other day with sorrow. I heard even our friend from Maine, Governor DINGLEY, who is generally so entirely ingenuous and candid in debate, lose himself for one moment and indulge in a little claptrap schoolboy oratory about "Mexicanizing" this American people. Why, my friends I felt sorry when I heard the gentleman from Maine say that and when I saw sensible men applaud it. You can not Mexicanize this American people except in one way. We have prevented that down South, and the people have prevented it on the Pacific Coast, and elsewhere in our country there has never been any danger of it; that way is by hybridizing the race. [Applause.]

Suppose I were to answer the gentleman by saying, "If you want a gold standard in America, you want to reduce the American people to the condition of Haiti (there is a gold standard there), of Cuba (there is a gold standard there), of Turkey (there is a gold standard there), of the most degraded parts of the world—the Portuguese East India possessions, for example, for Portugal has a gold standard." If I should use such an argument—I, a silver crank and a young man—everybody would say, "WILLIAMS, you are making a fool of yourself." But when one of these gentlemen—not a "silver lunatic," but a "gold lunatic"—indulges in that sort of talk, wise men absolutely applaud it on the floor of the American House of Representatives! [Laughter and applause.]

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] says that he believes the fact that all these Christian nations have adopted the gold standard is the result of "evolution." Now, I am a believer in the scientific doctrine of evolution in physical matters, in intellectual matters, and in other things. I think a race of people with heredity back of it—a language with heredity back of it—a business with experience back of it that has been evolved from long ages—is, all other things considered or accounted for, apt to be the best. But I had the honor once before of stating to the House of Representatives the difference between evolution and mayhem. Some people believe that the remote ancestors of our race belonged to the monkey tribe and that by long lack of use for certain parts of their bodies, they lost those parts and by gradual evolution became men. But, as I had the honor of saying before, if you take one of those monkeys and undertake to rid him of his prehensile attachment by chopping it off little by little, you would not call that evolution; you would call it mayhem. Silver is suffering from legislative mayhem. [Laughter and applause.]

Now, it strikes me as a curious thing that gentlemen come here and talk about not "interfering by legislation" with finance, leaving it to "evolution," when the very thing of which we are complaining is that there has been interference by legislation with finance.

I admit—and I have never been an extremist upon any question—that the point made this morning by my friend from Virginia, HARRY TUCKER, a worthy son of a noble sire, was a point well worthy of consideration. It was that no man can "demonstrate" to a mathematical nicety that the result of the United States resuming free coinage would be to establish ultimately and permanently "a parity between the two metals"—to carry up silver to a parity with gold. But my friend from Virginia forgot one thing. The free coinage of silver will not have so great a tendency to carry up the price of silver bullion, great as that will be, as it will to drag down the price of gold bullion, and of gold coin with it, all over the world, because a great part of the present price of gold bullion and of gold coin consists of a speculative element that has been put into it by the knowledge resting in the minds of the commercial world that there was no hope for any help coming from silver to do its work as money.

No, gentlemen, I do not want to thrash out old straw. I do not want to enter again into the diagnosis of the financial disease. You all know what it is. It is the disease of falling prices, not the disease of fallen prices—not the disease of prices which have fallen, which hardly hurts anybody, except for a short time those persons who might happen to be then and there in debt—but the disease which I would define to be the disease of the process of constantly falling prices, discouraging investment, sapping enterprise, extinguishing hope of profit. Now, no man of any intelligence and candor denies that there is to-day, and has been for the last twenty, twenty-two, or twenty-three years, a constant tendency to lower and lower prices. In all countries with the gold standard; whether they are in countries with high tariff, or countries with low tariff, or countries with free trade; this has been going on.

This process has not been going on in any countries which have not a gold standard. That is a fact worthy of all remembrance. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CHARLES W. STONE] attempted to account for it. He said there have been great improvements in processes of manufacture, great inventions, a cheapening of transportation, a cheapening and extension of banking facilities. My friends, there are two answers to that, which, taken separately or together, are conclusive. In the first place, steamboats, steamships, railroads, and telegraphs were not invented after 1873, but before; yet during the period from 1849 to 1873 prices were always rising. The process of decrease in the expense of handling products, of transportation, did not take its start from 1873; that process had been going on before, yet prices were rising.

These new methods of carrying on the banking business, these new facilities for commerce, these checks and drafts, and all that sort of thing did not take their rise in 1873; they have been vastly improved since that time; but the rate of their improvement was just as great from 1850 down to 1873 as it has ever been since. So that the theory of the gentleman does not meet the facts of the case.

And I was astonished when the gentleman went out of his way to say that in the production of cotton there have been various improvements. Why, my friend, we have always had three implements for working cotton—the plowman, the plow, and the mule; we have them yet. There have been no new processes introduced for producing cotton.

So much for my first answer. My second is to all minds equally satisfactory and to philosophic ones even more a demonstration. It is that when low prices are really brought about by decreased cost of production, improved processes of manufacture, increased facilities, and lower cost of handling, of transportation, and of exchange, two things happen: First, the consumer gets what he buys cheaper, and secondly, and at the same time, the capital invested in production and manufactures gets the same or a higher percentage of reward, while the labor engaged in either receives higher compensation per day or month. A period of low prices from such causes is always and necessarily a period of prosperity and improvement for both consumer and producer. The period from 1873 to 1896 has not answered that description.

Now, I do not say that the undeniable appreciation of gold, both as bullion and coin, is exclusively accountable for the fall of prices which has taken place in all commodities. As the gentleman properly said, if it were the sole factor in all this falling of prices the fall ought to have been uniform with all products.

My friends, when you want to fix the price of anything you have to consider two separate and correlated factors. When you go to fix the price of gold, for example, how do you fix it? First, you consider, or the commercial world considers, on one side the supply of and the demand for gold—or rather the estimated supply and demand, because the problem is a psychological one after all; if there is a mistake in the estimate, the estimate will still control until it is corrected—you consider, I say, on the one side the supply of and the demand for gold, and on the other hand the supply of and demand for the thing for which you wish to sell the gold. Let it be cotton, for example—then you correlate the two answers you get from these two separate inquiries and from that correlation you get the price, which is "the higgling of the market," as Adam Smith calls it, after all.

So, Mr. Chairman, the demand and supply of a particular article and the demand and supply of the money which may be utilized for the purchase of that particular article are together the factors which enter into the calculation. But the demand and supply of money operates uniformly; that is, it uniformly affects the price of all products. Thus, if the product which you buy is one which has fallen in price, then it is true that it would not have fallen quite so much had the supply of real money—not promise to pay money, but real money—been greater. On the other hand, if it be a product which has risen, it would have risen higher but for the other factor, the money-supply factor; just as gravity operates uniformly on all motion, but nowhere without disturbance; so that you can not say of any particular motion that it is solely caused by gravity.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just there for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is one point that I have not heard discussed here during this debate. I have heard it argued, however, by a man who considers himself very learned on the subject, and I would like to have the opinion of the gentleman from Mississippi, if it will not interrupt his remarks.

The Constitution of the United States does not discriminate between gold and silver. It prohibits the States from making anything but gold or silver a legal tender in payment of debts. Now, when Congress stopped the coinage of silver as legal tender, can this Congress—has it the power, in the opinion of the gentleman, to, in its discretion under the Constitution, stop the coinage of gold?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, sir, I think if it had the one power it has both. [Applause.]

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Let me ask, further, has this Congress, under the Constitution, or has any Congress, as a matter of constitutional law, the right to prohibit absolutely the coinage of either metal as money?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have heard a good many honest arguments on both sides of that question, and although I am a strict constructionist myself, I am inclined to think that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to state what shall be the money of the United States. There is no express limitation on the power of Congress in that regard. There is, of course, upon the State, which can not make anything but gold and silver a legal tender in payment of debts. But I do not regard that as applying to the power exercised by the Congress of the United States.

Now, I said, Mr. Chairman, that I should not thrash over old straw, and I do not propose to do so, but——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Did not Mr. Blaine, when he was a Senator of the United States in 1878, say that Congress had no more power to demonetize silver than it had to demonetize gold, and in making that statement did he not quote from that most eminent constitutional lawyer of Massachusetts, Daniel Webster?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to say, in that connection, that I do not desire to take up time with the consideration of the views which great lawyers in the United States may have held. They are infinitely better qualified than I am to give an opinion. I do not consider my own views in the premises to be of any very considerable value, nor do I wish to rest my argument on legal grounds. This question is broader than that. It is true that not only Mr. Blaine and Mr. Webster, but very many of the soundest and best lawyers of the United States have held and do hold the opinion suggested.

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] says that we have the gold standard in this country, and he is right. We have it. England has it. Continental Europe has it. We not only have it, but we are suffering from it. Does he like it? The mad, foolish experiment has been tried and has failed. Its wreck abides with us. The field of its trial was broad and fair. The pathway of its destructive influence is equally broad. The devastation has been so marked that for the first time in the history of the world the supremacy of the white man in industrial enterprises seems threatened.

For the first time in the history of the world the yellow man, armed with the white metal, menaces the supremacy of the white man, handicapped with the yellow metal.

The gentleman from Maine, Governor DINGLEY, is right when he says that we are even yet in a condition preferable to that of Mexico and Mexicans. But how long will we be able to maintain it? Industrially, I mean.

Mexico is expanding, her prosperity is increasing; she is becoming day by day more and more quickened with the life-giving spirit of enterprise and hope. Our prosperity is waning, our enterprise is deadened, and our people are year by year less hopeful and more and more the prey of despair. What is true of Mexico is true of all countries which are blessed by not being cursed with the gold standard, although they have every disadvantage of condition, race, and aptitude.

What is true of us is true of all gold monometallic countries, although we have the advantages of Christianity, of a growing spirit of democracy, of world-surveying literatures, and of superiority of race and aptitude. Take cotton manufacturing, for example. Both in England and this country the business is in a depressed condition. According to the figures quoted by Sir William Houldsworth in a speech to the Master Cotton Spinners on October 26, 1894:

> While the exports of cotton yarns to China, Hongkong, and Japan in the six years 1876-1881, both inclusive, amounted to 232,000,000 pounds, in the six years 1888-1893, both inclusive, they only amounted to 206,000,000 pounds, and in the intervening six years they had been as low as 202,000,000 pounds.
>
> Cotton spindles at home and abroad.—Authoritative figures just published relative to the number of cotton spindles in this country and in continental countries, the United States, and India show how rapidly, says the Pall Mall Gazette, our great rivals in the cotton trade are advancing on us. We are still a long way in front in point of numbers, but this is not an altogether unalloyed satisfaction in face of the fact that spinning is a very unprofitable game here and quite the reverse among our competitors. The spindles in Great Britain to-day are estimated to be 45,270,000, being the same total as on September 30, 1893.
>
> The Continent has seen an increase on the year of 600,000, the total standing at 27,350,000, the United States an increase of 200,000, with a total of 15,841,000, and India an increase of 74,000, with a total of 3,650,000 spindles. If we take the ten years 1885-1894 the relative increase works out at 5.28 per cent for Great Britain, 20.22 per cent for the Continent, 19.55 per cent for the United States, and 70.16 per cent for India. These figures are perhaps the most eloquent commentary we could have on the present condition of our cotton-spinning trade.

From Mexico we hear statistically that 12, 15, 18, 20, even 22, per cent is being reaped from cotton manufacturing; from Japan, that the growth in all forms of manufacturing and commerce is unprecedented.

Let any of my hearers who wish to understand more clearly this matter of the effect of gold monometallism in crippling the industries of gold-standard countries read pages 33, 34, 35, 36, and 37 of Archbishop Walsh's inimitable pamphlet, Bimetallism and Monometallism, especially pages 36 and 37, Dublin edition of 1893

I repeat again, in reply to the gentleman from Tennessee, yes, we have gold monometallism. Does he like it? If so, he has a capacity for keeping jolly not equaled by Mark Tapley himself.

The absurd, ridiculous, novel, and uncalled-for experiment has been tried and has failed, failed miserably. Are you going to continue the experiment?

But when we propose a remedy, as is often the case in such discussions, we are met at the forefront with a "bogy man." These gentlemen propose nothing themselves, but they say that under free and unlimited coinage of silver you will have a silver dollar which will be worth something different in purchasing power from what the gold dollar will be worth. They say, further, that that being the effect, all the gold in the country will go into hiding or leave the country altogether. They tell us that we will have "silver monometallism." They never undertake to prove this. It is more convenient to assume it. That is the "bogy man."

Now, Mr. Chairman, when a man threatens you with anything he threatens you with his definition of the thing. He threatens you with what he understands the thing to be, whatever it may be; and when my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] and the gentleman from Maine, Governor DINGLEY, come to define "silver monometallism" they define it as a condition under which silver would form chiefly or wholly the circulating medium, and they describe bimetallism as a condition under which both metals would circulate side by side. Neither definition is scientifically correct. But I repeat that when a man threatens you with anything he threatens you with his definition of it, whatever that definition may be. If he threatens you with an elephant, and he thinks an elephant is a bear, he is really threatening you with a bear.

Now, let us see where we are. These gentlemen say that from 1792 down to 1834, although we had a bimetallic standard, we did not have bimetallism, that we had a silver circulating medium, and therefore silver monometallism. It has been the chief call, the chief tocsin, the very starting point in the speeches which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] has made in the South, and which have been made by other gentlemen there. Suppose it be true. I have two answers to it. First, if this country had silver monometallism from 1792 down to 1834, we are willing to take it over again. No country on the face of the globe was ever more prosperous, no country ever carried on better the work of developing magnificent manhood and womanhood, which is the object of the existence of Government—for Thomas Jefferson was right when he said that "The object of all science and of all Government is the happiness and freedom of mankind"—no people ever grew as rapidly in wealth and culture as when we had this system. They say that the gold will leave us. My friends, what has become of the gold now?

According to these gentlemen we must now have "silver monometallism," and silver monometallism under a false pretense, because they have admitted upon the floor that there is no circulation of gold among the people in this country, that the only metallic circulation is silver. Of course their admission, logically, merely disproves their definition, but they have threatened us with the definition. Now, my friends, I said upon the floor of this House during the extra session of 1893 that the time would come when, under your present system, the coins would part company. It has come. Patrick Henry said in Virginia, "Gentlemen cry, 'Peace, peace!' and there is no peace," and I say to you that you stand here to-day crying, "Parity, parity!" and there is no parity. It does not exist to-day.

The time of Mr. WILLIAMS having expired, by unanimous consent Mr. MCMILLIN was recognized and yielded fifteen minutes to Mr. WILLIAMS.

Mr. MCMILLIN. In yielding fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi, I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I cut out of the papers the other day several interviews with men in the city of New York, in which they were telling what the amount of premium on gold was then and there as a commercial fact. That is not all. Although it has only lately become palpable to the people of this country as an "object lesson," this premium has been existing in concealed form for, lo! these many months. The amount of the interest which the American people have been paying upon the bonds which they have been issuing for the purpose of getting gold in order to maintain the parity is the measure exactly of the premium upon gold at present existing. Now, if there is to be a premium upon gold, I ask you, were it not infinitely better that it should be paid by the gold exporter and gold dealer and importer than by the taxpayers of the United States?

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman a question? You say that we now have silver monometallism, according to these gentlemen's definition?

Mr. WILLIAMS. According to their definition.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. Do you like the situation now?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not by any means, and I do not want silver monometallism either. I was merely answering their argument.

Now, my friends, I want to go a step further. I want to say that what I meant to show was that the bogy man with which they threatened us was not so much of a bogy man after all, or else is their own bogy man who is partially here now and must come in full under their own system.

Mr. MCCLEARY of Minnesota. But you do not like him very well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not like this. We have now what I call gold monometallism. Now, the truth of the matter is that gold monometallism is a condition of things where the standard or measure of values is gold, and where gold alone has free access to the mints. Silver monometallism is a condition of things where the standard or measure of values is silver, and where silver alone has free access to the mints, and bimetallism is where the standard or measures of value is an alternate, or, as I prefer to say, an alternative, standard of the two, and where both metals have equally, without limit, free access to the mints.

So we have arrived in the history of this mad experiment at this point. There is a premium on gold to-day. But there are gentlemen who will say that is a mere temporary agio, which exists only at the time bonds are to be bought, for the purpose of getting gold to buy the bonds. Admit it for the sake of argument, but, my friends, the time must come necessarily—mathematically—when the agio will be permanent, if your present system is continued, and when the measure of the agio or premium will be the difference between the bullion value of silver demonetized and discredited and the bullion value of gold overmonetized and overcredited. What a difference! Now, how is it, that it must come?

Any child ought to be able to see on general principles that you can not go on forever legislating one bullion up and the other bullion down, lengthening the chain that fitfully binds them together, making the market price of the two bullions further and further apart, without finally reaching the point where the coins made out of them must part company; the point where even the "faith of the Government," or in plain English the credit of the people of the United States, can no longer bind them together. But to enter into details; you have this endless-chain process going on at New York all the time; little buckets dipping down into the golden waters of the Treasury well and bringing them up day by day; exhausting them; and when they get down to a certain point the cry is made by everybody, "Here, we are about to lose our parity, and we had better issue some bonds."

You know the process. Have you any way to stop it? Can it go on indefinitely? You know very well it can not, under a popular form of government. You know it must have an end. Some time it must be stopped; either by the fact that the American people will rise and revolt against the system—and that is the way I think it will end—or if not in that way, then it will end by the exhaustion of the credit of the United States; because even this great Government can not go on borrowing forever.

Are you gentlemen who oppose bimetallism making any sincere effort to stop it? You know you are not. Are you willing to destroy all the greenbacks and Sherman notes, these little buckets which go down into the well? It is true that you would thereby blight and ruin the country; but what difference would that make? You would have your "best money," your dear gold standard! You would have it protected and impregnable. In that way only can you much longer maintain the parity without free coinage.

This is the one way in the world to do it; to be a consistent and logical monometallist like Grover Cleveland; and how many of you are courageous enough to follow him? Are you willing to carry out your system to its logically necessary result, as he does? If you were, somebody else would be found by your constituents to take your places. You can not have gold monometallism along with no circulation of gold. You have got your greenbacks and Sherman notes of 1890 driving out your gold, and you will have to burn them up or cancel them, or in some way get rid of them, if you maintain your system, and yet, even if you were willing, the people of the country would not let you do it.

Now, even if under a certain state of legislation, indicated by me above as Mr. Cleveland's plan, you could possibly maintain the parity, that condition would have to be reached, as I have shown, by legislation which the American people will never under any circumstances consent to. There are not 10 men in this House bold enough to rise upon this floor (and there are some very bold men here when it comes to defying the will of the people) and offer a bill, and stand sponsor for it, for the redemption of greenbacks and Sherman notes without putting in their place some other form of paper money. If you do away with this kind of Government paper you must swap it for some other. You will have to dip some other little bucket down in the Treasury well if you do—some other Government paper redeemable by the Government in gold on demand, if you are going to preserve both the gold standard and the parity.

Will your substitute be bank notes? Then you will have to put upon the banks the business of redeeming the demands for all the gold exporters and gold raiders in the world. My word for it, they are not philanthropic enough to let you do it. They have already told you as much. No! my friends, the fact is this: That fool parity clause in the act of 1890—and I measure my words—stands here to-day obligating the American people to the maintenance of a parity between gold and silver in the United States and for the world with a gold standard; you can't shift nor evade your burden without deserting your system. Will you be brave enough to come with us and desert your poor old stranded wreck? Your experiment has failed; will you let us try? It has put us under the immense burden of maintaining a parity under a gold-standard system, under which a parity is not natural, but is artificial.

We are taxing our people to maintain it not for America alone, but for all Europe. The moment that, without free coinage, without furnishing any demand for silver equal to its supply to be used as money, you fail at the New York subtreasury to redeem in gold you yourselves say that gold will jump to a premium; and if it does it will jump to a premium in London, in Paris, and St. Petersburg. With free coinage you may maintain the parity. I feel certain that, under your present system, you will find it to be a physical impossibility. Gold will jump to a premium, unless some other nation steps in and begins to do what we have been doing, and what no other country has ever thus far done.

The Bank of England does not furnish gold for export free. They have gold monometallism, and the bank raises its discount when the demand for gold is increased. And the amount of the rise of the discount is the measure of the premium paid for export. The Reischbank of Germany does the same thing. The Bank of France refuses to give out the gold at all, except when it chooses. It simply declines to pay gold on demand. So throughout the world to-day there is but one power that is standing here exchanging gold for silver, not directly, but practically; not by law, but by a custom of the Treasury. When that power fails to carry out that custom, you will have then true silver monometallism, as well as gentlemen's definition of it. It will come upon you, as the Germans say, "ueber nacht," in the stillness of the nighttime. It will sweep over the country by telegraph, and not come gradually, as it would, if it came at all, under free coinage.

There is no doubt about that. The fact that we could under free coinage—our plan—carry the value of the silver bullion up to the value of the silver coin for a time, no telling how long, even if we could not maintain it forever (as I and my school think we could), can not be doubted. Our failure, if we failed, would be gradually accomplished, but this thing with which you are threatened would come at once, and disastrously.

Now, there are but two logical standpoints from which to look at it. You have got to be a bimetallist, with gold and silver for standard money—unlimited coinage, with free access to the mints for both metals—or you have got to be gold-standard men, with a gold circulation back of your gold standard to secure it and all demand paper threatening it wiped out of existence. In order to have that you must destroy all of your paper money on hand and put no more in its place. Now, you know you will not and can not do that. The gentleman from Tennessee says, and several gentlemen have said, that you must have concurrent circulation in order to have bimetallism, and they say that we did not have concurrent circulation from 1792 down to 1834, nor yet from 1834 down to 1873, because at one time we differed from the market ratio on one side and at another time on the other side, and we had silver circulation at one period and gold circulation at another, and they say this came about because our ratio differed from the "commercial relation" or "commercial ratio" of the metals.

Now, I want to explode this "bogy man" of the "commercial relation" between gold and silver. There never was any ascertained commercial relation between gold and silver in the sense in which these gentlemen use the term. There never can be any ascertained or ascertainable "commercial relation" between gold and silver, independent of their money uses, in the sense in which these gentlemen use the term, unless one of two things takes place—unless both the metals were at the same time and everywhere demonetized and treated simply as articles of commerce, so that men could take them or not, as they pleased, or unless both metals were everywhere in the world at the same time treated in the same way by giving both free access to the mints. Neither of these conditions of things has ever existed on the face of the globe, and therefore any man knows that when you come to talk of the "commercial ratio" you are talking of a vain thing.

If there is any way of ascertaining what their natural normal ratio or relation of value, independent of all mint laws or legislation, is, it would be by ascertaining what has been their relative production from the storehouses of God—their bulk ratio. This, long lapses of time being taken, or the entire production up to date being taken, has varied remarkably little. It is now precisely 16.3 ounces of silver to 1 ounce of gold. Add on the three-tenths, if you think it worth while. I would not object materially.

My friend from Tennessee [Mr. PATTERSON] said that our forefathers in 1792 went to work to find the commercial ratio between silver and gold, and fixed it at 15 to 1, and having missed the true "commercial ratio," as a consequence lost their gold; that they went to work again in 1834 and fixed the ratio at 16 to 1, and having again missed the "true commercial ratio," lost their silver; and he said that at both times it was because they had varied from this imaginary vain thing, this imaginary "commercial ratio," this evanishing tertium quid. But the gentleman's explanation is not correct. The result which he describes happened both times because our ancestors were wise, like the gentleman from Tennessee—superwise—and went around hunting after a vain thing, a "figment of the brain." If they had gone ahead like practical business men and said: "We will take the French ratio of 15½ to 1—the mint ratio, the legal ratio, the legislative ratio, which we find existing"—if they had done that instead of going to work to build up a conflicting ratio, there never would have been any loss of gold or silver from the United States at either time.

The fact is that France at both these periods had concurrent circulation of the two metals. Why? Because at that period in the history of the world the commerce of France, and later on of France and the Latin Union, so much outweighed ours in the esteem of the commercial world that it absolutely subordinated ours, and their mint ratio controlled ours, and the ratio of France, except for temporary agios which occurred on special occasions, and under any system will occur temporarily or locally—gentlemen will remember that there was one of 3 cents on the silver dollar during the panic in New York in 1893—the ratio of France, I say, except for those temporary or local agios, was maintained, and the metals were kept at perfect parity all that time in the French market, and at a substantial parity in the London market even.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I shall publish in the RECORD some figures taken from Sir Hucks Gibbs's Colloquies on Currency, and prepared by Mr. E. Barclay, showing in one column the amount of money which the Bank of France coined in gold and in the next column the amount she coined in silver year by year during this entire period, showing how the concurrent circulation of the two metals was going on in France, whereas it will be remembered that in this country we coined but little gold down to 1834, and but little silver from 1834 down to 1873.

TABLE H.—Showing by their dates the number of gold 20-franc pieces and silver 5-franc pieces coined in France from 1803 to July 31, 1878.

Date.	Number of pieces coined each year.		Date.	Number of pieces coined each year.
	20-franc gold pieces.	5-franc silver pieces.		20-franc gold pieces.	5-franc silver pieces.
1803	58,262	4,565,400	1842	92,636	13,175,982
1804	1,416,387	8,460,663	1843	141,330	14,371,790
1805	520,311	7,836,898	1844	137,113	13,395,112
1806	1,151,950	4,485,649	1845	5,957	16,780,658
1807	839,444	804,423	1846	104,321	8,442,203
1808	1,482,975	9,382,286	1847	385,301	14,332,206
1809	720,110	7,985,445	1848	1,984,887	23,810,589
1810	2,186,802	10,344,480	1849	1,355,478	40,766,309
1811	4,070,593	48,947,496	1850	3,963,594	16,120,678
1812	3,471,798	31,045,613	1851	12,585,214	11,499,290
1813	3,037,054	26,002,853	1852	694,065	13,990,200
1814	3,227,236	12,157,707	1853	15,648,201	3,891,632
1815	2,763,992	7,532,048	1854	23,485,957	10,615
1816	640,106	6,836,669	1855	18,399,783	4,861,173
1817	2,428,882	7,008,958	1856	18,745,899	9,155,481
1818	4,042,851	2,419,939	1857	19,193,214	93,406
1819	2,611,313	4,188,801	1858	18,877,635	26,790
1820	1,428,094	3,612,292	1859	26,166,075	3,365
1821	20,207	13,355,182	1860	15,946,635	----------
1822	233,937	19,688,279	1861	4,030,253	22,098
1823	20,087	16,068,150	1862	7,732,433	21,129
1824	324,477	22,314,567	1863	7,672,793	21,087
1825	2,179,346	14,573,894	1864	10,382,097	32,168
1826	46,153	17,746,462	1865	6,039,958	97,134
1827	157,835	29,916,081	1866	13,970,178	37,898
1828	297,259	31,426,133	1867	7,439,514	10,810,313
1829	13,729	19,929,090	1868	14,110,127	18,724,110
1830	464,908	23,739,223	1869	11,362,847	11,652,857
1831	2,356,943	40,658,479	1870	2,717,440	10,729,670
1832	49,433	26,861,063	1871	2,508,494	942,181
1833	394,307	30,885,119	1872	----------	77,833
1834	883,344	42,306,804	1873	----------	30,929,809
1835	152,927	19,162,221	1874	1,215,985	11,909,202
1836	149,376	8,303,765	1875	11,745,600	15,000,000
1837	44,889	21,840,508	1876	8,824,658	10,532,263
1838	184,953	17,248,016	1877 *	12,759,057	3,292,857
1839	1,033,454	14,307,757	1878	7,090,088	363,130
1840	2,049,912	12,261,177
1841	618,753	14,659,936	Total	355,294,106	990,973,143

* The coinage of 5-franc pieces in 1877 and 1878 belongs to engagements entered into prior to the law of August 5, 1876. They are a part of the quota allowed by the supplementary treaties of the Union.

TABLE I.—Showing by their dates the number of French gold 10-franc pieces coined in France 1850 to 1869.

Date.	Number of pieces coined each year.	Date.	Number of pieces coined each year.
1850	592,051	1861	1,029,214
1851	1,800,524	1862	4,712,118
1852	1,314,697	1863	4,251,637
1853		1864	4,788,520
1854	3,899,802	1865	3,249,295
1855	6,149,585	1866	6,495,917
1856	10,777,734	1867	3,550,274
1857	14,498,136	1868	4,532,811
1858	8,211,046	1869	109,351
1859	13,325,889
1860	8,075,555	Total	101,364,156

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Frankly and honestly, is there any relation between the amount of gold or silver coined at the mints and the amount in use as money?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes, sir.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Then how do you account for the fact that we coined millions upon millions from 1861 to 1879 but did not see a dollar of that coinage in circulation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I am talking about a country in its normal condition and on a normal monetary basis, not about one with a depreciated paper currency.

We were not on a specie basis at the time the gentleman refers to. When either metal was brought to the mint to be coined at all, it was for use of the owner in foreign commerce. Depreciated paper was driving out of domestic circulation all metallic money.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Then, you are trying to establish the fact that there was concurrent circulation in France by the fact that there was concurrent mintage, and I repeat my question: Is there any relation between the amounts of gold or silver coined at the mints and the amount that is in use as money?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes. In a country upon a specie basis, where both metals are demanded and admitted freely to the mint, nobody will carry his bullion to the mints unless he wants to use it as coin, and its chief use as coins will be for domestic circulation or domestic reserves.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. And does the gentleman say that people did not do that in this country from 1861 to 1879?

Mr. WILLIAMS. They did not carry their gold to the mints unless they wanted to use it; but in our case they wished to use it for a different purpose. We had a depreciated paper currency in this country, and they used their gold as coin to buy commodities that were purchased abroad, or else for speculative purposes on the gold-exchange boards.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Exactly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Even if under free coinage we failed to close up the gap now existing between the bullion value of the two metals, which my friend, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER], fears might be the case, the effect would still be to appreciate the value of silver bullion very considerably and thereby lessen the strain of Oriental competition with our producers, and to depreciate somewhat the price of gold bullion and, as a consequence, of gold money all over the world, thereby reducing the pressure of fixed charges and debts, public and private, weighing so heavily, under an appreciating standard, on the producing classes.

But I am not alarmed about gold leaving the United States under free coinage. I do not believe it would leave us, because I do not believe there would be a premium on gold under free coinage for the reasons which I have stated. In fact, I believe free coinage of both metals with the alternative use and demand for both to be the only practicable way of maintaining the parity permanently. But I would rather lose the parity and the gold, too, than to continue to pay the price we are now paying to maintain them under this ruinous system of "endless chain and bond issue"—ruinous to the people in their private affairs, ruinous to the Government as a fiscal agent; grinding down hope and opportunity for betterment; sowing the seeds of despair and anarchy; threatening national insolvency.

I would rather have a premium upon gold paid by the gold dealer and the gold exporter than to have, as we now have, a premium upon gold in the shape of interest-bearing bonds, paid by taxing the energies, enterprise, property, sweat, aye, the very hope of my fellow-citizens. If it stopped there it would be bad enough, too bad, but you are laying this burden on their children and grandchildren. Ah, gentlemen, you are making us pay too much for our gold, especially when we remember that, with it all and after it all, we have no gold, and day by day have lessening opportunities to earn any if there were any to earn.

Gentlemen no longer deny that gold is virtually out of circulation in the United States. How would a premium on gold hurt the plain producers of the country? It is an evil, but not an untried evil. We had it down to 1878 or 1879. Was manufacturing, was commerce, was farming less prosperous than now?

I am a cotton planter. You will excuse me, therefore, for saying that I have heard the gentleman from Tennessee and others say that a premium on gold would specially injure my class. How? They say because we sell our cotton in Liverpool at the gold price. But they say at the same time that all our gold would leave us and go to England. If so, all the economists, who without exception have taught the truth of the quantitative theory of real money (and not one disputes it), are and have been fools, or else this great influx of gold into Great Britain would lower the price of gold there and thereby raise the price of commodities measured in gold and give me a higher price for my cotton. I would still sell my cotton at "Liverpool gold prices," less transportation and profit to the middle man, those prices being translated at Yazoo City, Memphis, or New Orleans into American silver and paper on a parity with silver, plus the premium.

I remember when we used to sell our cotton for "Liverpool gold prices" translated into American greenbacks at Memphis and New Orleans. It was an evil, but by no means comparable to the evils we now suffer from. There has been much unscientific thought and loose expression on this subject of "gold leaving the country." Some have said there would be a "contraction of the currency" as a consequence.

Mr. Chairman, change of locality is not annihilation. Prices are fixed, other things being equal, by the world's volume of money—real money. Prices, like waters, never attain an exact level, but are always seeking it, the world over. As all the waters run down to the sea, so all commodities run down to the markets where high prices prevail; or, to express the same idea in converse, where the price of money is lowest. They continue to seek it until the approximate equilibrium is restored; until a quantity of commodities has come in sufficient to take away a certain quantity of money, whose subtraction from the local volume shall raise the price of money, and thus lower the price of commodities to the normal and natural sea level of prices.

Why does gold leave a country? People speak of it as if it were a sentient entity—"if you make it mad, it will desert." It has no wings—it can not fly. It has no legs—it can not run. It has no volition—it can not make up its mind to go, and, ergo, go. It has a master, its owner; it is his automatic and faithful servant. It goes whithersoever it can do him the most service; wheresoever it can buy most for its master, there you find it. Hence, I lay it down as an axiomatic truth that whenever gold, or money of any sort, with the permission of its owners leaves a country, it is under conditions such that it is to the interest of the country that it should leave. The only exceptions to the rule, nationally, are when war and tumult cause the movements. The only exception, individually, is when the owner is a fool, i. e., a miser. Gold, like generous wine, is a good servant, but a cruelly bad master. It is never a master except when its owner voluntarily enslaves himself to it.

Certainly no great nation should voluntarily go into servitude to its "gold supply"—mortgage itself to it! But is not that what you are doing now?

From the above it will be seen that there would have to be an "expansion of the currency" and a general rise of prices before gold could begin to leave us—in other words, the accompaniment would be precisely the opposite of contraction. But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] said that most of the debts now existing are payable in gold, and if we fail to maintain the parity these poor debtors would be ground down. Of course, I believe, and think I know, that we could and would maintain the parity, and I do not agree that most debts are now payable in gold. But, for the sake of argument, grant both propositions. Let us suppose a premium upon gold of 10 per cent. A man owes $5,000 in gold. Say that he has raised 200 bales of cotton, which would yield him in gold the amount of the debt he owes—$5,000. But he sells for silver, with gold at $1.10. He receives in silver, then, $5,500. His creditor would accept the $5,500 in silver in full of the $5,000 debt payable in gold. If he were schoolboyish enough to refuse, the debtor could go to the bank, buy $5,000 in gold with his $5,500 in silver, and pay.

Thus those who have been so unfortunate or so foolish as to obligate themselves to pay gold could not be hurt, although up to the amount of indebtedness they would not be helped in ea re.

Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take up any more of the time of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MCMILLIN], and I am admonished that the time granted me by him is exhausted. I am so much obliged to him that I can not express it, and I am also greatly obliged to the House for the kind attention with which it has listened to my remarks. [Applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. I desire to make a brief statement of interest to members of the Committee of the Whole. The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole informs me that only two members have entered their names to speak this evening, and that unless more gentlemen consent to occupy time at this evening's session it will be impossible for all those who have entered their names to speak on this subject to be heard in the general debate. He therefore requests that gentlemen who possibly can will enter for the debate this evening, because unless that time is filled up the probability is that some gentlemen must lose their opportunity to be heard, in view of the limitation that has been put upon the debate.

Mr. BRUMM. What limitation has been made?

Mr. DINGLEY. We are to close the debate on Monday.

Mr. BRUMM. By what authority?

Mr. DINGLEY. By authority of the House.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. Chairman, a few years ago we were told that the high protective tariff was the one great menace to prosperity and that it must be combated and put down. In 1890 the campaign of education was waged for tariff reform. No one knew just what this meant, but it was talked of and written of until everyone was perfectly familiar with the declaration. It became a household expression and every man was expected to inform himself on this question. From early in 1890 until after the election in 1892 the daily mails were burdened with tariff-reform literature inculcating the doctrine that the tariff was a tax and that taxation was an evil. This declaration had the semblance of philosophy, but was in fact misleading. Taxation is burdensome, but it is a public necessity, and when properly adjusted and applied to public objects and uses it is in no sense an evil. But in 1892 the people decided in favor of reforming the tariff, and for nearly two years business was threatened and prostrated while the alleged reformation was being accomplished. Up to the time of the passage of the Wilson-Gorman bill we had theory and prophecy to guide us, but since that time we have had the practical results of a low tariff. The great body of the people has not prospered. Business, except in a few lines, has been and is everywhere stagnant. Laborers have not remunerative employment. Capital has avoided enterprise of every kind and has gravitated to the commercial centers. The prices of products of the soil do not now exceed the cost of production. Money seeks investment only in stocks and bonds.

While the new tariff law is responsible for many of these misfortunes, I can not believe it is the cause of all our trouble. From the time of the enactment of the silver legislation of 1878 we were gradually increasing the currency by the purchase and coinage of silver bullion and the issuing of Treasury notes. But in 1893 the Eastern banking associations and some of the commercial bodies organized for the purpose of overthrowing that policy and placing the country on a gold standard. The special session of Congress called for the purpose of repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, and which effected this result, provided no way for increasing the currency to meet the demands of an increased business. This may have been on the theory that business would not increase during the time of the present Administration and that no increase of circulation would be required. The repeal of the silver legislation was urged on the ground of public necessity, but it has proved barren of the results claimed for it. It did not stay the outflow of gold, though we have issued bonds to purchase more than a quarter of billion of "sound money" in order to support the Administration policy. This has been an expensive experiment. More expensive than war. We can approximate the direct cost, but we can not estimate the cost resulting from shrinkage of values and loss to labor.

I believe the American people want the money function restored to the silver dollar, that it may be again useful as money of final payment. The one contention made by the gold-standard advocates against giving the silver the place in our currency it formerly occupied, and the one argument urged and emphasized, is that the restoration of the silver dollar would drive the gold out, and yet it is true that since Congress repealed the law directing the purchase of silver bullion, and by that act announced to the world that the United States had joined the gold-standard countries, more gold has departed from this country than ever before in the same period of time. The loss has been more than two hundred millions. From this it would seem clear that it is not silver that is driving out the gold, but that it has been going out owing to other causes.

Metallic money at times and under certain conditions will be sought for exportation or will flow out because of the foreign demand. When this happens it always takes the coin for which there is the greater demand and that which is most convenient for exportation. At this time the coin wanted is gold. The great advantage in having both gold and silver as money is that when, for any reason, one coin goes out the other remains to do business. History shows that it rarely happens that both coins go out of the country at the same time. The one most demanded is usually the scarcer and less bulky. If there is a difference in parity it is true that the cheaper money will usually remain, but these conditions seldom continue for any considerable length of time. When there is a condition in the United States which takes our gold to Europe, it goes whether we have silver or not, and when conditions change in our favor it will return whether we have a single or double standard. We are told in all these discussions that the restoration of silver in the United States without the concurrence of other nations would be a mistake. I believe we could restore it, but I would commence with the American product and supplement it by such legislation as would protect the gold reserve and would so legislate as to put more silver in circulation. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the idea that we should demand and receive a portion of our duties which come through the custom-houses in gold. If we require this and increase the tariff we will hear no more about the danger to the gold reserve.

It was said in substance by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] that whatever increase of silver we have should be gradual. The more conservative bimetallists might agree to this if some provision could be enacted for commencing this gradual increase. I for one would be satisfied in case something substantial can be done; that is, something which will relieve the situation. At some time talk will have to cease and Congress will legislate upon this question, and when it does so, with the experience of the past, it will doubtless legislate intelligently. Everyone understands that there can be no legislation at this time.

But I take it that the real question over which we are now contending is not whether we shall have unlimited coinage, but it is whether we shall use the silver dollar to any extent as money of final redemption. It may seem otherwise, but disguise it as we may, this is the question on trial. It is whether we shall use the two metals as standard money, as we Republicans declared in our platform in 1892, or whether we shall maintain the single gold standard.

It has been contended here that the people will not care to use much more silver than we now have. In my judgment they could and would take care of much more of this coin and keep it in actual circulation were it not for the effort that is being made in certain sections to depreciate and degrade it. By retiring the bank currency of small denominations much more silver would be required, and still more could be used by the banks if they would hold silver as a part of their coin reserves.

It is believed by the friends of silver that the Treasury Department has done much to discredit this metal, but I think under ordinary circumstances the Treasurer should meet the obligations of the Government by paying out whichever metal is desired. But when there is evidence that the gold is being demanded for export or that a run is being made on the Treasury for the purpose of precipitating a panic, as was done in 1893, then the Treasurer should protect the gold reserve by handing out silver. An honest dollar is the dollar of the contract. The obligations of the Government are payable in coin, not gold. The holders might object to receiving silver, but its payment under such circumstances would stop a run in a few hours and would be sustained by the great body of the American people. The people want fair dealing and without discriminations.

If the money function of the silver dollar is gone and it can be used hereafter only as a subsidiary coin, then we might as well suspend its coinage and use altogether, but I am unwilling to concede that this is to be so. There are many bimetallists in the country, and this international struggle for the gold is a great educator.

The restoration of silver is necessary for another reason, and that is in order to prevent the money syndicates from controlling the world's coin and to protect the Government as well as the people against the growing and dangerous power of these great combinations. For the last two years every citizen of the United States has been humiliated beyond expression because of the confessed inability of the Government to manage its own finances in its own way without paying enormously for the support of these banking institutions.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kansas has expired.

Mr. DINGLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas be allowed time to complete his remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRODERICK. I only desire to say a few more words.

Mr. Chairman, I am not joining the clamor against banks. They are public necessities, but they derive their powers from the Government and should be subject to its control. For several years we have been legislating against trusts, but this gold trust is the greatest menace of them all and it seems to be beyond the reach of legislation.

The struggle now going on for the stock of gold is the best evidence of the inadequacy of the supply. There is but little over half a billion in this country, and we keep selling bonds to save this from departing. Let the American Congress provide additional revenue by increasing the duty on such imported articles as interfere with our productions, require a portion of our duties to be paid in gold, and provide for the coinage and use of American silver, and in my judgment we will once more have a restoration of confidence and prosperity. I shall vote for the amendment submitted by my colleague [Mr. LONG], providing for the coinage of American silver, and if this fails I shall then vote for the Senate substitute, believing, as I do, that it is a question of bimetallism or gold monometallism, and that bimetallism is the better policy for the whole people. [Applause.]

Mr. BOWERS. Mr. Chairman, during the brief time allowed me it is not necessary for me to make any explanation of how I am going to vote on the bill. Certainly none of the old members here can entertain any doubt on that point. I rise at this time, Mr. Chairman, simply to congratulate the Democratic Administration—no, I perhaps ought not to say "Democratic;" I do not think it is really entitled to be termed a Democratic Administration; I will merely say "the Administration"—upon the glorious vindication it has received of its financial theories. After having borrowed about $170,000,000 to pay the running expenses of this Government, it has now demonstrated that it has the ability to borrow another hundred million dollars for the same purpose! This amount, it is estimated, will run the machine during the time that this Administration will live. It will pass away in the ides of March, 1897, unlamented except by a small lot of speculators—a syndicate of speculators—who, alone of all living things on the top of this earth, have profited by its existence. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I read with various emotions the exuberant description given in the Post of yesterday morning of the scene in the Treasury Department when the bids for bonds were opened. I will read a few lines from it.

Said Mr. Eckles:

"I have to announce that bids for bonds of the new issue have been received by the Secretary of the Treasury amounting in an estimated aggregate to more than $500,000,000 in offered gold."

* * * * * * *

Those who heard him lost breath for a moment. Then there was applause and cheers, which, for several minutes, echoed around the long Treasury corridors.

This enthusiasm, which was not the enthusiasm of youth or ignorance, seemed for a time as unbounded as the popular responsive voice which provoked it. The cheers came from gray-haired men of finance, and the applause came from many others prominent in the management of public affairs. And it did not take long for reports to come back over the wire from the big financial center in New York, which told also of reechoing cheers there.

At the end of the room which looks out over the broad meadow lands to the river sat the serious-faced Secretary of the Treasury himself, who could not suppress a smile over the welcome news. On either side of him were money magnates whose very names mean wealth and financial power.

Mr. Chairman, I can imagine the magnificence and impressiveness of that scene, when the great financiers of this nation fell upon each other's necks and hugged each other as the dudes do at a game of football, when in their exuberance of joy at their great success they patted each other on the back over the discovery that they could borrow some more money! And I can imagine that at the same time, while their great heads swam in an intoxicating sea of bliss, their thoughts went back to these poor "crazy silver cranks" who do not know anything about finance or how to run a government. I tell you crazy silver cranks you should hang your heads in view of such wisdom as has been exhibited by these "sound-money" financiers.

Contrast the condition of this country to-day under the "sound-money" Administration with its condition five years ago, ten years ago, fifteen years ago. Why, sir, at that time the motto was, "Pay as you go;" but under the administration of "sound-money" financiers the motto is, "Borrow as you go." [Laughter.] Why, sir, the way to run a government is to borrow money to do it on, and then legislate for posterity; legislate so as to leave them an immense legacy of debt. That is financiering; that is the true idea of statesmanship according to this Administration!

Mr. Chairman, a few days ago some of our good Republicans, desiring to share, in some small degree at least, the rich honors that seemed to be clustering around the Administration's throne, introduced a bill authorizing the President to issue some more bonds. He had already the authority to issue bonds in unlimited quantities; but that seemed to be the only way that they could get in on the ground floor and share a part of the honors. The bill passed; it went to the other House; it came back here, Mr. Chairman, amended with a provision to coin honest dollars—dollars like this silver dollar which I hold in my hand. That always was an honest dollar—is an honest dollar to-day.

My friend from Maine referred to this dollar as a "50-cent dollar." I want to say to him that if it is worth but 50 cents to-day it is because this brazen thief here [holding up a gold piece] has stolen the other 50 cents. This is the yellow thief which under the direction of the Wall street syndicate has stolen half the crop of the farmer. Stolen the shoes off the feet of children, stolen half the opportunities of every American workman. This once honest gold dollar now through its evil associations in the slums of a great city has become a thief. Sir, this silver dollar is yet honest. This gold piece has by its thievery swelled its purchasing power. It is now valuable like any other commodity because of the small supply, and it is no longer a money. It has become a commodity in every sense of the term, sold just the same in the markets as corn, wheat, or potatoes, shipped to any market where it will bring the highest price.

Mr. Chairman, what a mess these "sound-money" men have made! What a condition their theories have brought the country into! I have within a few days received a letter from a friend who was engaged in business in southern California, but soon after this Government passed under the control of these sound-money financiers and the business of the country went to the devil in consequence, he moved to Mexico, which country is said to be on a silver basis. He writes me that he is doing well, making money; that the country is prosperous, and he will soon have enough to come back to California, where he would be among his friends and relatives, but where he can not do as well in a business way as in Mexico.

Mr. Chairman, there is not a country on the face of the footstool that is on the so-called silver basis that has not prospered every day, while this country has been going to the dogs under the direction of these sound-money pirates; and yet we are taunted with trying to bring the country to a silver basis. Well, sir, it had better get on an honest silver basis than to be on the dishonest gold basis that it now occupies.

Mr. Chairman, I have never in my life witnessed such exhibitions of petrified cheek as have been shown us day after day in this Chamber by these sound-money people chattering about an honest currency—twitting people with being crazy cranks who believe in the money of the Constitution, who prefer honest American money to a modern pirate's gold.

What unparalleled gall it is on the part of presidents, cashiers, and directors of banks, coming here as Congressmen for the sole purpose of legislating for the interests of their banks, for their own pockets, who care for nothing else here, take no part in general legislation, who are only here when they are notified that some of their schemes may be endangered. I say, what unparalleled gall it is in these persons to call men who believe in honest silver coinage names; albeit, calling them names is the best argument, and about the only one, they have to offer.

The other day a majority of the members of what has always been held the greatest and ablest legislative body in the world, and is is held to-day, pronounced in favor of honest American dollars, and has officially notified this House of the fact. Sir, does it lie in the mouths of these advocates of this yellow thief to call the men comprising that majority cranks? Do not the men who comprise that majority compare favorably in respect to intelligence, ability, honesty, and unselfish patriotism with the minority of that body? Do they dare intimate that any one of that majority wears any other collar than his own? Is a comparison in this respect invited by the minority? Do they invite a comparison of the motives that governed each?

Mr. Chairman, one thing is demonstrated, which is that to-day the Senate of the United States, which has been looked upon as the exclusive, aristocratic branch of the Government, is at last in touch with the mass of the people, while this House appears to have cut loose from the people and got into close touch with the money changers only.

Mr. Chairman, I hope some of these sound-money schemers will tell us how it is that they hold it to be honorable and commendable in a banker to come here as a Congressman and boldly advocate and vote for the interests of his bank, while, at the same time, should a silver-mine owner come here and advocate the interests of his mine they hold it to be next to treason.

I do not know that there is a silver-mine owner in the House. We do know there are many directors of banks, who do not hesitate to advocate and at all times protect their business.

Mr. DINGLEY. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue, and had come to no resolution thereon.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege. I shall not detain the House more than a couple of minutes.

I was not in the House this morning, Mr. Speaker, when the incident occurred in which my name was used. I did not hear what the gentleman from South Carolina stated in his own behalf. I reached here barely in time to vote for the reference of the resolution which was offered, without having an opportunity even to hear it read.

The remark that I made on Wednesday night, Mr. Speaker, is variously quoted by several stenographers. These reports do not agree with each other, and the official stenographer's notes do not agree, as he tells me this afternoon, with the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in which my precise language is supposed to have been printed. I spoke rapidly and entirely extempore and in the exciting and unexpected colloquy I can not undertake to reproduce my exact words.

I am quoted in the New York Tribune of February 6 as using this language:

I am ashamed of any man who indorses secession or the motives which lay behind it.

In the Washington Post of the same date I am quoted as saying:

I am sorry for anyone who still believes in secession.

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD in these words:

I am ashamed of the fact—

That is, of such a statement as that of the gentleman from South Carolina—and ashamed of any man who would indorse secession or the motives which lead to it.

I did not hear the gentleman from South Carolina this morning when he made his statement, but find that he used these words:

But, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman from North Carolina—

Said he, referring to myself—

said in substance that he was ashamed of such action on the part of his State, I rose, possibly in an unparliamentary manner, and in the heat of the moment impulsively said that South Carolina was not ashamed of the part she took in it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I did not use, even in substance, such words as are imputed to me by the gentleman from South Carolina. My tongue, if I had tried to utter such language, would not have performed its office, because that would mean treason to my State and to my own blood. I did say and I say now, in all kindness, that I was opposed to secession. My people were opposed to it, and I am indeed sorry for any man who still believes in it or in the institution which it was designed to perpetuate.

That much is true; but to be quoted as saying that I was ashamed of the conduct of North Carolina in the war, why, I could not utter such a thought, because the truth of history is that she refused three several times to vote for secession, and finally, after there was a vast sea of secession all about her, and she was like an island, surrounded by the angry flood, and her sons had to go in and fight, she entered into the conflict; and I desire to say that my own kinsmen, on both sides of my family, went in and fought for the Confederacy, as they could not possibly have done otherwise under the circumstances. My own and my only brother was shot at Spottsylvania; my brother-in-law had his right arm torn from its socket in the battles around Richmond; my own blood cousin had his head severed from his shoulders by a cannon ball at Malvern Hill; and still another blood cousin of mine in that awful charge at Gettysburg carried his regiment nearer to the mouths of the Union rifles than any other soldiers reached on that dreadful field of carnage, and that spot is marked by an imperishable monument of granite, the farthest advance and last hope of the Confederacy.

I state with pride here in the presence of you old veteran soldiers that while my State was the last to secede she was the last to surrender, and that she left more dead soldiers on the field of battle than any other State on either side of that awful conflict.

And in justice to myself, and in justice to the memory of these heroic men, I must disclaim—I do repudiate, without meaning offense—I must deny and disavow any such sentiment as the gentleman from South Carolina has attributed to me, and I want to say now and in conclusion, thanking the House for this attention, that if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BOUTELLE] and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BARRETT] will only leave us Union-loving Republicans in North Carolina to attend to our sister State, we promise and guarantee that if South Carolina tries to start another secession, then before the gentleman from Maine can reach the scene of action with his gunboats or the gentleman from Massachusetts can arrive with his rough and ready riflemen, we North Carolina Union-loving Republicans and lovers of the flag—and I will be one of them—will rush down into the State of South Carolina and whip her back into the Union and into her senses or into the sea before these valiant and loyal gentlemen can reach the spot. [Applause.]

And now, Mr. Speaker, in the kindest spirit, and as an evidence that there is no ill feeling, I propose that celebrated and hospitable remark of the governor of North Carolina to the governor of South Carolina as a fitting closing scene to this extraordinary incident. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, I am glad the gentleman has disclaimed the remarks that have been attributed to him. I searched the RECORD, and understood him as I have stated. I am sure I do not wish to do the gentleman any injustice, and have had no desire to do so. Possibly if I had better understood the gentleman, I might not have made the remarks that I have; and I now state to the gentleman that I should be glad to accept his invitation on behalf of the governor of South Carolina, except for the fact that I never indulge, and I hope some gentleman will go and drink the liquor for me, and we will go on our way rejoicing. [Laughter.]

Under consent given, Mr. WALKER of Virginia submitted the following amendment:

Insert in line 4, page 3, after the word "silver," the following words: "Bullion which has heretofore been or may hereafter be produced from mines in the United States, and after the passage of this act there shall be imposed an ad valorem duty of 10 per cent on all foreign silver coins, silver bullion, and on all other forms of silver not dutiable under present laws."

RECESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, and that at 10.30 o'clock it take another recess until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning, these sessions to be exclusively for debate on the pending bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asks unanimous consent of the House that a recess be taken until 8 o'clock this evening, and a further recess at 10.30 until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning, these sessions to be for debate only.

Mr. DINGLEY. And further, that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole during those two sessions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] as Speaker pro tempore.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MILLER of Kansas, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. KIRKPATRICK, for ten days.

To Mr. JOY, indefinitely, on account of death in his family.

And then, in accordance with the order previously adopted, the House (at 5 o'clock and 16 minutes p. m.) took a recess until 8 o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue, with Mr. PAYNE in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, as preliminary to a discussion of the merits of the pending measure, permit me to briefly and in a condensed form call the attention of the Committee of the Whole to some matters directly appertaining to this bill, as disclosed in the record from its conception on up to its present stage.

On the 3d day of last December, the second day of this session, the President, in his annual message "To the Congress of the United States," after referring at great length to the continual depletion of the gold reserve in the Treasury and the causes therefor, uses this language:

I am convinced the only thorough and practicable remedy for our troubles is found in the retirement and cancellation of our United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, and the outstanding Treasury notes issued by the Government in payment of silver purchases under the act of 1890.

I believe this could be quite readily accomplished by the exchange of these notes for United States bonds of small as well as large denominations, bearing a low rate of interest. They should be long-term bonds, thus increasing their desirability as investments, and because their payment could be well postponed to a period far removed from present financial burdens and perplexities, when with increased prosperity and resources they would be more easily met.

To further insure the cancellation of these notes and also provide a way by which gold may be added to our currency in lieu of them, a feature in the plan should be an authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury to dispose of the bonds abroad for gold, if necessary to complete the contemplated redemption and cancellation, permitting him to use the proceeds of such bonds to take up and cancel any of the notes that may be in the Treasury or that may be received by the Government on any account.

After criticising and condemning, in a dignified manner, however, the free coinage of silver, he closes his message with the following patriotic utterances:

In conclusion, I especially entreat the people's representatives in the Congress, who are charged with the responsibility of inaugurating measures for the safety and prosperity of our common country, to promptly and effectively consider the ills of our critical financial plight. I have suggested a remedy which my judgment approves. I desire, however, to assure the Congress that I am prepared to cooperate with them in perfecting any other measure promising thorough and practical relief, and that I will gladly labor with them in every patriotic endeavor to further the interests and guard the welfare of our countrymen whom in our respective places of duty we have undertaken to serve.

After this Congress had been in session for eighteen days and no effort having been made, even so far as to appoint any of the standing committees of the House, or otherwise, to carry out the urgent suggestions of the President, referred to in his annual message, he, on the 20th day of the same month, sent a special message to Congress in which he again calls the special attention of Congress to the conditions of the Treasury and the great necessity of prompt legislation to replete and protect the gold reserve. In the concluding portion of this message he says:

The real and sensible cure for our recurring troubles can only be effected by a complete change in our financial scheme. Pending that, the executive branch of the Government will not relax its efforts nor abandon its determination to use every means within its reach to maintain before the world American credit, nor will there be any hesitation in exhibiting its confidence in the resources of our country and the constant patriotism of our people.

In view, however, of the peculiar situation now confronting us, I have ventured to herein express the earnest hope that the Congress, in default of the inauguration of a better system of finance, will not take a recess from its labors before it has, by legislative enactment or declaration, done something not only to remind those apprehensive among our own people that the resources of their Government and a scrupulous regard for honest dealing afford a sure guaranty of unquestioned safety and soundness, but to reassure the world that with these factors, and the patriotism of our citizens, and ability and determination of our nation to meet in any circumstances every obligation it incurs do not admit of question.

I ask at the hands of the Congress such prompt aid as it alone has the power to give to prevent, in a time of fear and apprehension, any sacrifice of the people's interests and the public funds or the impairment of our public credit in an effort by Executive action to relieve the dangers of the present emergency.

On the following day, the last day of the third week of the session, the Speaker of the House, after having wrestled therewith long and patiently, if not painfully, I have no doubt, announced the regular standing committees, by which we learned that the able and distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] became the leader of the majority side, and as such was expected to shape all legislation for the good of the country in general, and of the Republican party in particular, regardless, of course, of the effect it might have on the ambitions of our worthy Speaker.

Cheerfully assuming this leadership and all the accompanying responsibilities, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, on the 27th of the same month, reported the bill (H. R. 2904) now before us for consideration, in words and figures as follows:

An act to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in addition to the authority given to the Secretary of the Treasury by the act approved January 14, 1875, entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," he is authorized, from time to time, at his discretion, to issue, sell, and dispose of, at not less than par in coin, coupon or registered bonds of the United States, to an amount sufficient for the object stated in this section, bearing not to exceed 3 per cent interest per annum, payable semiannually, and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, in coin, after five years from their date, and payable in fifteen years after their date, with like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided in said act for the bonds therein authorized. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall use the proceeds thereof for the redemption of United States legal-tender notes, and for no other purpose: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify an act approved May 31, 1878, entitled "An act to forbid the further retirement of United States legal-tender notes." Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury shall offer any of the bonds authorized for sale by this act or by the resumption act of 1875, he shall advertise the same, and authorize subscriptions therefor to be made at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States.

SEC. 2. That to provide for any temporary deficiency now existing, or which may hereafter occur, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, at his discretion, to issue certificates of indebtedness of the United States to an amount not exceeding $50,000,000, payable in three years after their date to the bearer in lawful money of the United States of the denomination of $20 or multiples thereof, with annual coupons for interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum, and to sell and dispose of the same for not less than an equal amount of lawful money of the United States at the Treasury Department and at the subtreasuries and designated depositories of the United States and at such post-offices as he may select. And such certificates shall have the like qualities, privileges, and exemptions provided in said resumption act for the bonds therein authorized. And the proceeds thereof shall be used for the purpose prescribed in this section and for no other.

But two days were allowed, under a special rule, for the consideration and discussion of this most important bill, and on the 28th of the same month, under whip and spur, it was passed by this House by the following vote: Yeas 170, nays 136, not voting 49. Without taking up the time of the committee to give this vote in detail, I desire to add just here, in justice to many of the independent Republicans on the other side, that notwithstanding the whip and spur of the gentleman from Maine, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, about 50 of them refused to bow the head and voted with this side against the bill.

On the 30th of December the bill was referred to the Senate and its concurrence therein requested, and on the same day was by the Senate referred to the Republican Senate Committee on Finance.

On the 7th day of January, 1896, the Senate Committee on Finance reported a bill to the Senate with an amendment as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act the mints of the United States shall be open to the coinage of silver, and there shall be coined dollars of the weight of 412½ grains troy, of standard silver, nine-tenths fine, as provided by the act of January 18, 1837, and upon the same terms and subject to the limitations and provisions of law regulating the coinage and legal-tender quality of gold; and whenever the said coins herein provided for shall be received into the Treasury, certificates may be issued therefor in the manner now provided by law.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall coin into standard silver dollars, as soon as practicable, according to the provisions of section 1 of this act, from the silver bullion purchased under authority of the act of July 14, 1890, entitled "An act directing the purchase of silver bullion and the issue of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes," that portion of said silver bullion which represents the seigniorage or profit to the Government, to wit, the difference between the cost of the silver purchased under said act and its coinage value, and said silver dollars so coined shall be used in the payment of the current expenses of the Government; and for the purpose of making said seigniorage immediately available for use as money, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue silver certificates against it, as if it was already coined and in the Treasury.

SEC. 3. That no national-bank note shall be hereafter issued of a denomination of less than $10, and all notes of such banks now outstanding of denominations less than that sum shall be, as rapidly as practicable, taken up, redeemed, and canceled, and notes of $10 and larger denominations shall be issued in their stead under the direction of the Comptroller of the Currency.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the United States notes, commonly called "greenbacks," and also the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, when presented for redemption, in standard silver dollars or in gold coin, using for redemption of said notes either gold or silver coins, or both, not at the option of the holder, but exclusively at the option of the Treasury Department, and said notes, commonly called "greenbacks," shall be reissued, as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

This bill was considered by the Senate from day to day until the 1st day of this month, when a vote was taken on its final passage, resulting as follows—yeas 42, nays 35. Including those paired for and against the bill, the yeas were 48 and the nays 41; total, 89. Showing a clear majority of 7 for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. The following is the vote in detail:

Senators for the bill:

Allen,	Chilton,	Kyle,	Squire,
Bacon,	Clark,	Mantle,	Stewart,
Bate,	Cockrell,	Mitchell, Oreg.	Teller.
Berry,	Daniel,	Morgan,	Tillman,
Blackburn,	Dubois,	Pasco,	Turpie,
Blanchard,	George,	Peffer,	Vest,
Brown,	Gordon,	Perkins,	Voorhees,
Butler,	Hansbrough,	Pettigrew,	Walthall,
Call,	Harris,	Pritchard,	Warren,
Cameron,	Irby,	Pugh,	White,
Cannon,	Jones, Ark.	Roach,	Wilson,
Carter,	Jones, Nev.	Shoup,	Wolcott.

Senators against the bill:

Aldrich,	Frye,	Lodge,	Proctor,
Allison,	Gallinger,	McBride,	Quay,
Baker,	Gear,	McMillan,	Sewell,
Brice,	Gibson,	Martin,	Sherman,
Burrows,	Gorman,	Mills,	Smith.
Caffery,	Gray,	Mitchell, Wis.	Thurston,
Chandler,	Hale,	Morrill,	Vilas,
Cullom,	Hawley,	Murphy,	Wetmore.
Davis,	Hill,	Nelson,
Elkins,	Hoar,	Palmer,
Faulkner,	Lindsay,	Platt,

Politically they were divided as follows:

For the bill: Populists, 6; Democrats, 24; Republicans, 18; total, 48.

Against the bill: Democrats, 15; Republicans, 26; total, 41.

In this division I have classed Senators JONES and STEWART with the Populists.

The Senate is now composed of 44 Republicans, 39 Democrats, and 6 Populists (including Senators JONES and STEWART).

And here I may stop long enough to call the attention of this committee to the astonishing fact that the Senate of the United States, the representatives of the States as States, the greatest deliberative body on the face of the globe, composed of the ablest citizens of our land, in which the Republican party now have a clear plurality of 5, if not a majority, after due, careful, and able consideration, adopted a free silver coinage measure by a majority of 7.

While referring to this fact, which must not and can not be ignored during this discussion, if I were to attempt to meet sarcasm with sarcasm, or abuse with abuse, I might stop here to inquire if that great body, the United States Senate, is not a strange abiding place for so many cranks and destructionists. I might inquire if it is not a sad commentary on the intelligence and patriotism of our people that a majority of the States would select such men as I have last indicated to represent them in the Upper House of Congress.

Again, the Republican party has always been recognized as the champion of the gold standard, and yet, in this month of February, in the year of our Lord 1896, we see a Republican Senate, at its first session, almost immediately after a political revolution in favor of its party, passing a free-coinage bill. And yet Republican leaders on this floor, on the stump, and elsewhere will continue to assert that the grand old party is united upon every important question.

But, surprising as was this result in the Senate under the circumstances, it could not well be more surprising and, if I may coin a phrase, "more politically funny," than was the recent action of this House, with its more than 140 Republican plurality, when it passed a Democratic revenue tariff bill, pure and simple, under the guise and pretense of complying with the President's request as set forth in his message. To sum it all up, here we have it: After a continuous session of over two months an overwhelmingly Republican House passes a Democratic tariff bill, and a Republican Senate passes a free-coinage bill. The Senate refuses to concur with the House, and the House now refuses, or, I take it, is about to refuse, to concur with the Senate, and these two bills are the only important measures or general bills yet considered by this Republican businesslike Congress. And yet the Republican leaders will persist in saying that the great Republican party is thoroughly united on every important question and the only party capable of transacting the public business in Congress. Many Republicans, able gentlemen, during this debate have declared on this floor their belief in the efficacy of the free coinage of silver, and some of them have gone so far as to assert that a majority of the masses of their party are in accord with their views. And still the political leaders of that party will doubtless continue to insist that there are no divisions in their ranks on this great question.

On the 3d of this month the pending measure was returned by the Senate to this House and its concurrence therein requested. And on day before yesterday, the 5th instant, the bill was again reported to the House by the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, accompanied with a resolution or motion that the House refuse to concur with the Senate amendment and adhere to the original bill. The distinguished gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] has given notice that at the proper time he will move to concur in the Senate amendment. And thus is the issue presented. Those of us who favor free coinage of both metals—gold and silver—should vote to concur. Those who are opposed to free coinage of both of the precious metals should vote to nonconcur.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], in his able speech on Wednesday, to which I listened very carefully, says we should vote to nonconcur, for the reason, if for no other, that the Senate has failed and refused to give an answer responsive to the bill which the House sent to it for its consideration. In other words, if I understood him aright, we should rebuke the Senate because it virtually ignored the House bill and in lieu thereof returned to us another and entirely different measure. Upon this proposition I most respectfully, yet humbly, take issue with him. I regard the Senate bill as of the same subject-matter as the House bill, designed and intended to meet and subserve the same common purpose.

In my very limited time I can not undertake to enter into an explanation of these bills in detail. I have had them read and placed in the RECORD where all can see them. They are plain and simple, and all can understand them. The object of the first section of the House bill is to provide for the issuing of bonds—not gold bonds for the preservation of gold for redemption purposes, as requested by President Cleveland in his message, but coin bonds, to be used exclusively for the redemption of United States legal-tender notes. The second section provides for the issuance of time certificates of indebtedness, to be used for the current expenses of the Government in cases of insufficient revenue from other sources.

The first section of the Senate bill provides for the free coinage of silver at the old ratio.

The second section provides that that portion of silver bullion now in the Treasury, known as the seigniorage, shall also be coined into standard silver dollars, to be used in the payment of the current expenses of the Government.

Section 3 provides that hereafter no national-bank note shall be issued of a denomination of less than $10, etc.

Section 4 provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the United States notes commonly called "greenbacks" and those commonly called the "Sherman notes" in silver or gold at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury only, etc.

Now, I repeat, when you come to compare the two more carefully, it must be conceded that they are designed to accomplish the same purpose, but in radically different channels perhaps. Let us see if this is not true. The House bill provides for the issuing of not exceeding $50,000,000—mark you, not exceeding—of certificates of indebtedness to be used for current expenses. The Senate bill provides for the coinage of the seigniorage for the same purpose, which will provide at once for considerably more than $50,000,000.

The House bill provides for bonds for coin for redemption purposes. The Senate bill, taking sections 1 and 4 together, makes provision for the same purpose by providing for the free coinage of silver and its use for redemption purposes as well as gold. Does any member here doubt for a moment that if this policy were adopted we would have plenty of coin—gold and silver—in the Treasury for redemption purposes? If so, where is the necessity for bonds to procure the precious metal?

But of course the gentleman from Maine does not base his opposition to the Senate bill on this one ground alone, but goes on in a very able and learned manner, from his standpoint, to point out the reasons why he believes the bill would be vicious and dangerous to the country, and hence should be rejected.

Even if I could do so, it is not my desire or intention to attempt to answer him in the short time allotted me. I still believe that the weight of the argument is on the side of free silver, just as I have believed ever since I commenced to study the question some ten or twelve years ago. My views and my reasons are well known, to at least very many of the older members of this honorable body, as well as to my constituents, and even if I had the time I would not care to repeat them now, for so thoroughly and frequently has this subject been debated here, pro and con, that I do not flatter myself that I could say anything new or that my humble efforts would result in many conversions, as much as I would desire it. After having given this question all the careful study, research, and consideration that time and capacity would permit, I am a conscientious believer in the true efficacy of the free coinage of silver at the old and time-tried ratio of 16 to 1. I firmly believe it would be better for my country, which I love so well. I most sincerely believe that a great majority of the people of this country want and demand free-coinage legislation at our hands.

I want to be with and for the people. That is my idea of my stewardship here. That is my idea of true Democracy—the party to which I belong. Such, I say, are my own personal convictions, and hence I shall vote to concur in the Senate amendment. And yet, if I were not fully persuaded that such a course was the proper one there is still another and weighty reason that would induce me to vote for free coinage. I believe that it is the duty of a member of Congress to represent on this floor the will of his constituents, as near as may be, whenever that will is clearly and intelligently expressed and made known. I have the honor to represent a district in western Ohio. A people, I dare say, who are as intelligent, on an average, as those of any other district in the Union. A people about equally divided between the country and the town. A people about equally divided in agriculture, manufacturing, and mercantile pursuits. A people who have carefully and intelligently considered and debated for years the identical question now before us for action, the result of which is, I feel safe in saying, that a very large majority of them are as earnestly in favor of the free coinage of silver as is your humble speaker.

At the convention in which I was last honored with a nomination, composed of as bright a lot of men, from all parts of the district, as you will find anywhere, a free-coinage plank was adopted with scarcely a dissenting voice. For this reason, if for no other, I would vote for the Senate bill. But I cheerfully do so anyhow, for, as I said before, I believe the free coinage of silver will be best for our country, will result in better progress and prosperity, and the consequent greater happiness and content of mankind. And I still believe it will be brought about in, by, and through the great Democratic party, which has always shown itself to be the true party of all the people and especially of the common people.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GIBSON] is recognized for forty minutes.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, when this Congress met there were various governmental evils confronting us. Several of these evils related to the Treasury Department.

1. The gold in the Treasury was melting away like ice in summer time.

2. The President was selling 5 per cent bonds running ten years and 4 per cent bonds running thirty years, and had already sold over one hundred and sixty-two millions, increasing our national debt that much, in a time of perfect peace.

3. These sales were being made secretly to syndicates of bankers, some of them foreigners.

4. The proceeds of these sales were being used to pay the current expenses of Government, whereas the sales were professedly to be used exclusively to maintain the gold reserve.

5. There was a growing deficiency in the Treasury, and no method of providing against it except by the sale of long-term bonds.

What was the action of this House in providing remedies for these financial evils?

1. It provided short-term bonds in lieu of long-term bonds.

2. It provided for 3 per cent bonds in lieu of 4 and 5 per cent bonds

3. It prohibited any more secret sales of bonds to syndicates of bankers.

4. It prohibited the proceeds of bonds sold to maintain the gold reserve from being used to pay the expenses of the Government.

5. It provided for any temporary deficiency in the Treasury by authorizing the issuance of 3 per cent certificates not exceeding $50,000,000 in all.

What has been the action of the Senate in reference to these matters?

1. It has sanctioned the action of the President in selling long-term bonds.

2. It has sanctioned the action of the President in selling these bonds secretly.

3. It has sanctioned the action of the President in selling these bonds to syndicates of bankers, some of them foreigners.

4. It has sanctioned the action of the President in using the proceeds of these bond sales in paying the current expenses of the Government.

5. It has refused to authorize the issuance of 3 per cent three-year certificates to provide for any temporary deficiency.

6. It has refused to provide for any temporary deficiency of revenues.

7. It has refused to require that bonds should be sold on public notice.

8. It has refused to reduce the rate of interest on bonds to be sold.

9. In a word, the Senate has indirectly indorsed all that the President has done, indorsed his secret sales of long-term, high-interest bonds, indorsed his dealings with foreign bankers, indorsed his use of the reserve fund to pay current expenses, and, in fact, indorsed, generally, all he has done, and refused in any way to interfere, or change, or forbid. In this state of facts I am called on to make a choice between the action of this House and the action of the Senate, and I have no hesitancy in saying that, in my judgment, this House has met the emergency fairly, squarely, wisely, and patriotically, whereas the Senate refuses to meet the emergency at all, and willfully dodges the issue.

THE SENATE'S ANSWER.

This House, which represents the people in their individual capacity, says to the Senate: "The President is selling long-term bonds, and what are you going to do about it?"

And the Senate rises up solemnly and answers: "The free and unlimited coinage of silver." [Laughter.]

This House says to the Senate: "The President is selling 4 per cent bonds when we can borrow money at 3 per cent; what do you say about that?"

The Senate stands up gravely and says: "The free and unlimited coinage of silver."

This House says to the Senate: "But the President is selling these bonds secretly, and not allowing open competition; are you willing to let that go on?"

Our wise and dignified Senate rises up and answers: "The free and unlimited coinage of silver." [Laughter.]

This House says to the Senate: "The President is selling our bonds to syndicates of bankers, some of them foreigners; what do you think of that?"

Our Senate rises up and deliberately replies: "The free and unlimited coinage of silver."

This House says to the Senate of the United States, at the other end of the Capitol: "The President claims to sell these bonds to maintain the gold reserve, and yet he uses the proceeds to pay the expenses of the Government; what do you think about that?"

And the Senate of the United States rises, and, in measured tones, answers: "The free and unlimited coinage of silver." [Laughter.]

This House, representing the people, says to the Senate, representing the States: "Are you content to let Mr. Cleveland and Secretary Carlisle go on as they have been going, selling high-interest, long-term bonds secretly and to foreigners? Are you content to let the debt of this country be thus permanently increased?"

And the Senators once more reply: "The free and unlimited coinage of silver."

And thus our wise Senate has only one answer to all of our questions. Like Poe's raven, it makes but one response, and that is "more silver"—silver more.

Is there, is there balm in Gilead?
Tell me, tell me, I implore!
Quoth this raven, "Silver more!"

[Laughter.]

"Sixteen to one" seems to be the "lost Lenore" of our Senate; but I am afraid it will have no better fortune than Poe in its longing to—

Clasp that rare and radiant maiden,
Sweet "sixteen to one."

I could well afford to stop here in justification of my vote against the Senate amendment and in favor of the House bill; but as the question of gold and silver has been so generally discussed in this debate, I prefer to submit some thoughts on that issue.

SILVER AND GOLD COMPARED.

In a general way my sympathies are, and have always been, with silver as compared with gold.

Gold is the money of the rich, and silver is the money of the poor. Kings deal in gold, the money lords deal in gold, the millionaires deal in gold; but the farmer deals in silver, the mechanic deals in silver, the day laborer deals in silver, and the poor woman who slaves her life away works for silver.

Gold is the pampered slave that dances attendance upon the wealthy the world over, while silver is the faithful, humble friend that helps the poor man in his hour of need, that buys those items from the merchant that sweeten his life and brighten his home.

Gold is a king, its home is in princely palaces, and it travels none but royal roads. It despises the poor man and scorns to be found in his company. It will not notice the poor farmer's girl, however beautiful and good, but smiles upon the rich daughters of fashion and pride, however ugly and worthless.

The son of the banker, with haughty pride, exhibits his golden eagles upon the street corners where wealth and frivolity most do congregate, while the poor plowboy whistles happily to the tune of a few dimes jingling in his breeches pocket as he does his daily task. [Laughter.]

Gold is a spirit of evil that encourages crime, and sin, and folly; but silver is an angel of mercy that comforts the poor, cheers the hungry, and consoles the needy. Gold, red in color, like the fires of hell, is the metal of avarice and pride; but silver, whose tint is that of the heavens above, is the metal of humble honesty, the minister of mercy, and the currency of charity.

But gold, in spite of the glory of its trappings, in spite of its splendid armorial bearings, in spite of its glittering shield, in spite of its pomp and pageantry—in spite of all these, gold is a coward; and when the stern visage of danger confronts it, it turns tail and runs away and hides out of sight. When War beats his drum, and blows his bugle, and draws his sword, gold trembles like a sheep when a lion roars.

Silver is braver. It makes no great display, it has no lineage depicted on its shield, it is not heralded by the thrilling blast of trumpets or the plaudits of hired retainers. It is not bedizened with spectacular ornamentations, but it draws its sword upon the field of conflict, and fights with valor long after gold has left the field in ignominious flight.

SILVER BECOMING ARROGANT.

But while silver has many graces and virtues which commend it to my sympathy, and to the sympathy of mankind, yet I wish it distinctly understood that when silver throws off its garb of commonalty and assumes the character of a master and a dictator, and arrogates to itself the right of proscription, then my sympathy begins to shrink and a spirit of resistance and resentment swells forth from my heart.

I am willing to give silver the kindest possible consideration. It was the companion of my humble boyhood, and its smile cheered my youthful heart when I had the chance to look upon its face.

But in these latter years it seems to have fed on royal meat, and has grown so great and so imperious that, like Cæsar, it wants to wear a regal crown. It seems unwilling to serve our country any longer, and wants to be our ruler.

A great deal has been said about "the rights" of silver. I deny that silver has any "rights," or that gold has any "rights," or that any other metal has any "rights." All "rights" belong to the people, and the people have the right to use silver as money, and have the right to use gold as money, and have the right to disuse either; and what is more, the right to disuse both. [Applause.]

I spoke a moment ago about gold being a coward, and silver having some courage, yet I can not forget that when, in 1861, the life of my country was in danger, when money was absolutely needed to keep our armies in the field, both silver and gold turned tail and ran away, and seemed not to care whether our country lived or died.

THE MIGHTY GREENBACK.

Neither can I forget another great fact. I can not forget that when both gold and silver had run away and left our armies to starve, and our ships to rot at the wharves, I can not forget that then, in the very crisis of our fate, the mighty greenback leaped from the brain of the Republican party, like Minerva from the brain of Jove, full grown and full armed; then it was that the mighty greenback leaped into the embattled field, and drawing the sword of patriotism won that glorious victory that preserved the life of our country, and entitled itself to the praise and gratitude of patriots while the love of the Union dwells in the hearts of men. [Applause.]

But while the greenback saved our country, and while silver is the money of the poor man, I must not forget that a great nation like ours, with its great cities, its immense manufactures, its endless railroad lines, its enormous wealth, needs gold also in order to conduct its financial operations, both among ourselves and with the other great nations of the earth. Gold is indispensable in our great commercial and financial transactions, and we must retain it as one of our means of national and international exchange.

Hence, I favor all three of our great moneys—gold, silver, and greenback—"these three." We must not become silver-eyed by using silver spectacles, nor must we become gold-eyed by using golden goggles; neither must a green-eyed jealousy of both gold and silver so prejudice us against them as to make us greenbackers and fiat-money men.

We want all three sorts of money, gold, silver, and paper, just as we have had them for so many years, gold and silver representing the substance of things, and the paper representing the spirit of things, the faith of our country; and my chief complaint is that there is not enough of the substance, and an insufficient supply of the faith. [Laughter.]

TRINITY OF MONEY.

There are financial tinkers, just as there are theological tinkers. There are men who are unitarians in money and in religion, who believe in only one Person in the divine world and only one metal in the financial world. But the great mass of Christians are trinitarians in religion and trinitarians in finance; they believe that there are three persons in the Godhead, and that there are three kinds of money—gold, silver, and paper. My people are trinitarians in religion and in finance; they are satisfied both with the Bible of their fathers and the money of their fathers. The Turks, who are unitarians in religion, cry out, "There is no God but God, and Mahomet is His prophet," and the financial unitarians cry out, "There is no money but gold, and Rothschild is its prophet." And as the Turks massacre those who do not agree with them, so some of these financial Turks would destroy those who do not agree with them. And as there are some Christians who are as fanatical as the Turks, so there are silver men who are just as fanatical as the gold men, and who would brand gold as a traitor, and condemn to the political scaffold every public man who is found with a piece of gold upon his person.

And there are also fiat-money men, who regard both gold and silver as relics of barbarism, and who would banish both metals from the domain of money, and make fiat paper the exclusive currency of the nation.

I do not travel with either of these crowds. I prefer the old road. Long ago I discovered that old roads are the safest and best. I am a believer in gold, and I am a believer in silver, and I am a believer in greenbacks, and I am a believer in having a larger volume of each one and a larger amount of money to the man.

But I do not believe the free and unlimited coinage of silver would increase the amount of money, because it would drive out of circulation the six hundred millions of gold now in this country; or, in other words, it would reduce the volume of money in the United States about one-third; and it would take all the mints of the United States fifteen years to make good this loss—and what are we going to do for money these fifteen years?

But it has been said that there is no gold in this country. Ah, that can not be said any more since last Wednesday, when citizens of the United States bid over $558,000,000 in gold for the last issue of bonds.

There are always several hundred millions of dollars hoarded in our country, and the preference is always given to gold. If gold is not hoarded silver will be.

MORE MONEY AND GOOD MONEY.

While I wish a larger volume of money in circulation, I want it all to be good money. I do not want one sort of money to be worth 100 cents to the dollar, another sort to be worth 75 cents, and a third sort to be worth 50 cents; but want every dollar, whether gold, silver, or paper, to be worth 100 cents to the dollar. Whatever bears the stamp of my country I want to be as good of its kind as can be found on God's earth. [Applause.] And I do not want one sort of money for the rich, and another sort for the poor, one sort for the banker and another sort for the farmer; but I want the poor man to be paid in as good money as the country has, and I want the farmer's money to be equal to the best; and I want as many silver dollars coined and as many paper dollars printed as can be kept at par with gold.

And this I consider the true Republican doctrine. There are gold Republicans, silver Republicans, and greenback Republicans; but I am not one of any of these Republicans. I am a good-money Republican, and when the money is good I do not care, and nobody else cares, whether it be gold, silver, or paper. All we want is that the money be good and there be plenty of it; plenty of it to float the business of the country, to give fair prices for all products and fair wages for all producers and all workers.

The Republican party does not want gold alone, nor silver alone, nor paper alone; but we want all three, and all three of equal value, and each worth 100 cents to the dollar. [Applause.]

There is this peculiarity about money: good money always leaves the field of business when bad money comes in. The moment a silver dollar becomes of less value than a gold dollar, that moment gold retires and ceases to circulate as money. And the moment paper money becomes of less value than gold and silver, that moment both gold and silver disappear from circulation, and paper becomes the only money in common use among the people.

This rule was illustrated during the war. Both gold and silver disappeared as money as soon as greenbacks became worth less than either, and they never came back into circulation again until a greenback became worth its face in gold and silver.

But it is said that the silver dollar has not been fairly treated. This statement I deny, and I desire to submit some facts in support of my denial. In the first place, I call attention to the great and undisputed fact that before the war a United States silver dollar was a curiosity. I was born in 1837, and have no recollection of having ever seen a United States silver dollar before the war. There were Mexican dollars, French dollars, Peruvian dollars, and some other foreign silver dollars in circulation, but a United States silver dollar before the war was a curiosity, and to-day a United States silver dollar coined before the war is never seen. I doubt whether there is a man in this House who has ever seen a United States silver dollar that was coined before 1861. [Applause.]

ACT OF 1873.

How is it to-day? The land is full of United States silver dollars. There have been coined since the war 423,000,000 silver dollars, while in all the years before the war there were coined only 8,000,000 silver dollars. More than fifty times as many silver dollars coined since 1873 as were coined in all the eighty years before 1873, and yet we are told that silver has been demonetized, has been illtreated, has been degraded. Our ears have been deafened by outcries and denunciations against what is called the "crime of 1873." It is claimed that the bill was passed secretly, and that JOHN SHERMAN is guilty of it, when the facts are the bill was pending in Congress for several years, the debates on it in the Senate cover 78 columns of the Congressional Globe, and the discussions on it in the House fill 66 columns of the same journal, while that "arch conspirator," JOHN SHERMAN, actually voted against it, and that great free-silver champion, Senator STEWART of Nevada, voted for it. [Laughter.] I envy neither the intelligence nor the honesty of the public man who howls himself hoarse in denunciation of the "crime of 1873," when I consider that all the "crime" there is exists in his diseased im gination or in his unfair intention. Neither do I respect the patriotism of that public man who broadly charges that the hundreds of statesmen, Republicans and Democrats, who voted for, or failed to vote against, the bill of 1873 were bribed, or were traitors. [Applause.]

The honest God's truth is that in 1873 there was no silver at all in circulation, and no probability that there would be any in the then near future; and it was not then expected that silver dollars would ever again be in demand as money, except for trade with China; and to suit this trade the trade dollar was authorized. Before the war gold was the main metal money of the country, and we had almost ceased to coin silver dollars, as this table shows:

Silver dollars coined from 1839 to 1862.

Year.	Dollars.	Year.	Dollars.	Year.	Dollars.
1839	300	1847	140,750	1855	26,000
1840	61,005	1848	15,000	1856	63,500
1841	173,000	1849	62,600	1857	94,000
1842	184,618	1850	47,500	1858	None.
1843	165,100	1851	1,300	1859	636,500
1844	20,000	1852	1,100	1860	733,930
1845	24,500	1853	46,110	1861	78,500
1846	169,000	1854	33,140	1862	12,090

From 1806 to 1836, a period of thirty years, not a single silver dollar was coined in the United States. In 1837, 1838, and 1839 not a silver dollar was coined, and in 1836 only 1,000 were coined. And what is more, it is well known that nearly all the silver dollars that were coined between 1793 and 1862 were melted by silversmiths to make silverware and silver merchandise.

There was no "conspiracy" against silver in 1873, and no "crime" against the people. The act of 1873 was fully, honestly, and patriotically considered, and the men who voted for it were not prompted by greed nor bought by gold.

HISTORY OF THE ACT OF 1873.

Here is a true history of the bill of 1873:

The bill was prepared in 1870 by Mr. Boutwell, then Secretary of the Treasury, and his colleagues, and was printed and sent to experts on coinage in all parts of the civilized world. The bill, with Deputy Comptroller Knox's report thereon, was printed in the Bankers' Magazine for July, 1870. The bill was sent to Senator SHERMAN, of the Senate Finance Committee, in April, 1870. It was then printed again and many thousands of copies were sent to bankers, capitalists, and whoever asked for it. In December, 1870, it was reported unanimously for passage by the Senate Finance Committee. This committee consisted of SHERMAN, Williams of Oregon, Cattell, MORRILL, Warner, Fenton, and Bayard. You will notice this committee had the bill under discussion about eight months. January 10, 1871, the bill was passed by the Senate by a vote of 36 for to 14 against.

Among those voting for the bill were the six Senators from the Pacific Coast, and among them was STEWART of Nevada. SHERMAN voted against the bill because it provided for the coinage by the mints of gold without charge or seigniorage. The bill then went to the House, and January 13, 1871, was ordered printed. February 25, 1871, the bill was reported back by the House Committee on Coinage with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, when it was again printed and recommitted to the Committee on Coinage. March 9, 1871, W. D. Kelley reintroduced the bill, when it was again printed and referred to the Committee on Coinage. January 6, 1872, the bill was reported for passage. The bill was read in full and debated at length by Kelley, Potter, Garfield, Maynard, Dawes, Holman, and others. January 10, 1872, the bill was recommitted to the Committee on Coinage, and February 9, 1872, was again reported by the committee and was again ordered to be reprinted, and was recommitted to the committee. February 13, 1872, it was again reported for passage, was again printed, and was made a special order for March 12, 1872.

On April 9, 1872, the bill was debated by Hooper and others, and Mr. Hooper's speech alone filled 10 columns of the Congressional Globe. Mr. Stoughton's speech on the bill fills 7 columns of the Globe. On May 27, 1872, the bill was again called up and was amended and passed by a vote of 110 to 13. The bill was then sent to the Senate, was ordered printed, and was referred to the Finance Committee. On December 16, 1872, the bill was again before the Senate, and after debate was again ordered to be printed in full, with all the amendments. On January 7, 1873, the bill was again reported with further amendments, and again was ordered printed. On January 17, 1873, it was passed after a debate which fills 19 columns of the Congressional Globe. The bill then went to the House, was printed on January 21, 1873, and, as is the rule, went to a committee of conference, which consisted of Hooper, Stoughton, and McNeeley, of the House, and SHERMAN, Scott, and Bayard, of the Senate. The report of this conference committee was agreed to by both Houses, and the bill became a law on February 12, 1873. It is thus seen that the bill was debated during five sessions of Congress.

But Congress soon afterwards authorized the coinage of silver dollars, and since 1873 423,000,000 silver dollars have been coined, fifty times more than were coined before 1873.

I have already given a table of the coinage of silver dollars before the war. I have shown that only 8,000,000 silver dollars were coined between 1793 and 1873, a period of eighty years, an average of only $100,000 a year, whereas in the twenty-three years between 1873 and 1895, including both, there were coined 423,000,000 of standard silver dollars, and 36,000,000 of trade silver dollar, in all 459,000,000, or an average of nearly 20,000,000 a year! In other words, since 1873—when they say the silver dollar was demonetized and disgraced—since 1873, a period of twenty-three years, fifty-seven times more silver dollars were coined than were coined in all the eighty years from 1793 to 1873. Indeed, in the one year 1890, we coined over 38,000,000 silver dollars, more than four times as many as were coined in all the eighty years prior to the so-called "crime of 1873." And yet we are told that the silver dollar of our fathers has been "demonetized" and degraded, and most unfairly treated!

Let me give the coinage of silver dollars since 1873, so that it may be compared with the coinage before 1873:

Silver dollars coined from 1873 to 1895.

Year.	Trade dollars.	Standard dollars.
1873	1,222,000	----------
1874	4,910,000	----------
1875	6,279,600	----------
1876	6,192,150	----------
1877	13,092,710	----------
1878	4,259,900	22,495,550
1879	----------	27,580,100
1880	----------	27,397,355
1881	----------	27,927,975
1882	----------	27,574,100
1883	----------	28,470,039
1884	----------	28,136,875
1885	----------	28,697,767
1886	----------	31,423,886
1887	----------	33,611,710
1888	----------	31,990,833
1889	----------	34,651,811
1890	----------	38,043,004
1891	----------	23,562,735
1892	----------	6,323,245
1893	----------	1,455,792
1894	----------	3,093,972
1895	----------	862,470

Now, let any honest man compare this table of silver dollars coined since and during 1873 with the table I have just given of silver dollars coined before 1873 and tell me wherein has the silver dollar been unfairly treated since 1873. Eight millions coined in eighty years before 1873 and 459,000,000 coined in the twenty-three years since 1873—an average of 100,000 silver dollars coined each year before the war, and an average of nearly 20,000,000 a year coined since 1873. And yet there are men who want to make the people believe that there were more silver dollars before the war than there are now!

DEMOCRATIC SUCCESS BROUGHT RUIN.

The great cause of our financial troubles has been loss of confidence in the business capacity of our Government. In 1890 this country was wonderfully prosperous. But prosperity is hard to bear. When men are prosperous they become reckless and are inclined to try experiments.

In 1890 we were prosperous. But we wanted to be more prosperous. Quacks in medicine always guarantee a cure, even when they are sure to kill; and men who have everything to lose and nothing to gain are always prodigal in promises; they are trees that bear a profusion of flowers, but little or no fruit.

The Democratic party was then out of power, and it promised the people that if it was put in power the country would become far more prosperous than it then was. The Democratic politicians told the farmers that if their party was put in power wheat would bring $1 a bushel, and every laboring man would get work at high wages, and all store goods would be so cheap and money so plentiful that everybody would have a sufficiency of all the necessaries and most of the luxuries of human life.

Many a farmer believed this singsong, many a laboring man was beguiled by this sophistry, many a merchant lent a willing ear. And what was the result? The Democratic party elected an overwhelming majority of the members of this House. And what then happened? The business world took a scare. The Democratic party stood for free trade and free silver, and the manufacturing establishments of the United States began to stay their wheels, and the men who had been lending money began to call in their loans, and Europe began to send back to us hundreds of millions of our bonds, and in a short time over 2,000,000 laboring men were out of work, the courts were full of lawsuits, men's estates were sold at a sacrifice, money could not be borrowed, property could not be sold, farms were bought at sheriffs' sales for one-tenth of their value, rich men were made paupers, and no one prospered but lawyers, sheriffs, constables, and court clerks, and a financial panic struck us like a cyclone and in a day broke down a hundred banks, pauperized thousands of men believed to be rich, reduced millions to beggary, and forced tens of thousands to commit crime in order to live.

And, Mr. Speaker, we will not have a full return to prosperity until we get rid of the Democratic party and its twin heresies, free trade and free silver.

DEMAND FOR SILVER EXAGGERATED.

I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that there is not the demand among the people for silver that a great many of the advocates of the free and unlimited coinage of silver insist there is. In support of my position I call attention to the fact that since 1873 there have been coined 423,000,000 standard silver dollars, and of these 423,000,000 silver dollars 353,000,000 remain to-day in the Treasury of the United States, with only 70,000,000 outstanding. Someone says, "Why does not the Government issue these 353,000,000 silver dollars that are in the Treasury?" That is a question that I want to answer, for I find there is a great deal of misapprehension on this point.

The 353,000,000 silver dollars in the Treasury are represented by silver certificates. I have one in my hand. I am rich enough to own one. How does it read?

This certifies that there has been deposited in the Treasury of the United States 1 silver dollar payable to the bearer on demand.

One silver dollar, deposited in the Treasury of the United States, payable to the bearer on demand! I own that silver dollar on deposit in the Treasury of the United States, and the Secretary of the Treasury would perpetrate a felonious breach of trust if he were to issue that silver dollar to any other person; and so with all of these other 353,000,000 in the Treasury represented by silver certificates. They are held by the people. Look at the money in your pockets and you will find most of it to consist of these very silver certificates. These 353,000,000 of silver dollars belong to the men who hold the $353,000,000 of silver certificates. The Treasurer of the United States just holds them on deposit subject to the order of the people who have the certificates. There is one silver dollar in the United States Treasury that belongs to me by virtue of the certificate I have just read. And yet there are thousands of so-called silver men crying out, "Why does not Mr. Carlisle pay out the silver dollars in the Treasury?" A very large part of this talk about silver is based on ignorance or willful misrepresentation.

SECRET OF THE SILVER AGITATION.

Now, if the people want silver, why are 353,000,000 of these certificates outstanding and only 70,000,000 of silver dollars in circulation? There would be no better method of stopping this outcry in favor of silver dollars than to call in every one of the silver certificates and issue all of these 353,000,000 silver dollars, and make the champions of free silver pack 10, 20, or 50 silver dollars in their pockets day after day and from morning to night.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the secret of this silver agitation? The secret of this agitation is that the silver-mine owners of the Rocky Mountains want to get a big price for their silver. If it is not profitable for them to mine silver, why are they mining silver to-day? Why are they taking out millions upon millions of silver, if it is not a profitable business? It is a profitable business. They are becoming millionaires; and yet, not satisfied with getting an honest payment for their labor, like the farmers, the merchants, and the artisans, they want to be paid two prices for their labor. They want the Government of the United States to pay them 100 cents for every 50 cents' worth of silver they mine.

I will join hands with the silver miners on this subject, and with all the champions of free silver, if the same Government that pays 100 cents for 50 cents' worth of silver will buy 50 cents' worth of wheat and pay 100 cents for it, or buy 50 cents' worth of corn and pay 100 cents for it, or buy 50 cents' worth of coal or 50 cents' worth of iron and pay my constituents 100 cents for it, and 100 cents for every 50 cents' worth of property my people carry to the markets of the country. And I believe it is just as unreasonable for these silver men to expect the Government of the United States to take 50 cents' worth of their silver bullion and coin it into a 100-cent dollar, as it would be to take 50 cents' worth of wheat to a Government mill and insist upon it being ground into 100 cents' worth of flour. What magic is there in silver that it should stand up and say, "I have more rights than any other product of human toil upon the American continent?" I want my people of east Tennessee to have as many rights as the silver miners of Colorado, Nevada, or Idaho, and if these miners are to be paid by the Government a double price for their products, I want the same Government to pay my people a double price for the products of their labor.

THE GENERAL SITUATION.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the general situation? Here are all the great nations of the earth occupying the same position that we do on this silver question. They float just as much silver as they can keep at par with gold, and no more. They are the great civilized countries of the earth. I will enumerate them: England, France, Germany, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, Norway, Sweden, Austria, and Holland. They are old nations. Their financiers are the great-grandsons of financial forefathers, who have been in the money business for hundreds of years, whereas we are mere boys in finance, and for our country to set itself up to lead the whole financial world is nothing more nor less than a piece of Yankee impudence, and an exhibition of free-silver assumption and ignorance. That is all it is.

To ignore the example of other great nations is not wise; it is not common sense; it does not meet the exigency of the occasion, and it only tends to make us ridiculous in the eyes of the financial world. The business of a great country must be transacted on the soundest business principles, and can be transacted upon no other. I want to see my country stand in the forefront of the great nations of the earth, holding aloft its glorious banner, bearing no such words as "Gold first and silver afterwards"; but, as Daniel Webster said upon a great occasion, bearing upon all its ample folds as they float over the sea and over the land and in every wind under the whole heavens, these other words dear to every true American heart, "Gold and silver, now and forever, one and inseparable." [Applause.]

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. Speaker, it is manifest that a crisis in our national financial policy is fast approaching. There have been two startling epochs in recent financial history—1873 and 1893. The former was brought about by legislative stealth, assisted by executive inattention; and the latter was brought about by executive coercion, assisted by legislative subserviency. The legislation that made both of these epochs notorious never received the assent of the American people. The act of 1873 met with sharp repudiation in 1878 by the passage, over the veto of the President, of the Bland bill and the Matthews resolution. Need I comment on the act of 1893? That it was repudiated admits of an ocular demonstration in the political constitution of this Chamber. I forbear comment, out of a spirit of obituary kindness to the illustrious deceased. [Laughter.] I contemplate the exodus that went out of this Chamber on the dissolution of the Fifty-third Congress, not in the spirit of bimetallic revenge, but rather in philosophic sorrow; for hereafter no man will ever attempt to disentomb a "cuckoo." He belongs to the fossiliferous strata of American political geology, and his bones, in the distant future, will excite scientific curiosity as anatomical evidence of an extinct species. [Laughter and applause.]

It is, therefore, historical that the legislation of both periods, 1873 and 1893, have been followed by pronounced signs of the national displeasure. But, Mr. Speaker, it is an old story—old as history and coeval with human cupidity—that the creditor, having won an unfair advantage over the debtor, will not be dislodged without a bitter fight. Hence the battle of the standards has been raging in this country for twenty-five years. At times the people have been victorious. At times they have been betrayed and overreached. They were betrayed in 1873. They were partially victorious in 1878. They fancied they were victorious in 1890, but they were robbed of the fruits of that victory by the artful construction of the act of that year by the fiscal authorities of the nation; and they were disastrously overreached in 1893.

Now, this is true, Mr. Speaker: Either the nation will resort to the pure, unmixed, gold standard, or it will readopt the bimetallic system in force in this country from 1792 to 1873. If the gold standard, as is stoutly maintained by the partisans of gold, will advance not retard the public prosperity, accelerate not clog the wheels of industry, kindle not extinguish the furnace fires, appreciate not depreciate all values, do exact justice to the creditor, not despoil the debtor, overcome deficiencies by providing ample revenues, then the sooner we adopt it the better. It is fatal to misinterpret the situation. The advocates of the gold standard have organized a campaign. They propose to commit the country to the gold dollar as the sole unit of value. They boldly declare their purpose to drive out of public life and to strip of public honors every man who does not subscribe to the gold dollar as the only sound money, who does not wholly adore the gold standard, and who does not detest, or at least profess to detest, silver as a money metal.

Do I overstate their position? Why, Mr. Speaker, there are three successive steps in this projected revolution. First, the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law; second, the retirement and the cancellation of the Sherman notes and the greenbacks, amounting to $500,000,000; third, the withdrawal of the silver certificates and the sale of our standard silver dollars as so much bullion. The first step has been taken. The purchasing clause of the Sherman law was unconditionally repealed by the Fifty-third Congress, and during the progress of the discussion upon that measure its advocates, professing to speak for those in authority, pledged themselves to follow the repeal by legislation friendly to silver. Was that pledge kept? Let the corpse of the seigniorage bill, stricken down by the veto, speak. Why, sir, there are some gentlemen belonging to this House who remember the clamor that was raised against the purchasing clause of the Sherman law in the hot months of 1893. I have been exploring that catacomb of dead eloquence called the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for choice specimens of denunciation. I found them in extinct abundance, if I may so speak.

Why, Mr. Speaker, they made this Chamber resound with their war whoop against the purchasing clause of the Sherman law. They reviled it as the capital vice in our financial system and boldly predicted that if it was torn up by the roots the export of gold would instantly cease, the import of gold would instantly commence, the Treasury would overflow with gold, and the American people would revel in the sunshine of unexampled prosperity. I will not stop to consider whether these golden dreams have been realized. The repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law instead of arresting simply stimulated the exports of gold, for we have purchased $262,000,000 of gold since that time, and we are destined, in my judgment, to purchase hundreds of millions more before the gold standard is finally accepted by the American people. [Applause.]

But, however this may be, it is safe to affirm that the effect of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law did not answer the sanguine expectations of its authors. If it had been told the Democratic Representatives in 1893, who, yielding to Executive persuasion, violated their pledges to their constituents and voted to strike down silver a second time in our history, that in 1895 President Cleveland would demand the retirement and cancellation of the Sherman notes and the legal tenders and the substitution of bank paper convertible into gold alone, they would have refused credence to the statement. But the question is here, is it not?

Why, sir, the President, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Comptroller of the Currency, with a united voice, demand it. But, by the way, Mr. Speaker, the financial genius of the Administration seems to be concentrated in the Department of Agriculture, and when its great Secretary hurls his pastoral thunderbolts against silver, mighty Jupiter himself is amazed at the exact mimicry. [Laughter.] And when he is reenforced by the Comptroller of the Currency, whose big guns shake the financial hemisphere to its foundation, things look very blue for the poor silver men. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, if it would not be imputed to me as an act of malevolence, I would venture to admonish the Comptroller of a principle in gunnery, namely, that guns of the very largest caliber can be fired only a limited number of times until they become breech burnt, and therefore more dangerous to the artilleryman than to the enemy. [Laughter.] But the greenbacks and the Sherman notes are marked for destruction by the advocates of gold, and the Administration is ready to put the brand of Cain upon them.

Why, sir, we hear constantly from administrative forces about the "endless chain." Well, I do not know who invented this metaphor or simile; but if there is an "endless chain" who forged it? It was forged by a gold-standard blacksmith upon a gold-standard anvil; and the first blow was struck when the Government of the United States surrendered its option to pay its debts in standard gold and silver coin and accepted the intolerable burden of paying them in gold coin alone.

But what is the contention of the gold advocates with respect to the Sherman notes and the legal tenders? Why, it is that they are a perpetual menace to our financial solvency and that the Government of the United States, backed up by the wealth of the wealthiest people in the world, is incapable of maintaining the convertibility of $500,000,000 of paper money into gold coin if it be obliged to reissue the notes thus converted. I entirely agree with them in this contention. Why? Because the foreign indebtedness of the United States is enormous. It is estimated on good authority that $4,000,000,000 of our railway securities are held abroad. All forms of American securities are afloat across the waters. It is difficult to estimate with accuracy the amount of our foreign indebtedness; but it is safe to affirm that it would take every dollar of gold in the world to pay it. When there is a pinch in European affairs (and pinches are fatally frequent under gold monometallism) these securities are thrown back upon the American market, converted into greenbacks and Sherman notes, and the Treasury reserve is raided.

Why, Mr. Speaker, to maintain gold payments with respect to this foreign indebtedness would bankrupt even the United States of America. And the contention of the gold advocates, that if gold payments are to be maintained the Sherman notes and the legal tenders must go, is entirely tenable. But when they are retired, what kind of a circulating medium is to be supplied to the people in their place? The gold advocate is equal to the emergency. His resources never fall below the danger line; and we are now to be treated to the extraordinary novelty of an impending glut in gold! The production of gold, it is claimed, within the next four or five years is to be prodigious; and the wildest dreams of the followers of Cortez and Pizarro are to be more than realized by the output of gold. We are told that the transsiberian railroad is to open up virgin gold fields that will surpass the fields of Australia and California in the palmy days of 1849. With respect to the Transvaal they condescend to give us exact information. They tell us that those regions will within the next ten or fifteen years enrich the gold stock of the world to the tune of $5,000,000,000. Australia, too, is to overexert herself and possibly require the Cæsarian operation in the delivery of her overgrown gold progeny.

But the freshest novelty I have noticed in the gold-standard literature is the reservoir of gold owned by the King of Ashantee. It seems that this monarch has recently fallen a victim to a fresh outbreak of the colonial appetite of Great Britain. The Incas of Peru in their proudest days were bankrupts by the side of the King of Ashantee. He holds court seated in a solid gold chair worth $160,000. He has inherited from his ancestors and extorted from his subjects gold dust and nuggets to the amount of $500,000,000. Every one of his 3,333 wives adorns her sockless ankles with a solid bracelet of gold; and we free-silver cranks are expected to believe that that barbaric, polygamous gold-bug potentate in the wilds of Africa has actually more gold in his possession and under his control than is held in the Bank of England and the Treasury of the United States combined. Why, sir, the ex-Queen of Hawaii ought to join this African monarch's colony of wives, and thus relieve Mr. Blount of Georgia of "paramount" solicitude for her queenly welfare. [Laughter.] Or the present Administration might organize itself into a matrimonial bureau, and thus extricate its foreign policy from serious embarrassment.

The late flurry upon Wall street caused by the patriotic deliverance of the President upon the Monroe doctrine was mitigated by some very touching information. We were told in reputable newspapers that Russia, out of her recent accumulation of $800,000,000 of gold, had generously tendered the United States the use of $400,000,000, and with that moiety of Russia's hoard our Treasury reserve would be impregnable to assault and a tonic administered to Wall street. Now, the extravagance of that statement will become evident when it is known that Russia's accumulation of gold has been chiefly since 1890, and from that year down to 1895 the excess of her imports over her exports of gold has been less than $150,000,000. No nation in the world, Mr. Speaker, owns $800,000,000 of gold. Great Britain, whose accumulation of gold goes back before the days of Julius Cæsar, can not boast of any sum like it. Besides, the sudden transfer of $400,000,000 of gold from Europe to the United States would cause a financial crash from Moscow to Lisbon. I congratulate the advocates of the gold standard on the opulence of their exaggeration, while I lament their penury of economical facts.

The hard, cold, naked truth is that, notwithstanding the mad search for gold in all parts of the world, less than one hundred millions have been added to the coined gold of the world in 1885. There is only one safe way to solve the financial problem, to abolish the "endless chain," to replenish our Treasury resources in coin beyond the possibility of depletion, to retain the Sherman notes and the greenbacks; and that is to return to and employ the common resources of the precious metals as the basis of our monetary system. Give the country protection upon Republican lines, together with bimetallism, and our former state of prosperity will return. [Applause.]

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, in common with every other member on this floor I feel that this debate is practically, as was said in the Senate, but a dress parade, and that nothing that is said during the discussion of this bill will either change the sentiment or the vote of any member of this House. The extended discussion and consideration which has been given to this question of the free and unlimited coinage of silver, not only here and in the Senate, but upon party platforms, by the press of the country, and between individuals, have crystallized, in the minds of every member of this body, ideas and theories which no statement of facts, no array of figures, no argument, however logical, and no consideration of enlightened public policy can modify at this time. Therefore it is that I, for one, would have been ready and willing to have had the vote of this House taken upon the question of concurring on the Senate substitute immediately upon its presentation and without debate. But recognizing the necessity which some of the gentlemen upon this floor feel that they should record not only their vote but their voices in behalf of or against the measure under consideration, we have agreed to have a grand dress parade and review.

Feeling that the views of my constituents in the district which I have the honor to represent and my own are so entirely in accord upon this question of the free coinage of silver, I have felt loath to avail myself of even the short time allotted to me in this debate for any expression of my personal views, and I would probably have been willing to yield my time to some other member who, more than myself, should feel the need of justifying to his constituents the vote which he shall hereafter cast.

But, sir, as a Representative of a district in the same State as that from which my colleague [Mr. McCLURE] is accredited, I feel it my duty to say to this House and to the country that the words he has just spoken, however interesting and eloquent they may have been, do not represent the sentiment of the great State of Ohio upon this question. He and I had the honor in the last Republican State convention to be members of the committee on resolutions which drafted the platform for the Republican party of that State. Out of 21 representatives of the different Congressional districts upon that committee he stood alone in advocating a declaration in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver. Had such a proposition been submitted to the convention it would have been voted down by a practically unanimous vote. But, on the contrary, the platform that was adopted was a reaffirmation upon this subject of the doctrine promulgated in the national platform and, if I remember right, in the very language contained in the latter. We placed ourselves squarely on record as favoring the use of both gold and silver as standard money, the parity of the two to be maintained either by international agreement or by such regulations as would make the purchasing power of every dollar of every kind of money issued by the Government equal to that of every other dollar.

On this issue and the great issue of protection we went before the people of our State and rolled up the enormous plurality of 95,000 for the Republican State ticket and elected a legislature overwhelmingly Republican in both its branches. Had the Republican party of Ohio indorsed the free and unlimited coinage of silver we should have gone down in ignominious defeat. We should have returned to the Senate of the United States the Democratic representative who now occupies its seat in that body, instead of that grand Republican, J. B. Foraker, and we should have relegated to political oblivion the great protection leader, William McKinley, whom we hope at no far distant day to place in the chair of the Chief Executive of the nation. The advocate of free silver coinage in the Republican party of Ohio are in numbers so inconsiderable, in influence so insignificant, that if we were to apply to them principles of the infinitesimal calculus they might, as compared with the overwhelming numbers who are opposed to this fallacy, be utterly ignored.

These few remarks upon the position of the great State which I have in part the honor to represent I feel it proper and expedient to make, lest the sentiments of my colleague, who stands alone among the Republican Representatives of Ohio, and in whose views even one of the two Democratic members from that State [Mr. SORG] does not coincide, should by my silence appear to represent, in any degree, the views of the citizens of that State. Thus it is that in this dress parade, when the lines are formed and the roll call of the members of this House and the States which they represent shall be made we of Ohio do not wish to be found among those who were reported as absent and unaccounted for.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I hope I may be permitted to discuss for a few moments some of the features of the measure upon which, when this debate closes, we shall be called upon to vote. As an individual I am opposed to going in debt. It has been my endeavor throughout life to live within my income, and at the end of each year to feel that I have bettered my financial position and am more fully prepared to meet the disasters and misfortunes which are liable to come to any of us through the unforeseen adversities of life. Were I a man in mercantile business I should endeavor to carry out this principle, and my bills-payable account would be the smallest of all upon my ledger. The greatest curse which has fallen upon the business interests of our country, and which unfortunately has affected the nation as well as the individual, is that of attempting to transact business upon borrowed capital. There has grown up a wild spirit of speculation, a desire to make immense fortunes in short periods of time, a species of gambling mania which has taken hold of the mercantile community of this country; a desire to do business upon credit instead of cash, which has wrecked thousands of business enterprises, and which will wipe off of the face of the earth thousands more before the universal liquidation, which must come some time, shall have taken place. The individual who lives beyond his salary is ever upon the verge of dishonesty and dishonor. The business concern whose expenses exceed its income, and whose deficits of receipts are made good by the borrowing of money, must ultimately go into the hands of receivers or assignees and close up its doors.

The principles which apply to individuals apply equally to a government. The confidence in the great international standing of the nation, its ability to transact its affairs and to continue in existence, are founded upon the same necessities of economy in the matter of expenses and of certainty and sufficiency in the matter of its income as in the case of the individual. It is true that disasters and great emergencies come to nations as misfortune comes to individuals; sickness and death may cut off the earning capacity of the individual; destruction by fire and flood, and the failure of debtors to pay their just debts may harass and embarrass the business concern, and war and pestilence may devastate and eat up the resources of a nation; but in the absence of these unusual and unforeseen circumstances the principles which lead to success or misfortune apply equally to the individual, the business enterprise, or a nation.

One of these unforeseen calamities came upon this nation in the great civil war, and entailed upon us a loss in men and money stupendous beyond conception. To carry the vast weight of indebtedness which resulted, we went into the money markets of the world, borrowed the money to meet our debts, and gave the promissory notes of the Government in the shape of national bonds for the repayment of these loans. Year by year as these notes came due, this Government, like an honest business man under the same circumstances, has redeemed them, from its surplus revenue, until between the 31st of August, 1865, when the national debt reached its highest point, and the 1st of March, 1893, it had been reduced from $2,381,530,294.96 to $963,281,752.63, or a reduction of $1,881,367,873.93. This enormous amount was paid out of the surplus which had been provided by Republican legislation. But when misfortune came upon us in the shape of Democratic control, and the policy which had provided a revenue sufficient to pay our running expenses and wipe out each year a portion of our bonded debt gave place to the free-trade heresy, which, while it crippled American industries, reduced the production of wealth, threw out of employment American labor, cut down the wages of American workmen, and sent vast sums of money into foreign countries to purchase productions which American enterprise had heretofore furnished to American consumers, at the same time so cut down the income of the Government that it not only ceased to pay its running expenses but has had in time of peace to do that which was only justifiable in time of war—borrow money and issue its notes.

The effect upon the nation's credit, like that upon the credit of the individual, was to impair confidence in its ability to meet its obligations, and just as in the case of a bank whose insolvency is suspected, a run commenced upon the Treasury of the Government; the money which passes current in this country alone was made use of as the instrument to draw from the Treasury that money which has become the standard of value through the world, and the drain began upon the gold reserve, which, from June, 1878, when the resumption act went into effect, until the accession of Mr. Cleveland to the Presidency in March, 1893, had easily been maintained at more than $100,000,000, and during a part of that time had accumulated to more than double that amount.

Had a protective tariff been in force no such run would have probably occurred; but even if it had, a slight modification of the law by which the tariff upon goods imported from gold-standard countries were required to be paid in gold would have kept the reserve intact. With no such revenue, however, there was but one thing for the Government to have recourse to in order to maintain its credit and keep up the gold reserve for the redemption of the Treasury notes. And so it came about that bonds have been sold, including the issue about to be made, of over $262,000,000 within the last two years. An effort was made by the Republicans of the Fifty-third Congress to modify the existing law as to the issue of bonds to replenish the gold reserve, and to provide an emergency revenue similar to the provisions of the act which we have under consideration; but the Democratic House and the Democratic President, blind to the defects of the Wilson bill and determined to place the country in the list of single gold-standard nations by demanding the authority to issue a distinctive gold bond, refused to accept the offer made by the Republican minority.

Relying upon the income tax to furnish $40,000,000, which the Wilson bill otherwise fell short of providing for the necessary expenses of the Government, they stubbornly refused to admit that a deficiency existed, and by distortion of figures attempted to delude and deceive the nation into the belief that the sources of all our troubles were the greenbacks and Treasury notes for which the gold could be withdrawn upon demand, and that the only remedy was their cancellation and retirement, or if not their cancellation, at least their suspension in the Treasury for an unlimited time, until the drain of gold should cease. The fallacy of this position is apparent at once if we stop to consider that it is the theory and avowed policy of the Government in both its executive and legislative branches under existing law to preserve and maintain the parity, not only of the metallic coins which are the standard measure of value, but of the various paper representatives of these coins which have been issued by the Government. Not a dollar of money goes out of the Treasury of the United States except for the payment of an indebtedness due from the Government, directly or indirectly, to the individual who draws the money. It is paid out as salaries or wages or for the purchase of things necessary for the performance of governmental function, and every dollar drawn is the representative of value received by the Government.

If the greenbacks were all retired, yet these expenses of the Government would still have to be paid, either in gold or silver or the representatives of these metals; and upon the theory of the equality and interchangeability of these coins the Government would be bound to exchange one for the other, and refusal to do so would immediately destroy the parity and put a premium upon the one which the Government refused to furnish. When the Government has stamped upon a piece of silver its edict that it shall pass current as one dollar and has stamped upon a piece of gold a similar declaration, it is bound to preserve the interchange of both these metals at their face values, so far as its own dealings are concerned, or else it disparages and depreciates the one to which it refuses to extend equal favors with the other. I can not, therefore, see that the greenback and Treasury note should be held responsible as the cause and means of depleting the gold reserve, except that from their more convenient forms in the larger denominations they can be more quickly handled and more easily transported; at any rate there can be little doubt that the contraction of the currency which would result from their redemption and the substitution of bonds in their place, which could not circulate as money, would be disastrous to the business interests of the country, even if we leave out of account the burden of interest which would be added by the substitution of the bond for the noninterest-bearing greenbacks and Treasury notes.

The bond bill which we sent to the Senate to meet the emergency which confronted us at the opening of this session of a still further depletion of the reserve and the disastrous effects which it was feared would follow the President's message on Venezuela were understood by the Republicans of this House and adopted by them as emergency measures only. They were not intended to represent the policy of that party as to the manner of providing for the payment of current expenses and the reduction of existing indebtedness. They did not yield one jot or tittle of their belief that the income of the Government, earned, not borrowed, should be sufficient to pay its expenses; but by sad experience of the obstinacy of the Executive we were assured that little or no relief could be hoped for at his hands in the way of tariff reform to produce the needed revenue; and, yielding to that feeling of unselfish patriotism for which the Republican party has ever been noted, we attempted to sustain and to lift up the hand of the President in maintaining the credit of the Government by the issue of additional bonds. Feeling, however, that in thus yielding to the demands of the Executive our duty at the same time required that we should, so far as in our power, protect the interests of the people, we insisted that the bonds which should be issued should be redeemable in less time, the interest paid at a lower rate, and the American people be given a chance to purchase the bonds instead of their being placed in the hands of a foreign syndicate. In addition to this arrangement for protecting the gold reserve and to enable the Government to borrow money for the payment of current expenses until the Republican party should again return to full and complete possession of every department of the government, we authorized the issue of short-term, low-rate, emergency bonds to the amount of $50,000,000 to cover the probable deficiency which would exist by the 4th of March, 1897. These provisions we sent to the Senate.

The action of that august body as a coordinate legislative branch of this Government it may not be proper for me to either criticise or condemn. I may be pardoned, however, for saying that it reminds me of the story of the doctor who, whenever a patient was brought to him for treatment, immediately proceeded to throw him into fits, because, as the doctor said, "he was great on fits." And so it seems the Senate is determined that whatever measure of relief we send to them, whether it be an emergency bond bill for the purpose of stopping the drain of gold or a tariff bill for supplying the deficiency of income, is to be thrown into the free-silver "fits," because a Republican minority, aided by Populists and Democrats, think that if they can afflict the country with that disease they can find a cure for all the other distempers.

It has even been hinted that upon one occasion one of the distinguished advocates of free silver, whose mind was so filled with his pet theory as to exclude any other thought, was called upon to make a few remarks beside the grave of a person with whom he had but a slight acquaintance, and being, like all other free-silver fanatics, ready to talk at all times, he remarked:

With the deceased I had little or no personal acquaintance. I therefore can say little of his life and character; but I shall be glad of this opportunity to address you for a short time upon the subject of the free and unlimited coinage of silver.

After a month of debate in the other House it comes back to us with all of our remedial legislation eliminated and the substitution of a provision which the majority of this House can not adopt. It says to the President that he may continue to issue 4 and 5 per cent bonds, and let them run thirty years if necessary, thus bequeathing an additional legacy of debt upon the next generation, and that he need not advertise the sale of bonds unless he chooses, but may deal direct with syndicates of foreign bankers, as he did a year ago. If ever the seal of condemnation was put upon any action of a legislative body by the American people, the result of the recent bond sale condemned this action of the United States Senate. Forced by the public demand that these bonds should be offered first to the American people, and should be sold for their full market value, the President and the Secretary of the Treasury reluctantly consented to advertise for bids.

Misjudging and mistrusting the patriotism and public spirit of the American citizens, they threw cold water upon the project and discouraged its success by the restrictions and limitations which they placed upon the sale of the bonds. But in spite of this want of confidence, in spite of their lack of faith in the support the people of this country have ever been ready and willing to give to its Government in time of need, the sale of these bonds was a magnificent success and even the syndicate headed by Mr. Morgan, to which the Secretary of the Treasury was about to dispose of the entire issue at 104, was compelled to raise its bid nearly 7 per cent in order to compete with the demand which it felt would be made by the masses of investors in this country for this loan. There were two things in connection with the opening of these bids which excited surprise in my mind. One was the elation of the Secretary of the Treasury over its success and the assumption by the President that it was due to his efforts, and the other that the opening of a foreign bid should have been attended with demonstrations of applause. Little credit can be attached to either the President or the Secretary of the Treasury for the success of this sale of bonds unless it be for the fact that they were not so utterly blind to the sentiment of the country as to ignore the demand for competitive bids. In the language of one of our great daily journals:

It is positive that we owe nothing to the Administration for this success. The credit is wholly due to the patriotism of the people, of the press, and of our banking institutions!

I have referred to the demonstrations of applause which were made when a foreign bid was read. If that applause was meant to express only the satisfaction that was felt at this bid as an evidence of the confidence of foreign investors, it may have been pardonable; and yet to my mind it was a far greater source of congratulation that the immense bulk of bids was from home investors.

Mr. Speaker, it marks, to my mind, the beginning of a brighter epoch in American financiering when the American people decide that they will become debtors to themselves instead of to foreign nations and foreign individuals. The secret and source of all the financial distresses under which this country is now laboring is the policy which has been pursued for the last thirty years of looking to foreign capital for financial support in our great private, corporate, and governmental enterprises.

We have become a debtor nation because, not content to await a healthy development of our resources, we have rushed headlong into speculations beyond our means; we have gambled upon the chances of the future; we have borrowed money to carry out our games of chance, and have burdened ourselves with the payment of untold sums of money by way of interest and dividends to foreign creditors. Do we open a mine, it is done by foreign capital; do we attempt to float the bonds of a great railroad, we send them abroad to bring back British gold; do we start a manufacturing enterprise, it is foreign capital invested in its management that carries it into operation. I know that this policy has been pursued and enthusiastically supported for many years, and yet year by year it has drained the country of its resources, and it has placed in the hands of those liable at any moment to become the enemies of this Government the means of creating a panic in its market and disaster and distress in every line of business.

Had we been more conservative in our progress; had we depended upon the present resources instead of borrowing from the future; had we deferred investments in these enterprises until our natural development of wealth and population had made them successful; had we paid cash as we went along instead of giving our notes, whose interest has sapped the very lifeblood of our earnings, we would not now be in the embarrassed financial condition in which we find ourselves. Even our Government securities, which ought, like those of France and Germany and Great Britain, to be held by our own people, are in the hands of foreign investors. So that while we resent the interference of a foreign Government or its agents not only in our own political affairs but in the affairs of our neighbors on this continent, we have tamely submitted to have the yoke of their financial despotism placed upon our necks. The tide of prosperity can only set in when Americans, and by that I mean in this connection the people of the United States, become creditors and debtors to themselves alone.

The apt story related of Mr. Lincoln concerning the home market applies with equal force to the sale of bonds which has just been made, for had they gone to foreign investors they would have had our bonds and we their money; but when sold to our own people, we keep in this country both the bonds and the money, and so long as they stay here, $4,000,000, by way of interest, will be distributed every year by the Government to American citizens, instead of being sent abroad to foreign investors.

But there are other sources of depletion of our wealth little noticed, but in the aggregate amounting annually to a vast amount of money. Thousands of dollars, representing the profits on the natural productions and labor of this country, find their way to Europe for the purchase of luxuries and the expenses of tourists. I know that it is difficult to stop this outflow of wealth by any legislative action, but a sentiment should be stimulated and encouraged to check this evil. I have no sympathy with communistic ideas which would pull down the successful and degrade them to a level with the idle, the improvident, and the thriftless; but I do believe that it is the duty of those who have, by combinations of fortunate circumstances, accumulated vast fortunes under the fostering influences of this great Government, to endeavor to elevate the condition and to mitigate the misfortunes of those who have been less successful. I believe that they should, as a duty of citizenship, contribute to the advancement of great public and private enterprises. I believe that their money should be put in circulation to purchase American products and to go into the hands of American labor. I believe that they could build for themselves more enduring monuments of fame in this way than by forming alliances for their daughters and their sons with the titled paupers of European nobility. I believe that $1,000,000 bestowed in the uplifting and improvement of their fellow-men on this side of the ocean will give them a prouder title of nobility than is held by any prince, duke, or baron who has been bought with a dowry of American gold in exchange for his ancient title and dainty hand.

So, too, the thousands of Americans who year after year cross the ocean to spend their money as tourists in foreign lands, the greater porportion of whom have probably seen little, if anything, of this magnificent domain of ours. It was a maxim of the old philosopher, "Know thyself." I would add to that, "Know thine own country." Nowhere in the world can more magnificent objects of natural scenery be found, and whether gazing upon the thundering cataract of Niagara, the magnificent canyons of the Rocky Mountains, the gigantic forests of the Pacific Coast, the Yellowstone Park, or the wonderful Yosemite; whether standing upon the top of Pike's Peak and looking out over a radius of 60 miles of uninterrupted view, or upon the banks of either ocean, he will see no country upon all the earth of which man should be prouder or which contains more to educate and instruct.

Let him spend his money at home, and, as Lincoln might have said, he will have the pleasure and his money will form a part of the wealth of his country.

These are the things which enable us to account for the fact that while the balance of trade—and by that I mean the difference between the exports and the imports of which we keep an account—may be largely in our favor, yet the continual drain of money taken out of the country by tourists and in payment of interest on securities held abroad may be far in excess of the balance of trade and the difference goes to retard our legitimate development year by year. But the remedy for this, unfortunately, is but little within legislative control and must be left to the public spirit and patriotism of the people themselves. If Boston Harbor a hundeed years ago could be converted into a great teapot as a rebuke to the oppression of foreign imposition, is there not enough of the spirit of '76 left in this country to commence its redemption from the financial slavery in which it has placed itself to foreign capital by spending American money in America and for America?

Having thus briefly stated some of the causes which have tended to make the financial situation so embarrassing to our people and our Government, let us consider what, if any, remedies can be suggested which are within the control of governmental legislation. From a Republican standpoint, and I think that even the free-silver Republicans will agree with me upon the proposition, the first thing to be done is to put the Government upon a paying basis. This can not be done by the issue of bonds, because some day those bonds must be paid. There is but one way that has ever been found by which the expenses of government can be met, and that is by taxation in one form or another. Direct taxation is limited by our Constitution and is only available in cases of great emergency when the General Government finds itself compelled to apportion out among the several States, according to their population, its share of the assessment levied. The other two great sources of income from taxation are those which are levied by way of internal revenue or excise upon the productions or occupations within the country and a tariff or custom duty upon articles imported into the country from abroad.

Feeling that any additional tax for internal revenue would be unwise and uncalled for in time of peace and a burden upon home manufactures which would put them to great disadvantage in the markets of the world, the policy of the Republican party has been to provide its revenue by tariff duties and at the same time so adjust the scale of these duties as to protect, as far as possible, American industries against foreign competition in the markets of the United States. I shall not go into any lengthy argument to prove the wisdom of this policy. It speaks for itself in the results which it has accomplished, and were I to attempt to put into language a statement of those results it would far transgress the limits assigned to me in this debate. Nor could I hope to add anything to the complete demonstration which has been made upon this subject by the distinguished Senator from Ohio, Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, in his recent speech on this bill in the Senate.

Believing that he has fully and completely proven that the deficiency of revenue is responsible for the trouble which has beset the Treasury, has caused the depletion of the gold reserve, has made necessary the issue of bonds to the extent of $262,000,000, to say nothing of the financial distress which has swept over the country at large for the last three years, the remedy to me seems a plain and simple one: That we should pass a tariff bill such as we sent to the Senate during the holiday week as an emergency bill and for temporary relief, and when the Republican party shall have once more come into full possession of the legislative branches, with a Republican President exercising the legislative power of approval over a protective tariff bill framed and passed by a Republican House and Senate, we shall hear no more of raids on the Treasury and the issue of bonds to keep up the reserve.

But the free-silver men claim that even if protection is restored to American labor, if the wheels of American industry begin to revolve, if the American workmen once more receive full American wages and employment for their full time, if the farmer can sell his crops in the home market at prices to make a reasonable profit, yet the full measure of prosperity can not come until silver is remonetized and the mints of the United States are once more opened to its free and unlimited coinage.

Mr. Speaker, nothing that I can say would probably add an iota to the vast learning which has been displayed upon this subject, and nothing that I could say, I am sure, would cause a free-silver advocate to see the error of his ways and get down to what I call a rational footing. They are wedded to their silver gods and no divorce court, unless it be the great national conventions and the judgment of the American people at the next Presidential election, can restore them to a state of separate existence. I shall therefore not take up the time of the House with statistical tables to controvert their claims that silver is the actual standard, that the great natural products of the country have maintained a parity with it, and that gold has appreciated.

While I am committed, not only by the declaration of my party in its national and State platforms, but by my own careful and deliberate judgment, to the belief that the convenience of mankind requires the use of both the metals as standards of value, and while I believe that the honor and integrity of the American Government demand that the coins which it issues shall be maintained by it at an absolute equality so that a dollar of one kind of metal, or its representative in paper money, shall be equal in purchasing power to every other dollar or its representative, I must freely admit that I believe this to be impossible if the mints of the United States are open to the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, when its bullion value in the markets of the world is but 32 to 1.

But while committed to the support of two kinds of standard money, I can not indorse the idea of two standards of value, one of which is fixed and recognized throughout all mercantile nations and the other is practically a commodity whose price rises and falls, according to the law of supply and demand, with reference to the fixed standard. Were the United States a walled-in nation, excluding, as China and Japan did for centuries, the intrusion of foreign commerce, I could readily conceive how a legislative act or a fiat of the Government could compel the circulation of any form of money which it might adopt and at any value which it might affix to it. But the exports from this country must be sold in the markets of the world and must be paid for in the coins which constitute the money of the world at their circulating value. So, too, the imports must be settled for in the coin and at the value of that coin in the country from which imported, and while my Government may compel me by its power over legal tender to accept a silver dollar in payment of a dollar of indebtedness, it can not compel a foreign creditor to accept a silver dollar in settlement of my dollar of indebtedness to him if the value of my dollar in his country is only 50 cents.

There can be but one way, in my judgment, in which that can be done, and that is by agreement among the commercial nations of the earth with which we deal, by their powers of sovereignty, to agree upon the ratio of 16 to 1 and make silver and gold legal tenders at that ratio. To the extent that this overvalues silver it becomes fiat money; but fiat money, even paper money, which is its worst form, so far as value is concerned, although its most convenient form for the purposes of business, can only be maintained as such by the strong arm of the law setting aside all questions of intrinsic value and placing wholly or partly a fictitious value upon what would otherwise be a mere commodity.

Do not misunderstand me. I heartily indorse a double standard of money, provided by international agreement these two standards can be kept together throughout the mercantile world. I do not believe it possible to maintain that double standard by the United States alone; and without this concurrence and when the separation comes, as it has already done, there can be, after all, but a single standard, and that the one which the world at large recognizes. I can conceive that, for purposes of internal traffic, a limited amount of silver might be kept in circulation at the ratio of 16 to 1, or, for that matter, at the ratio of 1 to 1, just as greenbacks are kept in circulation on a parity with gold while their intrinsic value is almost nothing. This, it seems to me, is what is meant by the declarations of our party favoring the greatest possible use of silver as standard money provided by legislation it can be maintained at a parity for purposes of trade strictly within our own country. That is the case with our silver certificates, any dollar of which will buy as much in our markets as a dollar in gold. Every dollar of our bank circulation will do the same. But not a dollar of greenbacks nor a dollar of silver certificates nor a dollar in bank notes can be forced upon a foreign creditor in exchange either for a dollar of gold coin or bullion nor in payment of one dollar of indebtedness.

It seems to me, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that our first duty as a nation is to leave nothing undone to bring about this international agreement. Let us take the initiative. Since we are debarred from offering in this bill such measures of relief as in our judgment are necessary by the issue of bonds, let us at least show that we are willing to do all that can be rationally done for the rehabilitation of silver as one of the standard moneys of the world. I believe that the nations of Europe, with possibly the exception of Great Britain, are ready to meet with us in this attempt, and should Great Britain refuse to do so, surely the wisdom of American statesmanship, with the concurrence of that of the rest of Europe, can, by discriminations against that power, compel her to adopt the agreement for the protection of her own mercantile interests.

For this nation alone to attempt to restore the free and unlimited coinage of silver even to the product of American mines would, it seems to me, be unjust to every other great interest in the country. I have attempted to look at this question from an unpartisan and unsectional point of view. I have studied it as a question of economics in which the people of our whole country are deeply concerned, whether they reside within the Rocky Mountain region, where nature has stored up these vast deposits of mineral wealth, or in the broad prairies of Iowa, Kansas, and Illinois, with their immense fields of corn and wheat; whether in the great manufacturing States of the East or the cotton belt of the South; and I can not but feel that more injury is being done to the credit and business interests of this country by the agitation of this question than it would cost the Government to purchase every silver mine in the United States.

I speak from no feeling of prejudice when I call attention to the fact that this interest of the silver-mine owners which has raised such a disturbance throughout the land is absolutely insignificant compared with the other great industries of the country. To illustrate: In the Cincinnati district alone the amount collected for internal revenue in 1894 was more than the output of the silver mines in any State in the Union with the exception of five. The value of the manufactured goods in my city in that year was four times as much as the value of the entire silver output in the country, and if we were to aggregate the value of all the corn produced in the country and compare it with that of the silver in the same year the latter would be dwarfed into absolute insignificance in comparison with it.

Why, then, should these great industries of manufacturing and agricultural production be made subservient to the greed of the owners of silver mines in a few undeveloped States, who wish the United States to buy their product at double its value? Would it not be just as reasonable for the distiller to say that the United States should accept from him the output of his distillery and pay him double the market price for his whisky? Would it not be equally as reasonable for the farmer to demand that the Government should put up its warehouses all over the land and buy and store his grain at $1 a bushel when it would sell in Europe for but 50 cents? If the mining of silver as bullion to be sold in the markets of the world as such can not be profitably carried on at its present market price, then let the silver-mine owner do just as any other manufacturer would have to do under the same circumstances, just as the distillers have had to do throughout the country when they overproduced and could not find a market at profitable prices—let him close his mine until such time as the scarcity of silver and an increase in the demand for it shall have made it profitable for him to resume its working.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that this silver-coinage question will, if allowed to rest, in a very short time adjust itself. The demand for gold as the single-standard money in European countries has caused the development of before unheard-of wealth in all parts of the world. It has penetrated Africa and discovered immense deposits in the southern and western parts of that continent; it has sought the frozen shores of Alaska and during the last three years has added $4,000,000 of the precious metal to the stock of the world; it has brought to light the hidden wealth of Venezuela and Guiana; Australia has increased its yield; while in these silver States themselves which are raising such an unjust cry and demand for discrimination in favor of the silver interest the development of gold has far exceeded that of silver; so that while the total production of gold in the United States in 1893 was valued at $40,000,000, in 1895 it had increased over 33⅓ per cent and was estimated to be worth over $53,000,000.

On the other hand, the production of silver, which was 60,000,000 ounces in 1893, ran down in 1895 to 51,000,000. The same is true in regard to the increase in coinage of gold and the decrease in coinage of silver throughout the world. In 1892 the world's coinage of gold was $172,473,124, and that of silver $155,517,347. In 1894 the coinage of gold was $227,921,032, while that of silver was $113,095,788, showing that between 1892 and 1894 silver coinage decreased from 90 per cent of the gold coinage to 50 per cent. The same causes which drove silver to a premium when the mines of Australia and California threw their immense quantities of gold for the first time into the mints of the world will, from the natural cause of supply and demand, work the restoration of silver upward from the ratio of 32 to 1, which it now has partly, if not fully, to its ratio of 16 to 1, as in the past. We can not hurry this by legislation; and even this country, rich as it is in its natural resources and growing wealthier every day, may be made bankrupt before it can realize upon its investment if it undertakes, as the free-silver men demand that it shall, to corner the silver market of the world for the next five, ten, or twenty years.

A great deal has been said in this debate as to the amount of money per capita in the different countries of the world affecting the prosperity and financial stability of the country. I have taken the pains to tabulate, from Preston's last report as Director of the Mint, the amounts per capita of gold, silver, uncovered paper money, and of all kinds of money by the leading nations of the civilized world. I find that as to the per capita of gold the following is shown to be the case:

1. Australia, $24.47.
2. France, $22.19.
3. Egypt, $17.65.
4. Great Britain, $14.91.
5. Germany, $12.21.
6. Cuba, $10.
7. United States, $8.78.

In silver per capita we stand as follows:

1. France, $12.94.
2. The Netherlands, $11.96.
3. Spain, $9.49.
4. United States, $8.89.

And Great Britain stands twelfth, with only $2.96 per capita.

In the list of uncovered paper money per capita the order is as follows:

1. South American States, $15.28.
2. Portugal, $10.80.
3. Belgium, $10.38.
4. Greece, $10.18.
5. Italy, $6.24.
6. The Netherlands, $6.08.
7. Canada, $6.04.
8. United States, $5.92.
9. Spain, $4.78.
10. Austria-Hungary, $4.69.
11. Russia, $4.28.
12. Haiti, $4.20.
13. Great Britain, $2.91.

While France stands very near the bottom of the list, with only 84 cents per capita.

As to the per capita of all kinds of money, the following shows the position of the United States:

1. France, $35.77.
2. Belgium, $27.82.
3. Australia, $25.96.
4. The Netherlands, $24.25.
5. United States, $23.59.
6. Portugal, $23.11.
7. Great Britain, $20.78.
8. Egypt, $19.85.
9. Germany, $17.59.

An examination of the above tables goes to show how fallacious any reasoning as to per capita of money in connection with the prosperity of the country may be, for Egypt has more gold per capita than Great Britain, Cuba more than the United States, and Australia heads the list. In silver per capita Spain and the Netherlands are both ahead of the United States, while Great Britain comes in after Belgium and Switzerland and Portugal and Mexico and India; and in the per capita of all kinds of money the United States leads Great Britain and Germany and follows Belgium, Australia, and the Netherlands.

The talk, therefore, about this country needing more money per capita seems to me to be devoid of any sound and reasonable basis. That country is the most prosperous which is free from debt and is the creditor of other nations, and the amount of money per capita is but a small element in the make up of a nation's financial standing.

Much has been said, too, in regard to this nation being made up of a debtor class whose interests are being jeopardized by the demonetization of silver, and that the creditors are given an undue advantage over them by reason of the fact that they are compelled to pay their debts upon a gold basis while the products of their toil yield them diminished values by reason of the slight put upon silver. While I do not admit and do not believe that the demonetization of silver has had anything to do, except possibly in a very limited way, with the fall in prices of agricultural products and of manufactured goods, I believe that these reductions in value can be rationally accounted for in other ways.

I can not agree with the gentlemen who would make us believe that the great masses of our people are in the debtor category, or that the only creditors of the nation are those who make their money and derive their income from loans. Thousands upon thousands of depositors in building associations and in savings banks, thousands of stockholders in American enterprises, are creditors of these institutions in the aggregate to the amount of millions of dollars. They became creditors at a time when the money which they put into these concerns was worth its face value. Let once the country be driven to a silver basis and gold go to a premium, as will be the inevitable result, and every one of these creditors, while paid in silver at the face value of their credits, would be compelled to accept a silver dollar for every dollar of indebtedness, when the intrinsic value and purchasing power of that dollar would be but 50 cents.

For my part I believe that the Republican party is too honest, nay, I believe that this entire nation, without respect to party, is too honest, to consent that even its foreign creditors, who have loaned it their money in its time of need, shall be paid in anything less than the full sum which was understood and agreed should be paid at the time the bargain was made, and surely no one would be so selfish and so unpatriotic as, for the benefit of a few owners of silver bullion and silver mines, or the interests of a few communities whose population in the aggregate is but little more than one or two of our largest States, to deprive thousands of American citizens of the value of their earnings and savings, representing years of toil, by permitting or requiring that they should be paid in a base and discredited coin.

In conclusion, therefore, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that my own judgment dictates, the wishes of my constituents approve, and the interests of the entire country demand that the substitute of the Senate for the House bill shall not be concurred in. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I shall support the Senate amendment to "A bill to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue," as I opposed the bill itself when before the House, and I defend my position in this matter on the ground that the amendment is in the line of traditional Republican policy, the policy of a bimetallic currency, and because the original bill is not in line with the traditional legislation of the Republican party; and further, I support the one and oppose the other because the original bill is, at best, but a measure for temporary relief, along questionable lines, while the Senate amendment seeks to afford permanent relief along lines well understood and in the direction of a return to a policy which in the past, at least, has prevented the occurrence of those difficulties which now confront us. The Republican party obtained a firm hold on the affection and confidence of the people of this nation by meeting public issues, whenever they arose for solution, fairly and squarely, and it maintained its high position in the esteem and regard of a majority of our countrymen by avoiding temporary expedients in legislation, by adopting no policy of a makeshift character, but by coming out squarely in the open and legislating fearlessly on the great and burning questions of the hour, whatever they might be.

I insist that House bill No. 2904—

An act to maintain and promote the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies in revenue—as it passed the House can not bring any relief to a distressed Treasury; provides no alleviation from present unsatisfactory financial conditions; opens no new path out of the wilderness of uncertainty in which we find ourselves, and does nothing to place the country on the firm foundation of a currency system that can not be manipulated and controlled by the action of combinations of capital at home or abroad. What relief could the House bill have afforded? It simply provides a new way in which bonded indebtedness in this country may be increased. It merely changes the formula for increasing the load of debt under which our people are groaning, and nothing more.

Its passage would not have assured us the maintenance of the credit of the nation for thirty days after the President had taken advantage of its provisions had it become a law. This is not in the line of Republican legislation, for Republican legislation, from the time that party first took the reins of government, has been along those lines and in pursuance of those policies which would serve a mighty nation not for a day, a month, or a year, but rather such legislation as would build up and maintain our credit and our industries permanently. I trust I fully appreciate the high and patriotic motives which actuated the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee in reporting to the House a measure which, in their opinion, would afford temporary relief to a depleted Treasury and bolster up a national credit weakened by the combined influence of a wickedly mistaken Democratic tariff policy and the ceaseless attacks made upon it by the Administration in its blindly persistent efforts to forever fasten upon us a single gold standard of currency, but I must differ from my fellow-Republicans on that committee as to either the necessity or wisdom of the measure.

Mr. Speaker, it is not necessary for me to call the attention of this House to the fact, so patent to all of us, so unpleasantly brought to our daily notice, that this nation is passing through a most trying and crucial period. For years past there has been a steady decline in the prices of nearly all products. This decline began in the early seventies. For various reasons, among the most potent of which was the rapid development of our magnificent resources, made possible by wise protective legislation, the effect of which was to stimulate the development of our resources (so vast as to be almost incomprehensible) with such rapidity that the chilling and withering blight of falling prices was almost nullified by the vast increase of products and the blessings of constant employment for our people. The dreadful and baneful malaria of falling prices and values was, nevertheless, present, though its blighting and deadly presence was scarcely noted while the body politic remained under the influence of the powerful tonic of rapidly developing resources.

The nation calls loudly for the driving away of the miasmatic vapors of sloth and enforced idleness, of closed mills and starving artisans, by a return to the Republican prescription of adequate protection. But even this, healthful and invigorating though it would be, could not win back to us the countless millions that have been lost, and lost forever, by the deadly downward slide of values, upon which slippery slope, with ever-accelerating speed, the masses of our fellow-countrymen have seen their property values descend. We have all heard of the time-worn and, to my mind, time-dishonored argument, that the fall in general prices and values has been brought about by cheapened methods of production, by cheapened transportation, or by overproduction. With these arguments it is scarcely worth while to take issue.

Wheat is not produced any more cheaply now in the United States than it was ten or fifteen years ago; neither corn nor cotton can be produced more cheaply now, provided the same wages are paid, than they could have been produced fifteen years ago; beef is produced no cheaper on the plains of the great West and fed no cheaper on the farms of the Mississippi Valley to-day than in 1873 if you pay the same value for labor and the grains and produce fed to beef stock that was then paid. In some manufactured lines there has undoubtedly been some reduction of the actual cost of production other than in the reduction in wages, but I am of the opinion that these reductions are not so great as have been imagined, and I venture to say that those reductions will not amount to 50 per cent of the fall in the prices of the goods.

Mr. Speaker, it is almost impossible to grasp the enormity in actual value of property loss in the United States in the past few years by the shrinkage in the value of that property. It is as though day by day a tier of brick had been taken from every house in the land and slowly the roof had been lowered, and that this process had been going on until, were the actual loss in values of improvements upon real estate (outside of the large cities of the land) represented in the improvements themselves, they would have lost one-third of their height or one-third of their extent. It is as though year after year the farm and village property of the nation had been shrinking in size until he who was accustomed to look about on broad acres could now, measured by their value, encompass his possessions with about two-thirds the number of chains and links that he would have used formerly. It is as though the live stock of the nation had shrunk in size, measured by their value and purchasing power, to one-half or a little more of their former massive size.

In the face of all these facts there has been one class of property that has maintained its value. That class of property is indebtedness of all kinds, at least this is true using the ordinary forms of speech, the actual fact is that property of all kinds, except in cases affected by special causes, has about maintained the same value all these years, while upward and still higher has climbed the value and importance of debts as measured in those things which must finally be used to liquidate them. It has become the fashion among those who believe that the values of all property can be adequately measured by one metal, and that metal gold, to insist that any legislation that would tend to enhance the value, as compared with gold, of another money metal would be dishonest; that the use of any other metal than gold in the payment of debts would be dishonest. I agree with all those who reason thus in so far that I say that all indebtedness should be paid according to the bond and according to the contract as specifically provided. More than that, it should be paid in actual value, interchangeable with other actual values at the time of payment, as the spirit and bond of the contract intended, but I must differ from them vitally when they say that that product of the mine only is honest money which year by year makes more weighty the yoke about the neck of the debtor and which each year brings an increased reward to its holder in the fruits of the labor of his fellow-men.

For a moment let us admit the argument, fallacious though it is, of those who hold that falling prices are the result of better methods of production, cheaper transportation, or of overproduction. Even if that were the case would it be wise, under such conditions as have existed in this country for some years, to have a basic currency of such a nature, so unyielding, so inelastic, so little in sympathy with human effort and human production that each increasing downward slide in the scale of values of products produced no corresponding expansion in the basic coin which represented all values? This condition of things might not be so serious or alarming were all business transacted on a cash basis and were debts unknown, because then the only advantage accruing to the possession of actual coin would be the slight advance in value of the coin during a temporary hoarding. But when you take into consideration the fact that a great proportion of the wealth of the nation is represented by debts, stocks, bonds, and mortgages, public and private, aggregating in the United States $22,066,793,505.55, and when you appreciate that all of this enormous wealth each day grows more valuable, while the possibility of its payment becomes more remote as the values of those things in which it must be paid decreases compared with the dollar standard, then you can appreciate the enormity of the distress that is overtaking our people, the amount of whose debt is ever rising upward on one arm of the scale, while the ratio of the value of those things in which debts must be ultimately paid is constantly dropping.

Mr. Speaker, no man who will honestly, even casually and superficially, study current prices and post himself on property values can deny or doubt for a moment the tremendous shrinkage in values in this country other than those shrinkages that can be accounted for by the loss of speculative values or the depreciation of values brought about by the inauguration of a suicidal tariff policy. To say, however, that there have been tremendous losses in values is not to state the case fairly. The fact is that there has been a tremendous and far-reaching rise in the measuring capacity of the unit of value. It is not true that general values have fallen, but it is true that the value of one commodity, made valuable by legislation, not by any intrinsic worth of its own, has been tremendously enhanced.

This condition of things has been brought about simply because the civilized world, following the lead of England and our own country, have provided by law and ordinance that all of their mighty values, and all of the enormous debts representing these values, shall be represented by one money metal alone, thereby creating a demand for that metal or its representative, because of which demand, working along the lines of the inevitable law of supply and demand, the value of this metal, compared with everything else upon earth, has risen. This condition of things has made gold the sole measure of values, a thing to be bandied about, speculated in, an article of commerce, to be shipped hither and thither for the purpose of controlling the finances of nations by controlling a large proportion of the free gold of the world. It is this condition financially, aided and abetted by an Administration which at all times, in season and out of season, has been working in the direction of depressing our financial standing, that has made possible the tremendous raids on the Treasury of the nation, that has furnished the excuse for those transactions by the Administration which have caused the cheek of every true American to tingle with shame, that has sent your Uncle Samuel, valiant, rich, resourceful, up and down the exchanges and bourses of the world like a common mendicant, asking for a paltry sum of yellow metal to maintain the currency of a nation the actual wealth of which and the resources of which exceed the combined resources and wealth of all Europe.

Still, our Republican leaders of the Committee of Ways and Means have now no remedial legislation to offer or suggest for this condition of affairs, except a proposition to increase the national debt by a method the details of which vary a trifle from the details of the methods by which the country has been plunged into needless debt to the extent of $262,000,000. Let no man be deceived by the cry oft raised by the Administration and its supporters, that the cause of withdrawals of gold from the National Treasury is the result of the agitation of those who believe in true bimetallism and advocate the return to the use of both gold and silver as money metals of final redemption and measures of values. As well might the pilot, heedless of the chart that would have carried him safely through, blame the warning beacon light, placed to point the shoals and quicksands, for his wreck as those who believe in our late suicidal financial policy should claim that the warning cries of those who saw the quicksands and shoals of disaster were responsible for the wrecking of the ship of state, steered upon these very quicksands and shoals in spite of the warning given by the bimetallists.

Mr. Speaker, the substitute, which I support, is in the line of permanent legislation, calculated to relieve the distressed condition of our country and to place us upon a firm and broad foundation of prosperity. Those who oppose free coinage of silver are prone to refer to "50-cent dollars" and to "dishonest dollars." May the day never come when this nation, noted throughout the world for the magnificent manner in which its credit has been upheld, do aught but pay its debts in money that is interchangeable with any other money the world over. May the day never come—and I believe it never will—when any individual in this country will have the authority of law to pay his debts in any money that will not be acceptable to the debtor when it is paid. But it does not follow that because, by the reason of the striking down of silver, not only by our own nation, but by continental Europe, largely through our example, its present value, measured by gold, has decreased that, therefore, there is no way in which to restore the broad gap between the relative value of the two metals in the markets of the world now and those which prevailed in 1873. There is absolutely no reason for the present vast gulf between the two metals, except that the demand for one has been increased in having put on it the burden of the measure of values of the entire world, while the other has found its chief occupation gone, the demand for it destroyed by the repeal of legislation, thereby becoming a mere commodity, a thing of value only as it may be used as a money token to represent gold values, or as it may be used in the arts and sciences.

Mr. Speaker, the present condition of affairs in this country can not be mended by the issuance of bonds. There is a fundamental and deep-seated malady in the body politic that is turning the lifeblood of the nation into poison, which, as it goes coursing through the system, burns and consumes. You can not remedy this condition by placing bond blisters and plasters upon the cuticle of the nation. You must purify, enrich, and enliven the blood, the circulating medium which gives life and vigor. This can be done by the passage of the Senate amendment to this act. I know that it will be said by those who oppose the position held by the advocates of this amendment that the effect of the passage of the amendment would be to depreciate our currency and bring us at once to a silver basis or standard.

I will not say that the passage of this amendment would not require some auxiliary legislation to aid in the readjustment of business on the new lines thus presented. It is quite likely that this would be necessary, and it is quite probable that this legislation should be along the lines of a protective tariff, whereby we should raise against those countries that insist on maintaining the single gold standard of values a high protective wall, while compelling them to pay the tariff on their imports in gold coin. On the other hand, we might, and probably would, find it to our advantage to enact such legislation as would give us reciprocal advantages in our trade relations with those nations using and recognizing silver. It is not true that our nation would be flooded with silver in vast amounts from foreign nations if we were to return to the use of this metal as a money of final redemption, for we are the possessors of a considerable portion of the world's silver supply, and the amounts held by the nations of continental Europe at least is in circulation on a parity with gold at a ratio higher than that which we propose, and could not be brought to our shores without considerable loss.

Not until the nation is once more enjoying true bimetallism; not until the constantly increasing wealth of the nation is no longer measured by one metal, which fails utterly to keep pace with that increase and the volume of business; not until the constant and seemingly never-ending slump in prices shall be stayed by increasing the volume of basic money, thereby taking from the few millions of gold the enormous demand upon it occasioned by making it the one medium in which all debtors may be compelled to pay their obligations; not until each recurring sunrise shall find a debt, as measured by the human effort required to pay it, on greater than when the sun last set; not until the investment of capital in legitimate lines of human effort shall pay greater returns than capital locked up in safety vaults; not until the day shall come when the miser hoarding his coin wealth shall no longer profit by its daily, weekly, and monthly enhancement of value; not until money, the servant, the medium of exchange, the measure of value, shall cease to be the master and shall cease to crush beneath its golden heel the values of all other classes of property; not until these conditions shall have been brought about shall this nation return to an era of true prosperity. I honestly believe that a majority of those on this side of the House agree with me on this proposition. I believe to-day that a majority of the Republican party believes that we must return, not to a wider and larger use of silver, as has sometimes been said, but to its restoration as one of the metals which may be drawn upon to ultimately pay debts, and thereby relieve the tremendous strain now placed upon gold as the sole liquidator of debts.

Section 4 of the amendment provides:

That the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem the United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, and also the Treasury notes issued under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, when presented for redemption, in standard silver dollars or in gold coin, or both, not at the option of the holder, but exclusively at the option of the Treasury Department; and said notes, commonly called greenbacks, when so redeemed, shall be reissued as provided by the act of May 31, 1878.

The effect of the enactment of this clause would be to forever break the connection of that "endless chain" which is now sapping the vitality of the nation and putting to shame the statesmanship of its ablest financiers, by absolutely arresting the speculative raids upon the Treasury gold which have been occurring for the past two years. The steam shovels of this Administration which have been working under an extra head of steam in order to pile out gold as fast as it could be demanded would be given a rest, for under the provisions of this amendment the Secretary would be expected to redeem at least a part of the notes so presented in silver. This need not be done in a way that would interfere with the legitimate business interests of the country.

It has not been the legitimate business interests of the country that have been drawing out gold and making a plaything of the United States Treasury, but combinations of capital, aided and abetted by the officials of the Government and their allies. Those who howl the loudest against this provision which would protect our coin reserve, and who become almost frantic in their denunciation of those who advocate it, seem to forget that our National Treasury is the only place on earth where an unlimited amount of gold can be obtained on demand without any charge for exchange. The Bank of England, which the gold monometallists are prone to point to as the bright and shining example of an institution which maintains gold payments, requires those who make heavy demands for gold to pay a smart amount for exchange, thereby discouraging and rendering unprofitable gold raids; while the Bank of France uses its own option as to paying coin demands in either gold or silver.

You may not favor the passage of this bill now because you believe that the mints of the United States could not be opened to the free and unlimited coinage of silver without precipitating a disarrangement of values that would be disastrous to all interests, but the fact remains that the only way to return to bimetallism is to open the mints of the country to the absolute free coinage of both metals on an equality, as the only way to resume specie payments, when we had a depreciated paper currency, was to resume. The disastrous lessons of the past serve as a warning for the future. If we persist in our advocacy of a single gold standard, the same influences which destroyed bimetallism are still at work to still further enhance the value of bonded debts. The enormous values of the lands inhabited by the Mongolian and Hindoo races and those of South America and Mexico are still measured in the white metal, and as the bonded debts of these nations to the money lenders of Europe daily increase, how long will it be, think you, if we make no effort to counteract the baneful influence on property values of the propaganda of the golden calf, ere by cunning sophistry, by bulldozing threats of ruined credit, aye, by brute power, they will force these nations on to the gold standard; and, think you, this further extension of the measuring value of gold will not increase the purchasing power of the gold unit, and that to an extent that will still further largely increase the value of all debts?

This is no idle speculation, for England has already partly consummated her plans in this direction in India, and in the guise of advocating a uniform currency in the interest of commerce the moneyed interests are working industriously to this end all over the world. If this measure is not a good one, what has been offered in its stead? Are you willing to vote for a measure providing for free coinage when we can obtain the cooperation of France and Germany? Are you willing to provide by law a future date at which we shall resume the free coinage of both metals? We who believe in bimetallism as the only cure for many ills that now inflict the body politic are anxious to know whether we differ from you only as to the means to be employed or do we differ as to the fundamental proposition?

This bill can not pass this House, so it can not become a law, but I look confidently forward to the day when a Republican Executive at the other end of the Avenue shall be working harmoniously with a Republican Congress for the purpose, not of discrediting the currency of the nation by denouncing all those as fanatics and theorists who do not adhere to the single gold standard of values, but who, conscious of the dangers, appreciating the direful effects, cognizant of the terrible consequences of the depreciation of the value of the world's property, will aid in bringing about such a state of affairs that the two metals shall bear the burden of values as moneys of final redemption at the ratio along which they moved, with slight fluctuations, for centuries.

You are not satisfied with the present condition of things. No one is. No man, no matter what may be his opinion as to the causes, can view with complacency the conditions where debts increase without increasing the obligation; where actual wealth decreases without decreasing the quantity or changing the character of that which represents that wealth. No currency can be a safe, sound, and honest currency which does not, as the years roll by, somewhere nearly measure the property and products of to-day so that they shall approximately represent the same amount in circulating medium that they did yesterday, last week, and last year.

How do you expect to win back the fallen prices? By what means of legislation do you expect to make it possible for the debtors of this country to meet their obligations as easily as they did in years gone by? Have you any legislation in mind that will accomplish this? Must we say that the golden era is past and that never again will the producers be able to meet obligations as they did in years past? You may say that a protective tariff will aid in doing this, and it is true that it will enliven and stimulate and that it will at least furnish employment to our people, and by thus furnishing employment will enable them to use a constantly increasing amount of the products of the farm and factory, of the ranch and mill, but you can not hope even by this class of legislation to restore the equilibrium, to reunite the past, to which the future is mortgaged by bills of indebtedness, with the present, except by such currency legislation as will make the dollar of to-day something like in purchasing power the equivalent of the dollar of the past.

It is true that under the present condition of things he who has obtained the golden guinea would fare better than he who obtained the same amount in years past were it not for the fact that under our system of Government every citizen must directly or indirectly bear his proportion of all the debts of a public character, at least. As far as the millionaire is concerned, the owner of vast quantities of securities, his payment of the difference between the enhanced value of indebtedness and its normal value is comparatively small compared with the benefit he derives.

We are confronted with and can not escape from the question of increased metallic base for our currency with the query of what should be done with the greenback, with the question of how the increase in wealth and population is to be met with a corresponding increase in the measure of values, and whichever way we turn for a solution of these questions we are met with the cold, hard fact that the basic money, the foundation of all currency and the measure of all values, gold is not increasing to any appreciable extent.

Mr. Speaker, I said at the beginning of my remarks that I favored this amendment because it is a Republican measure, not that I believe it is a measure, understand, that will be favored by a majority of the Republicans of this Chamber at this time, but I reiterate that it is a Republican measure because it strikes at the root of the difficulty instead of being a patent nostrum, a cheap narcotic, expected to produce temporary lethargy in the body politic. It is a vital restorative, to quicken the pulse, improve the heart action, increase the circulation, and, by sending the silver along with the gold corpuscles through the veins of commerce, trade, and enterprise, revivify, enliven, and restore wonted activity in all channels of enterprise. Adopt it and you raise a nation from the slough of despond, rescue the Treasury from the clutch of spoilers, stop the deadly fall of prices which is impoverishing our people, and start your country once more on the road to wealth and prosperity.

Mr. SPARKMAN. Mr. Speaker, opposed as I am to the original bill as it left this House, and not altogether favoring the amendment, or rather the substitute, adopted by the Senate, I ask the indulgence of the House while I give briefly, as I shall, my views on the great questions involved.

The bill as originally reported and passed by this House was objectionable, in my judgment, for many reasons. But as that measure has practically passed into history and is not now before us, I will not waste any time in a statement of the reasons which would have impelled me, had I been present at the time of its passage, to vote against the bill. But, while the substitute passed by the Senate has merit, while it has features which commend themselves to all Democrats and to those who do not desire the country to drift further toward monometallism, it also possesses features which do not commend themselves to me, nor, I believe, to the people whom I in part represent on this floor.

I believe in bimetallism for the United States at this time. I do not believe that the time has come in our history when a single monetary standard, either of gold or silver, would be best for this country. I know, Mr. Speaker, that our career has been a grand one; that the spirit of progress has hovered over us from the birth of this Republic down to the present moment. I know that the America of to-day is not the America of a century ago; that the civilization of 1792 is not the civilization of the closing years of the nineteenth century. I am aware of the fact that within the past quarter of a century this country has advanced steadily but rapidly along commercial lines; that it has improved in all the departments of industry and of business; in the machinery and appliances which have more than doubled and trebled the products of the fields, the gardens, the mines, and the workshops of the country, down during the past twenty-five years, until to-day ours is the greatest nation on the globe. And I am aware, too, that for many years there has been a steady tendency toward a single gold standard among many countries, particularly among the leading commercial nations in Europe, silver in each case giving way to the more favored metal, gold; but I do not think the time has come in the history of this country when a single gold standard will conserve the best interests of the greatest number of our people.

It might be sufficient for certain classes. It might do for certain sections of this country. But there are sections and classes and peoples whose interests will not, in my judgment, be promoted by the exclusive use of gold as the monetary standard. In the great centers of business and population it might do; for the speculator in stocks and bonds it might possibly be better, although this is problematical; but for the rural districts, for the laboring people remote from these great centers, it seems to me that bimetallism, or the use of both gold and silver as the standard money, under such restrictions as would make them circulate at a parity, would be better. I know it is claimed that as civilization advances less money in proportion to population and the volume of business done is needed in the business transactions of the world; so a dollar, it is claimed, will go further now than fifty or a hundred years ago. It is said, for instance, that nine-tenths of the business of the world is done on paper, not a single dollar of any kind of money being moved from its place of deposit in the transactions covered by this 90 per cent. All this may be true, and yet it would furnish no argument against the demand, nor the reasons therefor, which comes from the South and from the West in favor of a freer use of silver.

I do not care so much for the silver miners in the West or the holders of stocks and gold bonds in the East, although I would in the enactment of laws, as in their enforcement, protect so far as possible the interests of each. These classes can take care of themselves and usually do. But there is a class of people between these two extremes. I mean the laboring classes, those who work in the fields, the mines, the factories, and the workshops of the country, whose interests we are too prone to forget and who should receive equal consideration at the hands of those who would legislate for the entire country. It is these classes that the coinage of silver along with gold, and under the conditions above referred to, might benefit.

For this reason, then, I am in favor of bimetallism, or the coinage and use of both metals, but always, Mr. Speaker, under such circumstances and conditions as would cause them to circulate on an equality, and would make and keep their debt-paying power the same.

Then again, Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of an increased use of silver because of the great demand coming up from different sections of this country in favor of that metal. From the South and the West, the great farming sections of the country, there is a desire for silver that, it seems to me, we should not ignore. It may be and doubtless is true that many of the arguments in favor of the free coinage of silver are not tenable, but that is true of many meritorious questions. It is thought, for instance, by those most urgent in their demands for free coinage that all the financial ills with which we have been afflicted during the past few years are traceable to the so-called demonetization of silver. This, however, is of course incorrect. It is also claimed by the extreme advocates of that doctrine that the demonetization of that metal by this country and other nations had, by the undue appreciation of gold, reduced the prices of commodities and of the productions of labor. This is probably not true to the extent claimed, as statistics will abundantly show, and if it were true the fact would destroy the argument so far as the producing classes are concerned, for if all articles have fallen alike no one, it seems to me, will be hurt, because with a given amount of labor (and that is the standard of value of the workingman) a person should be able to purchase as much now as ever. But still this demand for the increased use of silver which has sprung up throughout the sections of the country just mentioned has a sufficient foundation for its existence to warrant Congress in endeavoring to enact such laws as will give the people the same use of silver as they have of gold.

Mr. Speaker, I know that this cry for silver comes largely from or is influenced by those directly interested in the appreciation of the price of silver, the owners of silver mines or of stocks or securities based thereon, as the advocacy of the single gold standard comes largely from those who have a like interest in gold. These, Mr. Speaker, are the two extremes. Each, if power were given them, would have but a single standard, either of gold or of silver. The one class would eliminate silver and the other gold. But the laboring people, the producing classes having no such motives, demand no legislation that would drive either metal out of circulation. They would use both as standard money without discrimination against the one or the other.

I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that a large majority of the people in many of the Southern and Western States are deeply in earnest in their desire and their demand for the restoration of silver to its former place as standard money, and these classes are entitled to the respectful consideration of the law making power.

But there is another reason why I am in favor of bimetallism, and that is that I stand pledged to that policy. The party to which I belong, in its declaration of principles at its national convention in Chicago in 1892, clearly and unequivocally, as I take it, declared in favor of bimetallism; the only restriction being that "the dollar unit of coinage of both metals must be of equal intrinsic, exchangeable value, or be adjusted by international agreement, or by such safeguards of legislation as shall insure the maintenance of the parity of the two metals and the equal power of every dollar at all times in the markets and in the payment of debt." This was one of the declarations of principles made by the Democratic party in its platform of 1892, and it was on that platform that I was elected to a seat in this body. I therefore consider myself, as also the party, committed to that policy. It was on that plank in the Democratic platform, among others, that we went before the people in that year, and the success of the party, by a majority almost unprecedented in the history of the country, shows that this enunciation of principles as outlined in that platform struck a responsive chord in the hearts of the people throughout the land.

But the question arises, will the passage by Congress of the Senate amendment, and its approval by the President, give the people bimetallism in reality as well as in name? Is the substance of the measure such—are the provisions for free coinage so guarded as that the dollar unit of the two metals will be of equal intrinsic value or of equal purchasing power? The answer to this question, or rather the absence of a satisfactory answer, is what causes my chief difficulty. The bill provides for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1, while it is a well-known fact that the intrinsic value of the quantity of silver to be coined into a dollar would be little more than half the value of the bullion in a gold dollar. It is because, Mr. Speaker, I favor bimetallism for the United States at this time that I object to the arbitrary coinage of silver as provided for in this bill. There is, in my judgment, not a single provision in the bill, nor has there been any provision made outside of the bill, nor any proposed, that would insure the circulation of the two metals on an equality. The result, according to all precedent, would be to drive gold out of circulation, so that we would practically have but one standard of money, that of silver.

As to the probable results of the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, of declaring a silver dollar with only 50 cents' worth of silver in it equal to a dollar of gold with a coinage and commercial value of 100 cents, we are not left in doubt when we read the history of our own country. When our Government was first formed and it became necessary to establish a monetary system, the statesmen of that day set to work patiently to ascertain the true commercial ratio between the two metals—gold and silver—and thinking they had found it, they fixed the coin ratio at about 15 to 1. This, however, was not the commercial ratio, as gold was a fraction more valuable than the coinage ratio as fixed in the coinage law of April 2, 1792. The result, although not at the time foreseen, was clearly discernible a short time after, when all the gold was driven out of circulation.

To remedy this evil the ratio was changed in 1837 from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1. This was accomplished by making the gold coins lighter than before. But the ratio as thus changed placed too high a value upon silver, and the silver dollar could not then be kept in circulation. They were exported to such an extent that Congress in 1853 changed the weight of the silver coins below one dollar, making them lighter. This was done in order that our subsidiary silver coins might be kept in circulation, and it was well, for from this time to 1862, when both metals were withdrawn from circulation, our metallic currency consisted only of gold and these subsidiary coins and possibly a few foreign silver pieces. The silver dollar was nowhere to be found in circulation. This was all in obedience to a law as old as metallic money and as inexorable as the decrees of fate. It was what might have been expected. But it was thought the difference between the commercial and coinage ratio was so slight that both metals would be retained in circulation; but silver in the one case and gold in the other obeyed the mandate of this law and disappeared from circulation. If these, then, were the results when the differences between the coinage and commercial ratio were so slight, what are we to expect under a law which should fix the coinage ratio at 16 to 1 when the commercial value is 32 to 1?

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said that this would be only the temporary effect, and that the passage of the bill would increase the price of silver, so that sixteen parts of that metal would soon be equal to one of gold. I do not know this to be true, while it is controverted by some of the ablest minds in the country. But even if the free coinage of silver, suddenly forced upon the country, would have this effect in the end, the immediate results to business would likely be disastrous. At least, Mr. Speaker, it is an experiment, and at this time I am opposed to trying experiments. Early in 1893, by reason of laws enacted, not by the Democratic party, and for which they were in no way responsible, the financial affairs of this country were paralyzed to an extent seldom witnessed in any part of the globe, and we are now, three years afterwards, just recovering from the effect of this panic.

I am therefore opposed to the trying of experiments in the face of this returning prosperity. The people have suffered enough for one generation, and unless some method can be adopted that is reasonably certain to produce no such results I would be in favor of waiting until the country has recovered from the effects of the panic of 1893 before making experiments. But it is not necessary to wait so long. A step could be taken even now in that direction. It has been declared by solemn enactment that bimetallism is the policy of this Government. The two great parties of this Government have declared in favor of a double standard. Then, let the Government begin to do something toward carrying out that policy. Not by radical measures, to be sure, which may do a great deal of harm, but by conservative processes, which, without damage to any material interests, will yet accomplish the objects.

Perhaps it was not expected or intended that the substitute should become a law at this time, otherwise the provision in favor of silver would have been guarded by others which would in the end have accomplished the object sought without the bad results which would likely follow the passage of the bill in its present shape.

Mr. Speaker, the people I have the honor in part to represent on this floor are a conservative people, and while many of them would like to see such legislation as would give them a larger use of silver, yet they are not in favor of any radical measures nor the enactment of any laws at this time looking to the free coinage of silver which do not at the same time so guard its coinage as to give them bimetallism in the true sense of the word. I know that something should be done to remedy our present monetary system. Something is radically wrong with this system and has been since 1862, and it behooves the party in power, instead of resorting to temporary makeshifts, to formulate some plan that will give permanent relief to the people.

These being my views, Mr. Speaker, and as the proposition is to concur or not to concur in the Senate substitute as a whole, I shall be compelled to vote against concurrence.

The second and third sections meet my approval, but for reasons already given I do not see my way clear to support the first section.

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. Mr. Speaker, in some respects the present discussion on the part of those in favor of the free coinage of silver has assumed a sectional and acrimonious character. Those residing in or near silver mines we find almost alone in the maintenance of what we believe to be a heresy. Is it not a sad commentary upon representative government that the views we give utterance to on this floor are narrowed and prejudiced by the particular locality we hail from? Can we not as Representatives of a great nation be searchers for truth rather than selfish seekers for local aggrandizement?

It is admitted that when silver is said to have been demonetized it had been out of circulation for years; that it was at a premium, and therefore in the market as merchandise and not a part of our operative currency. Is it not a fact that the act of 1873 recognized the inevitable and declared what really was the real standard of recognized values? Is it not a fact that the act demonetized nothing, but accepted the then real condition of things? Is it not admitted that the nations forming the Latin Union were compelled against their will to unyoke silver from their established standards and stop its free coinage?

Is it not admitted that the commercial value of silver as compared to gold is as 32 is to 1? Then, in the name of all that is fair, how can we justify free coinage at a legal or fiat ratio of 16 to 1?

Is it not clear that if this monstrous doctrine is maintained gold must appreciate greatly, leave a circulation we have polluted, and the stream or circulation become entirely a silver one; that gold will be thrown upon the market as is merchandise and lose its entire efficiency as money.

We hear talk upon this floor of the South and West uniting. Uniting for what? In the interest of silver mine owners, to force this Government to degrade its currency, impoverish the land, disseminate distrust and misery broadcast for the selfish aggrandizement of a comparatively few.

Unite, if you will, in friendly trade and commercial emulation and rivalry; but it is treasonable conspiracy for you to unite to poison the life blood of the nation; to degrade and depreciate its currency; to compel the Government to take, and force the people to take, a depreciated metal at a falsely enhanced value.

I appeal to all Republican and Democratic Representatives alike to act patriotically and unselfishly, and not to force this Government into ruinous bargains for any product, and especially for that product which, in one fell stroke, would destroy all established values and standards, confuse and distract the commercial world, paralyze the hand of industry, and scatter alarm and poverty throughout our land.

And I desire to state another fact in conclusion that does not seem to have been noticed. It is said that the difficulty might be removed by international convention or agreement. I deny that either this or any number of nations combined can by mere agreement give value to anything. The concerted assent of all the nations of the world to-day could not make 16 ounces of silver equal 1 ounce of gold. What the fiat of one nation can not do the combined fiat of the nations of the world is powerless to do. [Applause.]

Mr. EDDY. Mr. Speaker, in the early days of the session there came an exceedingly urgent demand from the Executive that we have immediate legislation to relieve the extraordinary financial stress of the nation.

In response to this demand, in a very short space of time two measures were brought in and passed by this House, namely, a measure for increasing the revenue; and secondly, a measure for issuing bonds to provide for the maintenance of the gold reserve; and these were sent to the Senate.

They have returned one measure and will undoubtedly return the other so disguised by amendments that their originators would not recognize them.

They have adopted a "stand and deliver" method of doing business, and have served a defiant notice on the House that no measure increasing the revenue of this nation, no measure for protecting the labor and industries of this nation, no measure for lighting furnace fires, starting factory wheels whirling, or providing remunerative labor for the unemployed shall be passed, until the representatives of the majority of the people conform to the wishes of the representatives of the minority of the people in their views of what financial legislation is necessary for the welfare of the country; and if for no other reason, we in the House could not concur in the amended bill without placing ourselves in an exceedingly humiliating position.

I do not intend to enter into a lengthy discussion of this question. I have neither the time nor the ability so do to, but it does seem to me that there are some primary principles that can be understood and discussed by all.

There can be no question but that all the money we have in circulation use should be so regulated and controlled that it will circulate side by side at a perfect parity; a dollar of one kind should be at all times and under all conditions and circumstances worth as much and be interchangeable for a dollar of any other kind, and whatever we circulate as money should possess all the monetary functions. That is:

First. It should be exchangeable at its par value for labor and commodities, no matter where the commodities are purchased or the labor employed.

Second. It should possess the power of discharging and utterly wiping out of existence all obligations calling for the payment of money, no matter whether such obligations exist in this or any other country under a civilized government.

In other words, whatever kind of money we have, it must be universal money. Therefore the question of paramount importance for us to consider is, What kind of money must we have that will perform all these functions? In my opinion, it can consist of but two kinds:

First. Money composed of some metal or metals that all or at least a majority of the leading commercial nations of the world will receive at their official mints and coin back to the presenter in "lawful-tender" money; or Second. Token money, composed of some other material, that will be promptly redeemed upon presentation in the money first mentioned by the government issuing the same.

No nation can keep and maintain in circulation a money that can not be exchanged on sight for an equal amount in value (less exchange) of the money of any other country without disastrous results to its business and every commercial interest of its people. In other words, whatever kind of money we have it must be universal money. The currency of a country has been styled "the lifeblood of trade." And we might as well expect a man to be strong, healthy, and vigorous with rich, red blood circulating through his extremities and a thin, watery fluid through the veins and arteries of his trunk as to expect the great business enterprises of this nation to keep in a healthy, thriving condition with two kinds of money in circulation, one worth its par value anywhere on earth and the other that would only circulate at par within the boundaries of the United States. No, our money, which I before stated is the "lifeblood of trade," must circulate evenly, uniformly, not only through the great body of national, but through the greater body of international civilization.

At the present time the only money that does this on its own merits is gold coin, and under the present circumstances and the conditions as they now exist the only true money metal is gold. We may think, and many of us, myself among the number, do think, that such a condition of things ought not to exist, but that it does exist is beyond all question and dispute.

Why is it that a twenty-dollar gold piece is worth the face value anywhere in the world? Is it because the laws of the United States say that it shall pass current for that amount? By no means. No one will argue for a moment that if the United States should pass a law that an equal weight of lead or of iron or of silver should pass current for $20 that it would immediately assume that value in countries that had no such law, or that all the legislation that could be enacted could make it purchase here in this country as many commodities or as much labor as a twenty-dollar gold piece that will pass current for its face value anywhere on earth.

The idea is too preposterous for a moment's consideration by thinking men. Will a twenty-dollar gold piece pass current everywhere because the same is intrinsically worth $20? I do not think so. I understand the intrinsic value of such a gold coin to be just what the bullion composing the same would be worth in the markets of the world for the uses of the arts, sciences, and for ornaments, provided that no nation on the face of the earth would receive it at their mints and coin it into money on any terms whatever. I have never yet encountered an individual that maintains that if all or a greater portion of the nations of the world would refuse to receive gold bullion at their mints and coin the same back to the presenter but that one of the principal elements of its value would be destroyed and that it would immediately slide down the scale of prices.

A twenty-dollar gold piece is worth $20 anywhere in the world, because you can take it, either in the form of the coin or in bullion, to the mint of any nation and they will coin back to you an equal amount of "lawful-tender" money of that nation and containing as many grains of gold as your twenty-dollar gold piece, and, if you desire, you can take the money so coined back to the mints of the United States, and they will recoin for you a twenty-dollar gold piece again. (There may be some slight exchange charge, and in some cases small mintage charges, but the statement is approximately correct.) It is universal money, and the reason that it is such money is because it is universally received at the mints of the world and freely coined, and the coinage so put forth is universally recognized and received as "lawful-tender" money. Money that can be exchanged for its face value anywhere in Christendom for anything you may desire to purchase; money with which you can discharge any obligation calling for the payment of money, no matter where the same may be held and by whom owned. Understand me, I do not mean that gold coin is the only kind of money that will perform these functions at the present time, but it is the only money that will do it on its own merits, and gold is the only substance out of which you or I can get this money coined or created. These conditions make a gold coin universally worth its face value, and not because the bullion composing the same is "intrinsically" worth its face, or because any single individual nation so coins or so receives it.

Now, I think I am warranted in saying that if the advocates of free coinage can produce proof that if the opening of our mints to the free unlimited coinage of silver at the rates of 16 to 1, independent of the action of any other nation, will confer upon the coinage so put forth this quality of universality, there would not be a dozen members in this House who would vote against this measure.

And I submit that the advocates of such coinage should cease their lectures on ancient history, the alleged crime of 1873, abandon their absurd position of the divinity of the 16 to 1 ratio. Stop talking about the distressed condition of the country, to which I think no one will for a moment question other causes largely contributed, and show by some tangible argument that legislative enactment can inject a value of 50 cents into every 412 grains of silver and change the international ratio of silver from 30 to 1 to 16 to 1.

But in all the arguments advanced by the able advocates of such action I have listened and listened in vain for an argument along this line—they have kept clear of this point.

And in such a course they have manifested good judgment. The facts are: Logic, reason, judgment, and history are against such a proposition.

It is a perfectly logical conclusion that if the United States by independent legislative action can by affixing its official stamp to a given amount of silver increase its value 50 per cent and raise the international ratio from 30 to 1 to 16 to 1, by similar action they could make the ratio 15 to 1, 10 to 1, 5 to 1, and increase the value correspondingly. We could stamp the mystic words "this is a dollar" on 2 cents' worth of alluminium, and it would be a dollar. We could print it on an unlimited number of pieces of paper and it would "go."

Our Republican friends advocating this measure repudiate with scorn the idea of fiat money, but the same principle of fiatism enters into the independent coinage of silver at 16 to 1 as enters into the Populist idea of fiat paper money. It is only a difference of degree. In one case the fiat is 50 cents, in the other it is 100 cents. And the Populist party is the only party that has ever officially declared for fiat money, either in part by declaring for the unlimited, unrestricted free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 by the United States alone, or by the issue of an unlimited amount of irredeemable paper money, and I will venture the prophecy here and now that it is the only party that will so declare.

From the first organization of our Government down to 1873, silver was admitted to free coinage in our mints and also the different mints of the world, with one notable exception, England, who abandoned bimetallism and came to monometallism in 1816, and from the time of our first mintage act, 1792, down to 1873, the commencement of the period of general demonetization of silver by the commercial nations of the world, the commercial ratio between gold and silver only varied from 15.17 parts of silver to 1 of gold in 1792, to 15.92 parts of silver to 1 of gold in 1873, or only seventy-five one-hundredths of a point, and bear in mind, please, that during the time I have just mentioned the leading commercial and monetary nation of the world abandoned bimetallism and came to monometallism. From 1873 down to the present time, during which period the following nations have abandoned bimetallism and have come to monometallism, or, if you prefer the term, have discontinued the coinage of silver: Belgium, Germany, and the United States in 1873; France, Italy, Switzerland, and Greece in 1874; Holland in 1875, Austro-Hungary in 1879, Roumania in 1892, India in 1893, and Brazil and Chile in 1894, the commercial ratio between silver and gold has changed from 15.92 parts of silver to 1 of gold in 1873 to 32.56 to 1 in 1894.

In 1816 England abandoned bimetallism and came to monometallism, but the other nations of the world having refused at that time to follow her lead such action on her part did not materially affect the ratio between the two metals or tend to lessen the price of silver bullion to any great extent in the markets of the world. But from 1873 down to the present time all the great commercial nations of the world have discontinued the free coinage of silver and the commercial ratio has changed from 15.92 to 1 in 1873 to 32.56 to 1 in 1894.

At the present time Japan, Mexico, the Central American and some of the South American Republics are the only nations that open their mints to the free coinage of silver. In China silver is lawful tender, but it is not generally coined, and a person of ordinary judgment can readily see that if these nations were to abandon its coinage and follow the lead of the rest of the nations of the world and come to monometallism the ratio would become still greater and the price of silver bullion would take another drop.

From the above brief statement I deduce the following propositions:

First. That one of the principal causes of the present low price of silver and the enormous increase in ratio between the two metals has been caused by its general demonetization by the leading nations.

Second. That its demonetization by a single nation, even the most important monetary and commercial one, could not destroy its monetary functions or materially affect the ratio or the price of silver bullion.

Third. Reasoning from the well-known axiom that it takes at least as great a power to restore as it does to destroy, it follows that no single nation can restore such monetary functions, bring back the old ratio, or enhance its price, and it also follows that no single nation can prevent such restoration if a majority of the nations agree thereto.

Fourth. That the only way such monetary function can be restored and the old ratio and price regained is by the conjoint action of at least a majority of the leading nations and a mutual agreement on their part to open their mints to its free coinage at an agreed ratio with gold, and a mutual agreement on their part to receive such coinage as "lawful-tender" money.

The advocates of the free coinage of silver point to the present depressed condition of the country and attribute it to the demonetization of the white metal, but will the facts warrant the statement.

For thirty years the country had been traveling the highroad of prosperity under Republican administration of national affairs, until it reached the flood tide in 1891 and 1892, but after the election of 1892, when it became a certainty that the Government in all its branches was to be turned over to the Democracy, who came into power upon a political pledge to wipe out "the robber Republican protective tariff" from the statute books and to enact in lieu thereof "tariff-for-revenue" legislation looking toward ultimate free trade.

Then trouble commenced good and hard. Importers ceased to import, waiting for the expected reduction.

American manufacturers reduced their output for fear of becoming loaded with goods which, owing to foreign competition, they feared they might be compelled to have put on the market at a losing price.

When it became known to the observant, early in the year of 1892, that Democracy would triumph, the financial atmosphere became chilly. When that triumph became assured by the election of November of that year, a frost fell, and when that triumph culminated in that masterly measure of incompetency known as the Gorman-Wilson tariff law a regular winter blizzard of panic swept over the country, costing this nation untold millions.

I will say nothing of the direful effects of that panic upon the people. It is history. A recital of broken fortunes, blasted prospects, ruined hopes, of want, woe, and suffering written upon the pages of time in the tears of the multitude.

There can be no question but this condition was caused principally by the invasion and still further threatened invasion of our protective tariff system.

And to my mind the only remedy is to return to full power that party under whose policy the nation prospered with a wonderful prosperity. In my opinion, if this question is to be settled at all it must be settled by the Republican party. It is the only party that has settled affirmatively any question during the last thirty years. It settled the question of human slavery, settled it forever, and settled it right. It settled the tariff question in favor of protection to American labor and American industries, and when this Government again passes under its control, as it surely will, I believe it contains statesmanship enough to grasp and solve the much-discussed money question, not in favor of the goldites or silverites, but in favor of the people, and all the people. [Applause.]

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to avail myself of this opportunity of making a permanent addition to the literature on the subject of finance. I will ask to be allowed, as I believe I am already under the special rule permitted to do, to have printed in the RECORD, in the ordinary type, the speech of the Hon. J. Z. GEORGE, of Mississippi, delivered at Winona, Miss., on Saturday, July 13, 1895. I do not desire to take up any time, Mr. Speaker, in asking permission to print this speech, but there have been so many men who have come to Congress in recent years, so I have been informed, who talk one way before they come here and another way afterwards—in other words, they are educated after they get to Washington—that I want to put this celebrated and philosophical treatment of the financial question in the RECORD, to try and educate them right after they come here and keep them right after they are properly educated. [Applause.]

[Speech of Hon. J. Z. GEORGE on the financial question, delivered at Winona, Miss., Saturday, July 13, 1895.]

FELLOW-CITIZENS: I thank your committee for the invitation to address you to-day. I might indulge in recalling some pleasing recollections, especially of men and events, connected with this portion of the old county of Carroll, and the temptation is strong to do so. But the momentous questions now presented to you and the people of Mississippi for solution, the eagerness of the people to hear these questions discussed, the assembling of this large audience of anxious and intelligent citizens, admonishes me that I should at once proceed in the discussion which you have assembled to hear.

The real question before us, that which underlies all others, and that on which hinge all others, is this: Have the people of the United States the right to govern themselves, or is this great duty to be usurped by the banks and their allies, the creditor classes of this country and of Europe? Is this a Government of the people, by the people, and for the people, or is it a Government of banks, by the banks, and for the banks?

I include in the term banks not only those engaged in a strictly banking business, but a large number of others being holders of and dealers in money and moneyed securities; speculators in bonds and stocks and in contracts for the future delivery of commodities—appropriately called gamblers in agricultural products—and all those who look to the banks for the means of carrying on any speculation.

This contest has assumed at present the aspect of a struggle about the currency; it is in substance but a continuation of the contest waged from the beginning of the Government by special and privileged interests to seize, and then to appropriate to their own use, the powers and functions of the Government, granted for the good of all. Sometimes this contest is mostly marked by efforts to destroy the people's right to free trade—to buy and sell in such markets as are most beneficial to them. Under the operation of laws favored by such men not less than $20,000,000,000 have been transferred from the pockets of producers to Government favorites. Sometimes this contest assumes the aspect of securing large bounties from the people's property—sometimes in money and sometimes in other property. Through it has been secured to the favorites of the Government land grants to the amount of near 200,000,000 acres, making a territory four times as large as the State of Mississippi, besides many millions in money.

It has secured from the highest judicial tribunal a decision on the income tax contrary to the ruilngs of that court for a century, by which these men who had perverted thus the power of the Government for their own enrichment procured for themselves an exemption from a just share of the contributions of the people to the support of the Government. In whatever shape it has appeared, it is in fact but the same old eternal and never-ceasing conflict in which the prize fought for was on the one hand the power and the opportunity to use the Government for private ends and on the other a struggle by the people for a fair, just, and equal Government, upholding, advancing, protecting the interests and rights of all alike, with no special favors to any. In fact, it has been in all its shapes a contest between money and its owners and devotees and the great mass of the people; a contest to determine whether money and its satellites and henchmen should rule this fair land for aggrandizing the few or whether the people should rule with such laws and policies as would best subserve the common good—the general welfare.

ATTEMPT TO CORRUPT THE ELECTIONS.

The value of money consists in its purchasing power. This purchasing power has, as will be seen before I conclude, been greatly enhanced. It is now proposed to enhance it further by applying it to a new object of human desire—at least new in Mississippi. As illustrating the nature of this contest now going on in this State, and showing that I am right in what I have said about it, I will read extracts from a journal of high repute among bankers, the Financial Chronicle, published in New York and dated June 22 of this year. The editorial is headed:

A SURE WAY TO DEFEAT FREE SILVER.

It proceeds:

> The seats of several United States Senators are being contested in the South that might possibly be gained for advocates of a stable currency by a little judicious assistance on the part of the North. We can not vote there, but we can send money, by means of which the work of educating the people could be continued—a work that is most effectively done in that section by public speaking at political meetings. The question we want to ask is, Why should not the sound-money candidate in each State, the one who appears to offer the best promise of success, be furnished with the means of conducting his canvass?
>
> What we advocate is a thoroughly organized movement—not to talk, not to write letters, not to prepare sound-money plans, for every editor's table is groaning under the load it is bearing of that kind of literature—but to induce every man to put his hand in his pocket and give what he is willing to give to defeat these enemies to commercial prosperity.

Then, after dilating upon the very great importance of defeating the silver men, the article suggests the employment of the chamber of commerce as a proper agent to execute the designs of the gold monometallists, and then states:

> All we desire is that the amount of the fund should bear some relationship to the object to be sought and the danger to be averted. Our people have borne this cross by laying down under it and coquetting with it long enough. It is about time now to bestir ourselves and shake it off.

The article of course does not openly advocate bribery—the purchase of men and votes. Its pretense is to raise money only to enable gold-standard candidates for the United States Senate to conduct their canvass. It proposes to select the candidate in each Southern State having the best prospect of success, and give him the funds for making the canvass.

As there are only three Southern States in which there are canvasses for the United States Senate—Mississippi, Maryland, and Kentucky—this paper, for three men, one in each State, proposes to raise money to aid them in making the canvass. If only the natural and ordinary expenses to be incurred in a canvass were intended, then the sum of $1,000 in each State is ample. But if money is to be used for the purpose of debauching voters, hiring itinerant speakers, buying venal newspapers, then there will be needed that large sum of money which the Chronicle article indicates should be raised. It will be noted that there is to be a thoroughly organized movement to induce not one man, but to induce every man "to put his hand in his pocket" to defeat the free-silver movement. Of course this language is never applied in a community of rich men, each being able to contribute the sum of $100,000 or more if he saw proper, to induce men to make efforts to raise the paltry sum necessary to pay the expenses of making a personal canvass of the three men in the respective States.

I have read the extract in order to show you the nature of the contest in which we are now engaged—not only a contest with the money power for the guidance of the destinies of the people, but a contest with that power armed with gold to be freely spent in an effort to gain the mastery over us.

I do not think I miscalculate when I say that the effort on the part of the New York bankers to control our elections by money will have no other effect than to deepen and intensify the opposition of our people to the rule of men who subordinate all other human interests to the aggrandizement of those who are already overrich.

OUR COINAGE LAWS.

Our money, or our materials for money, has been fixed by nature. Gold and silver, from the earliest periods, have been used by mankind for money—primary money—money, as it is called, of final payment. So that when a transaction was concluded and money of gold or silver was paid, it was a finality.

In this situation our fathers found these metals at the adoption of the Constitution which gave to Congress the power to coin them into money and regulate its value. This was the situation when that same Constitution, recognizing them—both of them, not one alone—as full money metals, prohibited the States from making anything else than gold and silver a legal tender for the payment of debts.

So when our fathers, in 1792, came to establish a mint and to inaugurate coinage in the United States, they had all these facts and more before them, and recognizing the advantage of bimetallism they admitted to coinage both gold and silver and fixed a ratio of 15 to 1, being 3 per cent less than the French ratio, which was 15½ to 1. Owing to the fact that our ratio valued silver more highly than it was valued in France, we had mainly a silver currency from 1792 to 1834. The silver dollar itself was made the unit or standard of value. In 1834, in order to favor the gold mines in our own country, the ratio was changed so as to be practically 16 to 1. And in this ratio gold was overvalued and silver went to France and other places where it was valued higher than in our mint regulations.

Thus currency and coinage matters stood till 1873, when silver was demonetized.

ACT OF 1873—DEMONETIZATION.

This action of Congress was furtive. It came from an omission in a law of many sections, codifying the laws in relation to coinage. While other features of this long law underwent discussion, it appears that this peculiar feature, the demonetization of silver, was so managed in debate that its practical effect escaped the attention of such men as Senator Thurman and Mr. W. D. Kelley and many others of equal distinction, and finally the bill was approved by President Grant without knowledge that this provision was in it.

Mr. Groesbeck, one of the American commissioners to the International Monetary Conference of 1878, in addressing that body, aptly and truly described the circumstances attending demonetization in these words:

> From 1792 to this day, when by a sort of inadvertency in 1873 the silver standard was superseded, not a merchant, not a banker, not a manufacturer not an establishment, nor an interest of any kind could be cited as having raised any objection to the simultaneous use of the two metals. Bimetallism is, therefore, in the United States not only a tradition of the law, but has entered deeply into the habits of the people.

It was enacted stealthily through the machinations of men interested in appreciating money, with not only no demand on the part of our people, or of any considerable portion of them, for such action, but in opposition to their wishes and in derogation of their rights.

At the date of the passage of this law the United States were on a paper basis; neither gold nor silver circulated as money. This condition of affairs was very favorable to the success of the conspiracy.

Yet it was some time afterwards discovered that demonetization had taken place, and from that date till now the people, without distinction of party, have clamored for a repeal of the act of 1873. The banks have all along resisted, and up to now with success.

THE CONSPIRACY.

That the act of 1873 was the result of a conspiracy, having its members both here and in Europe, we have the authority of Mr. Carlisle, speaking on the subject in February, 1878, when the events attending that transaction were fresh in the memory of men.

That he was correct in this I have no doubt. The circumstances demonstrate that he was correct.

The banks and money holders in this country have acted exactly as if they were in the conspiracy.

They had also the motive, to wit, self-interest, to conspire.

When the conspiracy succeeded, however secret their machinations may have been before that time, they have been bold and open enough since, not only in defending the act, but in resorting to all manner of measures to prevent undoing the wrong.

They are also in possession of the fruits of the crime, as was demonstrated by Mr. Carlisle in February, 1878.

JACKSON'S STRUGGLE.

It ought to be stated that the very name of national bank, or Bank of the United States, had been made odious to the people of the Union through the misconduct of that institution as it was exposed and denounced by Andrew Jackson. In the great struggle for the government of these States, Jackson had known and felt the great power of the bank. He had seen the baneful effect of the operation of the bank on free government. He determined to save his country by destroying it. At first he was opposed by a great party, but as time passed and men could look with entire composure and fairness upon that momentous struggle, the people of the United States almost with one voice pronounced Jackson right. The bank was generally conceded to be not only dangerous, but unconstitutional.

CHARTER OF BANKS IN 1864.

But in 1864, when war was flagrant between the States, the bonds of the United States issued for war expenses had increased enormously. It was deemed necessary to increase the advantages of those who purchased them. The scheme was to have national banks in fact, yet to conceal the name. So a bill was passed with this significant title: "To provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds and to provide for the circulation thereof." It became a law on June 3, 1864. The preceding acts, one in 1791 and the other in 1816, chartering United States banks, each plainly stated in its title that it was a "charter for United States bank." But this act of 1864 concealed its purpose, not only in its title, but all the way through the companies chartered by it being called associations, and in no instance "banks."

This was done to conceal from the people that national banks were created.

At once these banks, called associations, entered with avidity on the object expressed in the act chartering them, to wit: To provide a "national currency." Their interest was to furnish all of it. So they set up an agitation to retire all the greenbacks and many millions were retired.

As the law providing for the organization of national banks was created to increase the value of United States bonds by making them the basis of a national currency, so in the same interest the bondholders and banks persuaded Congress to pass an act on the 18th of March, 1869, declaring that all these bonds, though legally payable in any kind of lawful money, worth on an average, when used in buying these bonds, only 67 cents in coin, should be paid in coin only. By this law the bonds were enhanced in value about 50 per cent, and the burdens of the people correspondingly increased.

Having secured this advantage, the next step was to retire silver from circulation, so that the bonds would be payable only in gold, and so we had the act of 1873, as has been explained.

This act vastly increased the value of the bonds, and also vastly increased the burdens of the people. The banks and bondholders had now accomplished their purpose in securing a situation in which there would be no silver money to pay on the bonds, and therefore they would be paid in gold.

As soon, however, as the crime, as Mr. Carlisle justly calls it, was consummated, in the very next Congress, and in the very next year, to wit, on January 20, 1874, the conspirators threw off all disguise, so far as the national banks were concerned, and they procured a law to be passed enacting that the act of 1864, under which the banks were established as associations merely, and which was entitled "An act to provide a national currency secured by a pledge of United States bonds and to provide for the circulation and redemption thereof," should thereafter not be known by its name, but as "the national-bank act."

They felt very secure after the act of 1873 was passed. They confidently relied on always being able to stop any law for a repeal in one or the other of the two Houses of Congress or in the Executive Office. As it required a concurrence of all these to pass the law, so it required the concurrence of all to repeal it. As one of these could have effectually prevented the law from passing, so, it having passed, any one of them could continue it in force against the opposition of the other two.

This situation vastly strengthened the position of the conspirators in fighting against remonetization. Yet the sentiment throughout the country was strong for repeal, manifesting itself not only in the public expressions of the views of the people but also by votes of their Representatives in Congress.

The banks resisted the repeal of the demonetization act from the beginning. In October, 1877, more than a year before the time fixed by law for the resumption of specie payments by the Treasury, the House of Representatives passed a bill restoring free coinage by a vote of 162 to 34, Mr. Carlisle voting for it. In the Senate the banks succeeded in getting it amended so as to allow coinage to the amount of four millions per month, and to compel it to the amount of two millions. This was vetoed by the President (Hayes), but passed over his veto. It will be noticed, however, that in the year 1877, pending the agitation for the restoration of silver, the banks showed their enmity to it by predicting all sorts of disasters to the people, and especially in asserting that it would destroy confidence in the business situation, and to enforce this view they contracted their circulation by fifteen millions, in addition to the contraction of the year before of twenty-two millions, this last-named contraction being made to control the Congressional election of that year. So in the two years just preceding action on remonetization they contracted in all thirty-seven millions.

This was an enormous contraction and there was no means of remedying it, for greenbacks could not be increased, the limit being fixed in 1868, and neither gold nor silver was used as currency, we being then on a paper basis.

Having accomplished their purpose by defeating the Bland bill and reducing silver coinage to two millions per month—for the minimum under the law they knew would be the maximum coinage in actual practice—they immediately commenced expanding their circulation, adding seven and a half millions in 1878, and in the succeeding years up to and including 1882 still expanding, so that in that year the whole expansion amounted to forty and a half millions, notwithstanding the yearly addition to the currency of twenty-four millions of silver under the Bland-Allison law.

It should be noted here, as of special importance, that in the year 1881, to affect the action of Congress in relation to the finances, in which they were interested, they contracted in one day in New York alone $18,000,000. And so great was their desire to make money by expanding the currency, the banks, as soon as the emergency was over which caused the contraction of eighteen millions in one day, began to expand, so that in that very year this contraction of eighteen millions was made up and eleven millions more added to their circulation.

This brings us to the year 1883, in which was passed a new tariff and internal-revenue law. Under the law as it then stood the banks were taxed 1 per cent on the amount of their deposits and 1 per cent on their circulation, this last tax being imposed to pay to the United States the cost of printing and engraving the national bank notes. The banks wanted to get rid of all taxes. They pretended they could not successfully carry on banking with these taxes imposed, notwithstanding they had semiannually declared dividends larger than the gains of the ordinary business of the country. Having succeeded in demonetizing silver, with only a pitiful addition to the currency of twenty-four millions annually under the Bland-Allison law, and the volume of greenbacks being restricted and fixed by law, as I have shown, and the need for more currency being exigent and imperative, they determined to force Congress to yield to their demands for a repeal of all taxes, and so they contracted the currency nine millions. They succeeded in getting rid of the tax on their deposits, which was their main grievance, the tax on circulation, being a compensation for printing their notes, remaining.

OTHER SCHEMES OF THE CONSPIRATORS.

These were only a part of their schemes to control legislation in their own interest and to secure to themselves a monopoly of furnishing the currency of the country. From the very beginning they warred on silver, though silver coin at the ratio of 16 to 1 was then at a premium of 3 per cent. The charge then made was not as now, that the silver dollar was too cheap. The true animus was to destroy one-half of the money of the country, as Chevalier attempted in France as to gold on the discovery of Californian and Australian gold mines, so that the profits of the banks might be increased, though at the expense of the welfare of the people. They resisted the small coinage compelled by the Bland-Allison law of 1878 of two millions per month. Though every dollar coined was the equal of any other dollar and was needed in the commerce and business of the country, they refused to receive silver and silver certificates on deposit, and refused to allow balances in the clearing house to be paid in silver coin and certificates. Congress was obliged to correct this in 1882.

THE GOVERNMENT AIDED THE BANKS.

In the meantime the Treasury Department from the beginning (Mr. SHERMAN being Secretary at the date of the act authorizing coinage), took the side of the banks as against the people in discriminating against silver money. Though allowed to coin forty-eight millions annually, the Treasury Department refused to coin more than one-half that sum. The Department regularly acknowledged the justice of the claim of the banks and bondholders to be paid only in gold, though the law was plain that they were equally payable in silver and silver was at par with gold. The Department paid everybody else in silver—paid officials, paid laborers on the public works, paid sailors and soldiers in silver; for the bondholders only silver was not good enough, and they were paid in gold. This discrimination, as will be seen hereafter, tended to create a disparity between gold and silver and to give color to the clamor that silver could not be maintained at a parity with gold.

SHERMAN LAW OF 1890.

Notwithstanding the machinations of the conspirators and the actions of the Treasury Department; notwithstanding the outcries and denunciations of the metropolitan press and the clamor of the banks, the bondholders and their allies, silver, safe and sound money, which had served the people faithfully and well, maintained its place in their confidence. They were quite content to use the money of the Constitution, the money Washington and Jefferson gave them, and the money fostered and trusted by Jackson, Clay, Calhoun, and Webster. The complaint the people made was only that there was not enough of it. The people still demanded a correction of the crime, as Mr. Carlisle called it, of demonetization. So in 1890 the House of Bepresentatives passed another free-coinage measure, restoring to the people the ancient constitutional right to use both gold and silver. Again the banks and bondholders and their allies schemed to defeat the people. They forced a compromise through the action of the Senate, and the Sherman law was the result. It authorized the purchase and coinage of 54,000,000 ounces of silver annually. This was a large increase in the currency and gave great relief. The banks of course disliked it, but it was far better for their purposes than free coinage, for it still kept the ban of demonetization on silver. It still made the uncoined surplus a mere commodity, with its value regulated by the use of silver in the arts only; and thus widened more and more the difference in the market value of silver and of gold.

As every ounce of gold could be carried to the mints and there coined without cost to the owner, of course the bullion value and the coin value was the same; but as only a portion of the silver bullion could be coined, the uncoined and uncoinable surplus fixed the bullion value of the whole. Now note: I said the uncoined and uncoinable surplus of silver fixed the bullion value of the whole; but it fixed the bullion value only; for silver coined, by the mere act of coinage, is endowed with a function denied to the uncoinable surplus, as I shall show hereafter, and this function, the money function, gave it money value.

By this forced compromise the banks and bondholders gained a great victory, for its effects now furnish them with their only plausible argument against free silver.

Having defeated free coinage, and substituted for it that miserable makeshift for free coinage, a purchase of a limited quantity only of silver, leaving a large uncoinable surplus, the bankers and bondholders and their allies were quite content to bide their time for the reenactment of the law of 1873 prohibiting entirely the further coinage of silver. They knew the power they possessed as the owners and dominant controllers of the money and the finances of the world. They were more and more impressed with the necessity for final and conclusive action, putting an end to silver as money. For under the first operation of the Sherman law and the votes of Congress on free coinage, which seemed to presage that we were on the eve of full remonetization by the United States, silver bullion went up to $1.20 per ounce—within a small fraction of full parity with gold, at the ratio of 16 to 1. Within a few months after the enlarged use of silver provided for by the Sherman law the Baring failure occurred, which shook to its center the fabric of British finance, compelling the Bank of England to borrow from the bank of bimetallic France $50,000,000 gold. This enlarged use of silver, thus authorized by our law, saved the United States from any serious disturbance from this panic. This is admitted by even the enemies of silver. This helped the free-coinage sentiment. The conspirators saw the danger, yet they were confident in their power and they waited patiently for the opportunity to strike a successful blow.

THE PREPARATION TO REPEAL SHERMAN LAW.

They intended to make no mistake as to preparation. In 1892 the candidates of the two great parties for President were known to be unfriendly to action by the United States alone. The managers from Wall street succeeded in getting the national convention of each party to make a platform on the silver question which looked like a declaration for free coinage, and yet by artifice and trick was capable of the construction that international agreement was necessary for action. So, after the election, an international conference was held, and though its deliberations and discussions showed fear and trepidation if the war on silver was continued, yet an adjournment was had without final action.

The adjournment was to the 30th of May, 1893, at which time there were both hopes and fears that favorable action would be had. The conspirators knew that the United States held that position which enabled them absolutely to control the situation. The sentiment of the United States as exhibited in the Presidential election of 1892 was as strong, if not stronger, for free coinage than ever. For the first time since 1860 the Democrats held the full power of the Government. The Democrats in the main had all along favored free coinage. The declaration in their platform had denounced the Sherman law as a cowardly makeshift for free coinage and had explicitly declared for silver as well as gold as standard money.

The trouble only was about the parity of the two moneys in the ratio of coinage. They knew if the United States determined on independent action that action would be a success. The power of the United States was so great in this respect, as I shall demonstrate, that they knew that action by them, independent action, would compel other nations to follow or surrender to the United States the scepter of the world's commerce.

THE CONSPIRATORS STRIKE THE BLOW.

So the situation was one of distress and danger to the conspirators. The period was critical. The time seemed to be opportune. An effort to defeat remonetization, if not successful, would only leave them in the situation they then occupied; if successful, it would make them lords of the world. So, about the last day of November, in the fateful year 1892, they determined to strike the blow. Quick "as the lightning from the collied night," as unexpected as the lightning at midday from a cloudless sky, and with the destructive force of a thunderbolt, the blow fell upon the innocent victims, the people of America. They said, "Let there be a panic," and there was a panic.

GOLD EXPORTATIONS.

Recall the situation on the 30th day of November, 1892. On that day ended the two months in which the net imports of gold were over four and a half millions. In December following, the next month, the exports of gold suddenly ran up to $12,899,727. These exports continued to increase monthly till the 30th of May, the date fixed for the reassembling of the International Monetary Conference. The conference failed, and England had determined to stop free coinage in India. Then they suddenly fell to $2,771,226 in June, and from that date the scale was turned—the repeal of the Sherman law was assured. In July and August the net imports of gold amounted to about sixty millions.

THE COUNTRY TERRIFIED.

The clamor raised about the exports of gold in December, 1892, and the months following terrified the country, as it was ascribed to our improper monetary system—the enlarged use of silver under the Sherman law. During this factitious panic the New York banks refused payment of their deposits—refused to send the money they owed to banks in other cities. Business men were refused accommodations; money was hoarded, and harsh and unconscionable bargains forced on those who needed money to sustain their credit, and at the same time a clamor was raised to repeal the Sherman law and to issue United States gold bonds to the amount of hundreds of millions with the pretense of securing a return of the millions which the bankers and bondholders had exported to get up the panic.

FINANCIAL SITUATION NOVEMBER 30, 1892.

Let us turn our attention again to the financial situation in the fall of 1892, when the panic was inaugurated, and to the situation during all the time of the existence of the Sherman law. This situation fortifies the position beyond controversy that there was no occasion for the panic.

If what has already been said is not sufficient proof, consider the following:

On the 30th day of November, 1892, the end of the two months of an excess of gold importations into the United States, and the eve of the period when gold exportations were, by the action of the conspirators, to commence, the situation exhibited no signs of the coming storm. Your situation, your condition as cotton-growers, impaired greatly by the demonetization of silver, was more favorable than it ever has been since. Though not a paradise as compared to the happy time when silver was freely coined, as it was brought to the mint, it was a heaven itself, as compared to the distress and misery into which the conspirators have plunged us. On that day, the 30th of November, 1892, notwithstanding we had raised and marketed the largest amount of cotton ever raised in three successive years, the crop of the first of these being the largest ever grown before, the crop of the second being larger than the first, and the crop of the last being larger than that, being 24,989,000 bales in all three, and being immensely larger than the crop of any preceding successive three years—I say on that day middling upland cotton was worth in New York 9$\frac{1}{16}$ cents per pound—within a small fraction of $50 per bale. Under the influence of this panic—made to order—it was made to decline continuously, with slight temporary advances and falls, caused by speculation, till it reached $7\frac{1}{16}$, on the 30th of August, 1893, a fall of $2\frac{5}{16}$ per pound on a crop of seven and a half millions, a loss of ninety-seven and a half million dollars on the crop of one year.

OUR FOREIGN COMMERCE AGAINST GOLD EXPORTS.

Turn our attention again to the 30th of November, 1892. We find the situation still more adverse to gold exports and the consequent panic based on them. The returns of the Treasury for the preceding fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, showed the most favorable condition of our foreign commerce. Our exports for that year amounted to $1,030,278,148, exceeding imports by $202,875,686. Our exports had never reached $900,000,000 but in one year before, viz., in 1881, and had never reached as much as $800,000,000 in more than four other years before, to wit, in 1880, 1883, 1890, and 1891. Our exports of gold over imports in the year ending June 30, 1892, were less than one-half million, the lowest that they had been since the year 1888, when the excess was of imports and in our favor. That there should be some exports of gold was natural, as we were large producers of gold—about thirty-three millions annually. So it is seen that the condition was such as to indicate necessary prosperity and confidence in business and not distrust or a panic.

OUR INTERNAL COMMERCE FAVORABLE.

Turn now to the internal commerce of the country so far as exhibited by the transactions of the banks, and that tells you the same tale of absolute confidence in the currency and of hope in the future.

The clearing houses, which exist only in about sixty cities in the Union, show that commercial paper, bills of exchange, and bank checks to the amount of about $62,000,000,000 were settled in them in the year ending the 30th of September, 1892, as large if not larger than in any one year before. These transactions did not report one-fifth or even one-tenth of the internal business and traffic of the country.

Let us see now how the banks themselves and the business men, as they are called, acted.

BANKS AND BUSINESS MEN SAW NO CAUSE FOR PANIC.

In the year ending October 2, 1892, less than two months before the panic began, the deposits in the banks amounted to $243,800,000, more than in either of the two preceding years. The national banks increased their capital stock by $64,000,000 over the year 1889. They also increased their loans to $2,171,000,000 as compared with $1,805,700,000 for the year 1889, being an increase of $365,300,000.

Business men do not increase their investments if they distrust the condition of the currency and anticipate a panic. They do exactly the reverse. They prepare for the coming storm by reefing sail—contracting their business and their credits. Banks do exactly the same.

I mention now, for fear I may omit it, as a conclusive evidence that the banks originated that panic—made it to order—to gain a control over the finances of the nation by completely demonetizing silver; that they acted all along up to May, 1893, as if they were masters of the situation; that they could still the financial storm which they had raised; that from October 2, 1892, to May 1, 1893, including five months of the panic, they increased their loans so that they were nearly as much in those seven months as they had been in the preceding twelve months, which, as I have stated, was largely in excess of those loans in any preceding year.

I have now shown by proof, strong and conclusive at every step, that the banks and bondholders and their allies, in their efforts to thoroughly destroy silver as a money metal, made war on silver money from the beginning, by entering into the conspiracy to pass the demonetization act of 1873—as charged by Mr. Carlisle—by refusing to recognize silver money for deposits, by contracting or enlarging the currency as best suited their ends to destroy silver, and by creating a factitious panic, commencing in December, 1892. It now remains only to show that they had an interest, and a great interest, separate and apart from and adverse to the people, in destroying silver money, and, if need be, at any cost to the people.

INTERESTS OF THE BANKS IN DESTROYING SILVER.

The banks and bondholders and their allies here held most of the gold in this country and their allies in Europe held it there. The effect of the demonetization was to increase the value of gold, as I shall show, and thus add, as an unearned increment, millions and millions of dollars to their wealth. But they had a further and more direct and palpable interest. By keeping money scarce they made it necessary to use those devices as a substitute for an insufficient currency which practically made them autocrats in the world of finance. The official documents show that there were only about $400,000,000 of gold in 1892 and 1893 in circulation in the United States.

These documents also show that the whole amount of money in the United States, current at that time, was about $1,600,000,000. It is also true, as I have stated, that the trade going through the clearing houses alone in 1892 amounted to over $61,000,000,000. It is also true that the annual trade and traffic and business in the country, the demands to pay taxes, interest on the public debts, national, State, and municipal, corporation debts, and the workings of the railroads and water craft, called for at least five times as much more, possibly ten times as much. How all this business, amounting to at least $300,000,000,000, was to be done on the insignificant sum of $1,600,000,000 without increasing the volume of money was the problem to be solved. The nimble penny theory would not do it. So clearing houses, bills of exchange, and checks were put to an unwonted use.

It is admitted by our gold friends that all the business was transacted on about 5 per cent in money and the balance in credits or confidence. But for even that 5 per cent the money of the country was insufficient. So by the necromancy of banking, or of bookkeeping, or whatever else we may call it, we find that the banks, State and national, so arranged that with only $1,600,000,000 in the whole country, including all that large sum in the hands of persons who do not make deposits in banks, the average deposits in the banks in 1892 amounted to within a small fraction of $5,000,000,000—more than three times the whole amount of all money in the country, including all in the State and municipal and corporation treasuries and kept in the hands of private persons. This device is astounding, and would seem to result from some system of bookkeeping known only to the bankers, if it were not for the fact that they actually loaned and received interest on more than four and a quarter billions. By this device the banks were enabled to draw interest on not only all the money they owned, but on all that everybody else owned; and not only this, but on about three times as much money as all the money in the country, or, to be exact, they draw interest on $2.70 for every dollar in circulation in the United States. They did this on a capital of $900,000,000, being loans to the amount of more than five times their capital, with two-thirds of the capital of the national banks otherwise profitably invested than in loans. And in this way they loan and draw interest on a sum equal to all the gold money in the world. Of course they did not want more real money, more silver money, for an increase of the real money would have diminished the necessity for sham money—for these devices which they substitute for real money.

THE DEVICES DANGEROUS TO THE PEOPLE.

If we stop now and reflect a moment we will find the situation such as to cause the greatest apprehension on the part of patriots, and to demand the most strenuous and unremitting efforts on the part of the banks and their allies to preserve it. We see that in banks alone, independent of their allies, is concentrated the power to furnish or withhold 95 per cent of the financial means by which the trade of the country is carried on. If they contract, commerce withers and dies. If they expand unduly, we have that inflation for a season which creates wild and reckless speculation, leading to inevitable disaster to the country. If they mistake as to their securities, or if any considerable number of their favored customers mistake in the investments they make, there is a loss of confidence, a panic, the disastrous results of which lasts for years, overturning fortunes, throwing labor out of employment, crushing out the prosperity and happiness of the whole people.

These are the causes for opposition on the part of the people. These are also the very causes which commend the system to the favor of the banks. It makes them the absolute masters of the fortunes of the people and enables them to acquire the great wealth by which this mastery is to be perpetuated. The necessity for these devices to supply the wants occasioned by an insufficient money volume makes the people tolerate them. If we had free and unlimited coinage of silver money to supply in part this insufficiency we would have no need for these devices; we would have a broader basis for credit and also less need for the credit itself. Need I tell you that the banks owed in 1892 and 1893, obligations payable on demand, nine times as much as the cash and cash items they had with which to meet them, or six times as much if we exclude the savings banks? The result is that with the least disturbance in financial circles anywhere we are in danger of a panic, and the banks having control of all this curiously devised machinery of credit may bring on a panic whenever it suits their interests to do so.

I conclude this part of the subject by introducing here two other witnesses besides Mr. Carlisle as to the agency of the banks and bondholders in creating this panic.

Senator VOORHEES, the able chairman of the Finance Committee, in a speech in the Senate, said:

> The shipments of gold which took place from this country in the last four or five months must be accounted for, to my mind, in a different way. They were a part of the same plan which attempted to sack the Treasury of its gold-reserve fund, to create distrust, fear, agitation, panic, and a withdrawal, as far as possible, of all money in circulation; and all this to be accomplished by a concerted outcry from terror-stricken business circles, and from the whole national-bank system, that nothing can restore confidence and save the public credit except the issuance of at least $300,000,000 of interest-bearing Government bonds.

Mr. HILL of New York said in a speech in the Senate:

Some portion of the present panic may be traced to a concerted effort on the part of numerous monometallists to produce it in order further to discredit silver as a part of the standard money of the country. That fact is apparent everywhere we turn.

And among their acts which contributed to this result he mentioned:

They encourage the hoarding of money; they inaugurated the policy of refusing loans to the people, even upon the best security; they circulated false petitions, passed absurd and alarming resolutions, predicted the direst disaster, attacked the credit of the Government, sought to exact a premium upon currency, and attempted in every way to spread distrust broadcast throughout the land.

He continues (I quote his language literally):

The best financial system in the world could not stand such an organized and vicious attack upon it. These disturbers, these promoters of the public peril, represent largely the creditor class, the men who desire to appreciate the gold dollar in order to subserve their own selfish interest, men who revel in hard times, men who drive hard bargains with their fellow-men in periods of financial distress, and men wholly unfamiliar with the principles of monetary science. It is not strange that the present monetary panic has been induced, intensified, and protracted by reason of their malign influences.

And the distinguished Senator from New York, immediately following the quotation I have made from his speech, used these words:

Having contributed much to bring about the present exigency, these men—

The monometallists and creditors described in the extract before quoted—are now unable to control it. They have sown the wind and we are now reaping the whirlwind.

Now, if this result be not correct, what other cause can be assigned for the panic? I have heard but one, and that is a want of confidence in our currency owing to coinage of silver. A sufficient answer to that is found in the fact that this very currency so attempted to be discredited sold in New York at 3 per cent premium during the very panic which is thus charged to have been created by its discredit.

EFFECTS OF REPEAL ON PRICE OF COTTON.

As I have stated, cotton was worth in New York on the 30th of November, 1892, when this made-to-order panic set in, $9\frac{15}{16}$, having risen to that point since September 1, the opening of the season, from $7\frac{3}{16}$. From the 30th of November, 1892, it continued to fall, but, though the panic was going on, did not fall below 9 cents till after the 22d of March, 1893, but continued falling till it reached $7\frac{5}{8}$ on the 30th of August, 1893, the end of the season. In September, 1893, the price in New York ranged from $7\frac{13}{16}$ to $8\frac{3}{8}$, and in October from $8\frac{1}{16}$ to $8\frac{3}{16}$, and stood at $8\frac{5}{16}$ on November 1, 1893, the day the Sherman law was repealed. We were promised an immediate revival of business on the repeal; confidence was to be restored, and the country was again to be happy and prosperous. Yet cotton on the day of the repeal was higher than it has ever been since. It kept falling from the day of the repeal, with only slight and spasmodic and short-lived advances, from $8\frac{5}{16}$ on November 1, 1893, to $6\frac{7}{8}$ on the 30th of August, 1894, the end of the season. These are New York figures, and my statistics for New York end on that day; but comparisons as to rise and fall may be as well and satisfactorily made on one market as on another.

Up to the end of the season in which the crop of 1892, a short crop, was marketed, cotton under the influence of this restored confidence fell $8.75 per bale. There was no confidence in business matters restored to the banks, for they had lost none. The confidence they got from the repeal of the Sherman law (or rather its purchasing clause) was an absolute confidence in their power to control Congress, and through its aid to control and dominate not only the finances, but the whole business interests of the whole country. The price of cotton still kept on falling. The cotton season of 1894 opened with the price on September 1, 1894, of $6\frac{7}{16}$ for middling cotton in New Orleans. It never afterwards got above that, and only reached that figure on six subsequent days; falling below 5 cents on two days in November and keeping a shade above 5 cents—less than a half cent—till March 14, and then it went along under 6 cents till April 11, and then it went to 7 cents on May 30, and so remained till June 7, and then it fell and has remained below 7 cents ever since.

You will take note, however, that of late years one-half of the crop is marketed by the middle of November, and the small rise which came at last came when all the cotton had substantially gone out of the farmers' hands.

The fall as compared with the price the day the Sherman law was repealed was over $10 per bale, and from the day when the banks inaugurated the panic—November 30, 1892—about $19 per bale.

Such, my friends, have been the effects of the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law.

FALL NOT PRODUCED BY LARGE CROP.

But our gold friends are fertile in excuses for the failure of their programme. Having made up their minds that silver coinage is wrong, and a double standard—to use the language of Mr. Carlisle—is mathematically and metaphysically impossible disappointed by the failure of all their predictions, yet unable to acknowledge they were mistaken, they continually look for some balm for their wounded spirits, and in this mood they stumble on the large crop of 1894 as the cause of all our woes. I do not deny that large crops diminish prices and small ones enhance them, or in other words, I acknowledge the potency of the law of supply and demand—I shall later on discuss this bugbear of overproduction; but just here it seems to be appropriate to puncture this idle bubble floating on the sea of mistakes and errors with which the discussion on the part of our gold friends is characterized.

Let us make some comparisons as to the effects of increasing crops on the price of cotton, when these crops on the one hand come under the influence of the addition to our currency made by the Sherman law and the Bland-Allison Act of 1878 and on the other under the influence of the repeal of both and a total cessation of the coinage of silver.

Let me preface that while one large crop affects prices it does not destroy them. One swallow does not make a summer. Cotton, unlike most other commodities, keeps without injury for years, and besides it never goes out of fashion. It takes several years together of extra large production to make a destructive fall.

The crop of 1889 (calendar year), marketed during the season ending 31st of August, 1890, was the largest ever grown up to that time, amounting to 7,297,000 bales, and the next crop—of 1890—was larger than that, amounting to 8,670,000 bales, and the next crop—of 1891—amounted to 9,018,000 bales. All these together amounted to 24,989,000, being over 4,000,000 greater than the aggregate crop of the three preceding years of 1886, 1887, and 1888, which last aggregate was larger than any three preceding years.

So that these three large crops of 1889, 1890, and 1891 came on the heels of the largest cotton production ever known; yet prices, though falling, as they must under silver demonetization, maintained themselves admirably during these three years of 1889, 1890, and 1891. The first of these crops ranged from $9\frac{1}{2}$ to $11\frac{7}{8}$ cents in New Orleans.

The crop of 1890 ranged from $11\frac{3}{4}$ to 8 cents, never falling below 8 till the 17th of June, 1891, when nearly all the crops had been marketed. Recollect this was also the largest crop ever raised, succeeding the largest then ever before grown. The crop of 1891 being the third in succession of the largest crops ever grown, and which, with the two preceding crops, produced the large aggregate of within a fraction of 25,000,000 bales, and being more than 4,000,000 larger than the aggregate of any three preceding crops in succession. This crop of 1891 sold for prices ranging from $8\frac{1}{2}$ to 7 cents, being a very little under 7 cents for less than ninety days in the months of January, February, March, April, and August. The crop of the next year, 1892, was also sold and marketed under the Sherman law, and, being a short crop, the price opened at 7 cents on September 1, and advanced, except four days in September, till it reached $9\frac{15}{16}$ on the 30th of November, when this panic, as we have seen, was inaugurated, and kept steadily above 9 cents, notwithstanding the panic, till February, and never got as low as 7 cents.

Then the Sherman law was repealed, and the next crop was a short one and cotton fell, as we have seen, from the date of the repeal constantly till it reached $6\frac{7}{16}$ at the close of the season.

Then came the crop of 1894, the only large crop of the three, but the largest ever made, being now estimated by the best authority at nine and three-fourths million bales. I need not tell you how low that fell. Now, this crop of 1894, together with the two preceding crops, amounted to only 23,746,000 bales, being in the aggregate 1,143,000 bales less than the three crops which preceded them. Under these conditions cotton ought not to have fallen below the price of the crop of 1891, but being nearly a million and a quarter bales less in the three years than in the three years preceding, it ought to have risen much higher than it was at the end of these three preceding years. It fell from the price at the end of those three years near 2 cents a pound for most of the season. The first three years were all marketed under the Sherman law, and the first of the last three years and a part of the second of the last three were also marketed under it, and up to the time of the repeal—November 1, 1893—prices kept up very well, and it was only after the repeal that the disastrous fall occurred. This is demonstration beyond controversy of the disastrous effects of the repeal.

ACTION OF THE MISSISSIPPI DELEGATION.

Now, it is complained that your two Senators and six out of the seven of your Representatives did wrong in voting against the repeal. Governor Stone especially condemns our action, and this condemnation is a part of the thunder of his campaign. Now, I was always glad to have the approval of so good a man as Governor Stone for my official acts; I always regretted his condemnation; but as much as I do prize the approval of so good a man, I prize more highly the approval of my own conscience; and especially when, acting according to my conscience, I have also acted for the happiness and welfare of the great people whose commission I hold. * * * When I do this, while I may regret the condemnation of any good man, I am content to abide any fate that may befall me.

FREE COINAGE.

This brings us directly to the great issue, was demonetization in 1873 an injury to the country, and is remonetization proper now?

The first question seems hardly worthy of discussion, at least in Mississippi. Governor Stone, the candidate of the gold men for the Senate, declares it to be both a wrong and a blunder, and hopes to see it corrected by an international monetary conference. Mr. Carlisle declared in 1878 that it was the result of a conspiracy formed here and in Europe, that it was the most gigantic crime of this or any other age, and that it would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilences, and famines that ever occurred in the history of the world. And Mr. Carlisle was right. But it will help to see this blunder and appreciate this wrong—this crime of all the ages—more clearly if we take a short view of its actual consequences.

In the first place, in the very year of its consummation, in 1873, occurred one of the most disastrous panics that ever afflicted mankind. Cotton fell from the date of its passage in February to the end of the year, though the crop marketed was a short one, from 19¾ cents in New Orleans to 15½, more than 4½ cents per pound, or $22.50 per bale. This was pretty bad for a start, but it kept on falling, with only slight variations, till November 1, 1893, the date of the repeal of the Sherman law, when it reached 7⅞ cents, and then its further fall was accelerated till it reached 4⅞ cents the last season. (These are New Orleans figures.) So the cotton farmer, at all events, can see how he has fared under the operation of the act of 1873. Compare 19¾ to 5¼ cents, a loss of 75 per cent nearly, and you can see the loss the farmer has sustained. He got last season a little over one-fourth the price that he got before this baleful act—this crime of all the ages, as Mr. Carlisle called it.

But it is denied that this fall was produced by demonetization. Let us see. Accurate tables of prices prepared by the best statisticians in the world, and which have been often published and never contradicted, show these convincing and unanswerable facts: That from 1850, when the money of the world was being increased by the large output of gold in California and Australia, general prices were constantly rising, so that in 1873 they were about 30 per cent higher than in 1850; and that from the very year of demonetization, 1873, they continually and persistently fell till they were lower in 1893 by between 35 and 41 per cent than in 1873. How could this happen except by and through the act committed in 1873—the demonetization of silver? Up to 1873 we had rising prices with increasing money supply, gold and silver being both used. From this very date, when money was contracting, one-half the world's money being disabled as a money metal, prices not only began to fall, but they continued to fall until a lower range of prices was reached this year than was ever known in our history.

The report of the gold and silver commission of Great Britain, made in 1888, showed that, while for many years prior to 1873 there had been a constant and continuous progress and advance in the trade of Great Britain, from that year—from that very year when silver was demonetized—a fall began and continued, so that while the total commerce of Great Britain in 1873 being represented by the number 62, that commerce in 1887, fourteen years afterwards, would be represented by the number 58; a fall of nearly 8 per cent in total value. But that does not tell the whole story. The numbers above named report only the proportion of the total value in money of the commerce. While the total value had thus fallen 8 per cent, the bulk of the commerce—the number of gallons, bushels, yards, and pounds—had increased in this proportion: The number representing all these bushels, yards, gallons, and pounds in 1873 was 38, and the number representing the same in 1887 was 56. Now, to make it plain, 38 of these bushels, gallons, yards, and pounds in 1873 sold for $62, and in 1887 56 of them sold for only $58. This same fall is shown in the returns of the years 1891, 1892, 1893, showing a large shrinking in value and a large increase in bulk. This shrinkage still continues. Dun's Trade Review, a first-class authority, shows that prices fell in August, 1894, to the lowest point ever reached prior to that time, and yet prices, as shown by the same journal, were lower in December, 1894, than in August of that year.

Many of the most intelligent gold-standard monometallists admit that this fall is in a great measure attributable to silver demonetization. Governor Stone admits that demonetization was a contributing cause. But some claim that the fall is attributable to improvements in machinery—cheapening production.

Undoubtedly there is some truth in this as to some articles. But as showing the difference between an increasing currency and a diminishing currency, I call attention to the well-known fact that improvements in machinery have all along been made. They were as great and important (and many claimed more so) between 1850 and 1873 as since, and yet we see prices rising all along from 1850 to 1873. I have no doubt that some of the fall in some of the articles manufactured mainly by machinery is due to improved machinery and cheaper methods, and so far as the fall is so attributable it is a benefit to mankind; but the far greater part came from silver demonetization, a scarcity of money, and a consequent inability of the people to buy. To that extent it is an unmitigated curse.

OVERPRODUCTION.

But it is again said that the falling prices are attributable to overproduction. In one sense there is overproduction, and that occurs whenever more commodities are produced than the people are able to buy at fair and remunerative prices, and this kind of overproduction comes whenever there is commercial and financial distress, when business lags and enterprise is hampered and the gains of the people are so diminished that they are unable to make their accustomed purchases. This kind of overproduction now affects us, coming from a contracting currency, as compared with the work money has to do; a scarcity of money; the low prices of labor and of the products of labor. I have before me a table made by one of the most intelligent men I ever knew, a farmer of Kansas, in which he states the average gains per acre of the farmer who raised corn, cotton, oats, and hay, for periods of five years, commencing in 1866 and ending 1893.

These gains or products per acre were in the first five-year period, as an average of the whole, $15.64 per acre, and in 1893 they were $8.15—a reduction of nearly one-half, $8.35 being the value per acre of cotton in 1893. If we bring this down to 1894, we find the average product of the cotton farmer to be not more than $5 or $6 per acre. This writer also adds that it is highly probable that agricultural products since 1885 have not exceeded the cost of production, so that of the 30,000,000 workers on farms those who have worked their own farms have made no more than reasonable wages for agricultural labors, throwing in the use of their land free of rent, and could purchase only the bare necessaries of life.

I wish to ask the farmers now present here if this is a true statement as to them? I wish every farmer here who on the average in the last five years has produced more than a fair return for his work as a laborer, with no charge for rent, to make it known. If there be any who have done better than this, I must ask them to rise, stand, and be counted. I have been looking for such a farmer for years and have not found him. [Not one rises.]

So, you see, my friends, that the purchasing power of the 30,000,000 of farmers in the United States has been so reduced, not being able to buy what they once bought; that there is that kind of overproduction which comes from a destruction of the purchasing power of the people. Increase this purchasing power and there will be no surplus.

That there has been overproduction in the sense that more commodities have been produced than the world needs and will buy under fair financial conditions I deny.

One-half of mankind at least—being a majority of the women, all infants of tender years, the diseased and disabled from any cause—are unable to produce anything, though they are all consumers.

At least a half of this capable one-half—including merchants, bankers, traders, seamen, railroad men and others engaged in land and water transportation, Government officials of all kinds, men and officers in the immense armies and navies in the world, the domestic servants of the rich, produce nothing. Of the remaining fourth, many are idle and will not labor; many from the financial condition of the world are enforced tramps and idlers, unable to procure work; many have either acquired or inherited that independence in estate that labor of any kind is unnecessary.

These and many others not enumerated deducted from the remaining fourth have so reduced the producing classes that with all the machinery possible they are unable to supply the wants of mankind. And yet, according to our gold friends, we have hard times; depression, wherein men are starving because too much food has been grown, and are freezing because too much clothing has been made.

To show clearly that this seeming overproduction is, in fact, but that surplus of commodities which remains unconsumed because the purchasing power of the great mass of the people has almost been wiped out, I will call attention to the fact that we never hear of any overproduction in those articles which are consumed by those whose purchasing power is not affected by the hard times. Did you ever hear of an overproduction of champagne wine, or of that old brandy worth $20 a gallon, or of one-thousand-dollar saddle horses, of diamonds and gems and spices, or of those silks and satin tissues, finer than a spider's web, used to adorn those celestial beauties whom fortune has made the wives and daughters of millionaires and of the great magnates of finance who control the money of the world? Never! Did you ever hear of an overproduction of gold and silver? Alas! I am too fast. We now hear of an overproduction of silver, caused by a denial by law of the right of the producing classes to use it in the only mode in which they can use it—as money.

But I proceed now to consider the alleged overproduction in which you are mostly interested—the alleged overproduction of cotton. Cotton is the cheapest of all the textiles suitable for clothing. It is for that reason the clothing of the masses throughout the world. So true is this that in some countries where cotton cloth simply is not warm enough for winter clothing, they double the cloth and place inside a padding of raw cotton—like our quilts and comforts—and thus use it for clothing. Dyes have been discovered which give as brilliant and lasting colors to cotton fabrics as are given to wool or silk. Improvements have been made in the staple, so that the finest and most delicate fabrics are produced. Then such improvement in the cheapness of manufacture has been attained in late years that now not one-third part of the cost of cotton yarn consists of the manufacturing of it, more than two-thirds being the cost of the raw material; whereas in 1779 the raw material was only one-eighth and the spinning seven-eighths of the cost. In 1819–1821 one hand in the mills produced 968 pounds of cotton cloth as compared with 5,900 pounds in 1887, and there have been vast improvements since. So that year by year the cost of cotton cloth has been approaching nearer and nearer to the cost of the raw cotton, whereby the demand for cotton cloth has been growing and growing, and production has been increasing and increasing to satisfy an ever augmenting demand for cotton goods.

The insufficiency of the supply of raw cotton for the needs of the world has caused kings, emperors, potentates, and great manufacturers to ransack the world to get more cotton. Millions have been spent in efforts by these men to have more cotton grown. They have spent immense sums in irrigation works to make the parched and thirsty earth yield the cotton fruitage to the plow of the husbandman, and in building railroads and canals to reach old cotton fields, and in bringing into cultivation new ones. And yet the world has never been supplied.

Let us look at some statistics about the matter. In the decade 1851–1860 the cotton crop of the United States was more than doubled, yet the demand was so great that the price in 1860 was as high as it was in 1851. That was before the demonetization of silver. Now, take a ten years under the influence of that baleful act, to wit, 1881–82 to 1891–92. In that decade the American crop increased only 65 per cent, though in it is included the largest crop ever grown up to that time, namely, 9,018,000 bales in 1891–92, and yet the price under the increase of only 65 per cent fell 60 per cent, instead of keeping up even as it did in the first decade named, when production was increased over 100 per cent. Everybody can understand the significance of these figures.

THE LARGE VISIBLE SUPPLY.

But our gold friends are not satisfied with this; they point to the large visible supply at the end of each season—the hundreds of thousands of bales on hand to commence the new season with.

These men forget that in these later years the consumption of cotton and cotton goods has enormously increased, and consequently that the demands of the manufacturers for raw cotton has also enormously increased—the weekly consumption of the mills being now immensely larger than ever—and that the supply in sight at the end of the season, as compared with other seasons, should be counted by the number of weeks—working weeks of the mills for which it is sufficient, rather than the number of bales. Taking this only true test, we find that on the 31st of August, 1861, the supply on hand or in sight was for a less number of weeks than in sight on the 31st of August, 1891, yet the average price for the year ending August 31, 1861, when this larger surplus existed, was 7.63d. as against 5.06d. in year ending August 31, 1891. The surplus in sight August 31, 1892, was also less than on August 31, 1861, and the price had fallen from 7.63d. to 4.18d. The same is true as to the next year, when the price was only 4.75d. as against 7.63 in 1861, and the same is also true the next year—ending August 31, 1894—last year, and you know what the price was then.

The least attention to the ordinary routine duties of family life would have taught our gold friends that as the demand grows large—as the number of consumers increase—the surplus of any kind of supplies at the end of a season is to be estimated and then compared with the supplies of another season when there was a less demand and fewer consumers; not by the actual pounds of supply on hand, but by the number of days or weeks or months for which the supplies would last. A supply for a family consisting of husband and wife for so many weeks or months would be vastly smaller in amount than a supply for the same family for the same period when it had increased to ten or a dozen in number. .

So you see that what emperors, czars, parliaments, and millionaire manufacturers could not do—cause overproduction—has been effected by bankers and bondholders; they have made overproduction by destroying the power of the people to buy what they need.

We have now seen that prices, especially of cotton, have declined regularly since demonetization in 1873, keeping equal pace with the growing scarcity of money as compared with the population and the growing commerce of the world, that the fall is attributable in but a small part, if at all, to improved and cheaper methods of production, and that the clamor of overproduction is a myth; that all these facts, taken in connection with the continually rising prices till the very year of demonetization, make such a conclusive chain of evidence as to establish beyond all doubt that demonetization was the cause.

But our gold friends, driven from every post, have made their next stand on the quicksand that low prices do no harm.

LOW PRICES NO REMEDY.

They say that if we are compelled to sell at low prices we also buy at low prices and in the end there is no difference. But the slightest reflection will teach us that in our present situation, certain to continue many years, low prices in purchases can be no compensation for low prices in sales; besides our condition is that we have had continually falling prices and not stable prices, even when very low. Without going into an extended argument on this point it is sufficient here to note that there are certain fixed charges that have not been reduced. Taxes have not been reduced. Salaries and pensions and railroad freights, on cotton at least, have not been reduced, and there are certain other charges which are fixed by custom, as fees of lawyers and physicians, that have not been reduced. At the present low prices, when all these have been paid out of the small income coming to the farmer from the low prices of cotton, the remainder has a far less purchasing power than the sum remaining after these payments have been made when prices are high.

To illustrate, we will suppose the purchasing power of a farmer who does all his work is five bales of cotton which at 10 cents a pound would bring $250. If these fixed charges, as I have stated, should, on an average, be $50 altogether, that would leave him $200 for the purchase of commodities.

Suppose cotton and all the commodities he purchases should fall one-half, so that the farmer's crop of five bales would bring only $125. In this case $75 would remain to purchase commodities instead of $200 as in the first case. But, as commodities have only fallen one-half, he should have $100 to purchase the same amount as before the fall; but he has only $75, a loss of one-fourth. He must increase his product one-third to make this good.

This means he must, by increased hours of labor, add two days' labor to each week; or if he worked nine hours before, with high prices, he must work twelve hours a day with the low prices to have the same amount of commodities. The difference between nine hours and twelve hours a day is the difference between health and vigor on the one hand and sickness and languor on the other—between cheerfulness and despair, between leisure for social enjoyment and mental improvement and that treadmill, constant, wearying labor, which sends the laborer to his bed for repose as soon as the allotted hours of labor have been completed. But it so happens, my friends, that while the price of all commodities has fallen on the average, as some claim, 33⅓ per cent, which is the exact equivalent to an increase of 50 per cent in the purchasing power of gold, yet agricultural products, especially cotton, have fallen much more. The price of middling cotton in New Orleans in February, 1873, when silver was demonetized, was 19¼ cents; the price in January, 1895, was a shade above 5 cents. Within a small fraction of three-fourths of the price has been lost.

I have not time to explain to you why agricultural prices, when there is a shrinkage in the volume of money, generally fall more proportionately than other prices.

But you see, not so much from what I have said as from your own observation and experience, that the fall in the price of things you buy is no compensation for the fall in the prices of cotton.

DEBTORS ARE RUINED BY LOW PRICES.

The low prices of commodities, however much they may mitigate the sufferings of those who have need for money only to make purchases, are utterly destructive to those who owe debts.

Governor Stone, in his letter announcing his platform for his canvass for the place of United States Senator, states that he recognizes the deplorable condition of debtors and sympathizes with them as deeply as any.

But does he recognize how many debtors there are in the United States and in the world? Does he recognize that under the gold standard, as now operating in the United States and Europe, producing the scarcity of gold which has caused Mr. SHERMAN to say there was a scramble for its possession by every nation now going on, gold has increased about 50 per cent in value?

PUBLIC DEBTS.

No man can escape entirely the burden of the public debt of the world, even of countries in which he pays directly no taxes. Bondholders, holders of the public debts of the nations, since they have increased to their present immense dimensions have a mortgage on the labor and property of every man in civilized states. This public debt of the world amounts to more than $30,000,000,000. The bonds to secure this immense sum are not held locally, but are distributed throughout the world, mainly among that class who have such claims on the industry and production of the world that they absolutely dominate the fortunes of mankind. The annual demands of this class on the production of mankind for interest on public debts alone, estimating the average interest at 3½ per cent, would be over $1,000,000,000.

These men are generally engaged in no business. They neither plow nor spin nor build railways nor ships nor the great shops in which the manufactures of the world are carried on. They simply draw interest—that never-ceasing growth of capital which augments the wealth of the receiver—every day, every hour, every minute, in sunshine and in storm, in seasons of prosperity and in those sad years when pestilence and famine, like avenging furies, leave death and desolation in their track. These bondholders, idle as to production, yet ever active and vigilant to make more investments of the large surplus of income over their wants, cry for more bonds. And they always get them, and generally at their own prices. They still demand an augmentation of the interest-bearing debt. These bondholders get annually in interest from the nations about one-fourth of all the gold in the world. This must be paid by taxation. Each State bears directly the taxes it has to pay, but all nations, buying from and selling to each other, bear a portion of the taxes of each, for taxes enhance the cost of production, and whoever buys any part of the production must pay a part of this enhanced price. Taxes also decrease the purchasing power of the producer, so whoever sells to a tax-ridden people must either sell less or take less for what he sells.

I would like to pursue this interesting question further, but time will not permit it. Suffice it to say that commerce has so tied together the interests of civilized nations that a calamity to one is a calamity to all; and this calamity of a small money volume, confined to gold alone, controlled through its insufficiency by the money magnates of the world, may be increased and magnified at the will of these magnates.

The debt of the United States, State, Territory, and subdivisions in 1890 was $2,027,170,546. Combined taxes of all these $1,040,433,013, being two-thirds of all the money in the country.

PRIVATE DEBTS.

Let us consider now the condition of private debts, due by private persons. Who are they that owe no debts at all? Very few. I pass over all that large class of debtors who either have no property to mortgage or who are so solvent that mortgages are not demanded of them; I pass also over that large class who have given mortgages on personal property only. Every one of these also has his burden increased by low prices.

We have some statistics as to mortgages of real estate. The census tables of 1890 show that in the ten years, 1880 to 1889, there were over nine and a half millions mortgages made, representing an incurred indebtedness of a fraction over $12,000,000,000, nearly eight times as much money as there was in the United States during that period.

Now notice the next item. As we receded from the year 1873, as prices went on falling, the annual number of mortgages increased, as well as the mortgaged indebtedness. The number created in 1880 was 643,143 and in 1889, the last year of the decade, the number was 1,226,323, the increase being over 90½ per cent, and the yearly incurred indebtedness increased from a small fraction over seven hundred and eleven millions in 1880 to a small fraction over one thousand seven hundred millions, or 146½ per cent, in 1889. Does this tell no story of increasing debt and distress under the operation of demonetization?

In 1880 the number of acres mortgaged, excluding town lots covered by mortgages, was 42,743,000; in 1889 they had increased to 70,678,000, or 65½ per cent.

At the end of the decade January 1, 1890, the amount due and unpaid on real-estate mortgages was $6,019,679,985, secured by 4,777,698 mortgages.

So you see that not only the number of mortgages was increased, but also the amount secured. These show that over four and three-quarter million adults out of our population were under mortgage, and that they owed in January, 1890, over $6,019,000,000, or nearly four times as much money as all the money in the United States, and nearly twice as much as the gold money of the world. If the mortgaged indebtedness on land increased in the same proportion (a very fair supposition) in the half decade, 1890–1894, there would be due on January 1, 1895, over $9,000,000,000 on them and the debtors would be seven and one-half millions. In 1890 there were 12,690,152 families in the United States. Of these more than one-half, or 52 per cent, did not own their homes and farms. Only 48 per cent were owners. Of these owning families 28 per cent owned subject to incumbrance.

The annual interest charged on real-estate mortgages amounted to $397,442,762.

These alone, without considering debtors who gave no mortgages, are enough to make one pause before he would consent to a policy which would increase these burdens. Would any good, kind-hearted man add one feather's weight to the burdens of a man who had his home, his shelter for his wife and children, under mortgage?

RAILROAD DEBTS.

I call attention now to the railroad debts. These are strictly private, not public, obligations. They are, however, of deep moment in considering the money question.

The debts of all the railroads in the United States in 1894 amounted to $5,968,398,155, more than three and one-half times all the money in the country. Their debts and stocks together amounted to $10,796,437,813. They must pay interest on the debt and dividends on the stock. They can only pay them by levying taxes or tolls on the people and ultimately on the producers of the country. So every producer, every cotton raiser, owes a part of this debt and regularly pays it? These liabilities have increased in one year more than two hundred and ninety millions under the repeal of the Sherman law. So you see increasing debt on each one of you and decreasing means of payment from lower and lower prices. This burden is still further increased by a diminution in amount of freight carried. In the year 1893, all but two months of which was under the Sherman law, and all of which was under the operation of a ready-made panic, commencing December 1, 1892, the number of tons carried were 745,119,482. In 1894, under the promised blessings of the repeal of the Sherman law, the number fell to 638,186,553, a loss of 107,932,829 tons, or over 15 per cent. The people have to make this good out of the small earnings coming from low prices. Thus also it is shown that while the people had the benefit of low prices, they were unable to purchase by 15 per cent as much as they purchased under the higher, though very low, prices of 1893.

Do our gold friends think that low prices do no harm, when under their operation the purchasing power of the people is reduced 15 per cent in one year? Now, with these results, lower and lower prices, and the increasing value of gold as shown in its increased purchasing power, all coming from the demonetization of silver, and increased and intensified by the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, it would seem a plain duty to give relief to the suffering people.

GOVERNOR STONE'S VIEWS CONSIDERED—GOLD DEBTORS.

Governor Stone, in his letter before referred to, says that he recognizes the deplorable condition of debtors, and sympathizes as deeply as any, and would spare no effort in their behalf.

I am glad to know that Governor Stone regards this sad condition of debtors as deplorable—that it is a good cause for weeping and mourning—and I am glad to know that these unfortunates, who are being crushed to the earth by the appreciating power of gold, have his sympathies. He pledges his every effort in their behalf. But what does he promise? Nothing that he can perform.

Agreeing, as he says, with us, that the conditions are bad, he holds out no ray of hope except an international agreement for remonetization.

This means that Governor Stone recognizes the necessity for more money to remove this bad condition, and yet is unwilling we should have it unless other nations shall consent to have it also. He admits that the rehabilitation of silver would be a proper remedy, a proper medicine for the sick and dying debtor, for a ruined and distressed people, but he says the debtor, the people, shall not have the medicine unless emperors, kings, and bankers shall consent that their people shall also take it. And then he says at the close of his letter that as he will not, if elected, take his seat until 1899, he may never have an opportunity of participating in legislation on the subject of free coinage of silver, and therefore intimates that the question may be settled before he can have such opportunity.

In this condition he places himself on this most important subject: "I offer myself as a doctor to an afflicted people. I know they are sick—so sick as to furnish good cause for tears. I know that more silver money is a good remedy; but the people must not take this remedy unless Europe will take it also; and besides, the people may not need me for a doctor at all, as they may get well or die before the time comes when I can act under my employment."

The governor, however, is prepared to give a prescription for present use, a soothing plaster or an opiate. He advises the sick and languishing people—so sick as to call forth tears from his eyes and the deepest sympathies of his heart—to keep quiet, not to make any complaint, not to agitate for relief; for if this agitation looks like it would be successful, it would be especially calamitous to the debtors of the country. And how is successful agitation, promising a free coinage of silver at an early day, to injure debtors?

The answer to this as given by Governor Stone is certainly the most remarkable statement ever made in political economy. Governor Stone, it will be noticed, says nothing of gold appreciating or getting higher from the prohibition by law to coin silver in competition with it. I infer from what he says of the relative prices of cotton in 1859 and 1860 and in 1889 and 1890 that he does not believe that gold has appreciated to any noticeable extent, if at all. In other words, that gold has maintained its stable value notwithstanding a destruction among the commercial nations of one-half of the volume of money as primary money, leaving gold alone to perform the duty once imposed on both metals; notwithstanding the continuous fall in prices since 1873 until now, gold still holds the power of perfect stability; yet if the people agitate for the restoration of silver as full money and our agitation goes to a point where it will look like success is certain, the gold will lose its power of stability—so commended by the gold-standard men—and go to a higher price. That is his idea.

It is utterly fallacious. Let us illustrate. Suppose Congress had the power, and should exercise it, to declare that no cotton with a staple under an inch and a quarter should be made into cloth. Would that not at once raise the price of all cotton of longer staple, and especially if this short staple was of an amount about equal to the longer staple? We all see it would.

Then, again, suppose the people, seeing that the uses for cotton other than for cloth were so limited as to depress its value greatly, and should agitate for a repeal of the law, and agitate to the point suggested by Governor Stone, that success would seem certain, so that in a short time the short staple cotton would be used as it once was for making cloth. Does anyone doubt that the holders of the long staple cotton, seeing this competition to be certain in the near future, would at once begin to sell at lower prices? Would they hold it to the very day when short staple cotton would be made into cloth; and especially would they ask a higher price for it? Everyone knows how this would be. Then can anyone tell why holders of gold, already appreciated from 50 to 75 per cent by the demonetization of silver, would still hold it higher and higher when it became certain that silver would be restored to its old constitutional function of a money metal? Governor Stone has not explained this.

In another part of his letter Governor Stone states that by the free coinage of silver the country would lose its gold and thereby $600,000,000 in gold will be driven out of circulation. Yes, out of circulation; that is the word. I remark in passing, first, that there is no gold in circulation in this country except among the bankers and bondholders in New York and other large money centers; second, that counting the gold held by them as in circulation, Governor Stone has the amount largely too high, the amount being only $480,275,057, as shown by the Treasury statement made July 1, being about $19,000,000 less than in July, 1894. Where would the gold go when driven out? It would go somewhere; it would not go into the clouds and set itself up as twinkling stars to beautify and adorn the heavens. It would go to Europe—to England principally. And this large addition to the money of Europe, by a universally recognized law of money, disputed by no one, not even by Governor Stone—this addition to the money of Europe would raise prices there, including our cotton, which is exactly the same thing as causing a fall in the value of gold. * * *

THE SILVER DEBTOR—GOVERNOR STONE'S VIEWS.

But there is another class of debtors for whom Governor Stone also has the deepest sympathy, and whom he finds it equally impossible to benefit and whom he thinks it will also ruin if more money is to be added to the currency of the country.

These are also to be ruined in advance by the development of enough strength by the free-coinage men to make it probable that they will elect a majority of the next Congress and the next President. This, he thinks, will be to serve notice on creditors not holding gold obligations that within two years they are to be paid in a depreciated currency, and that they will therefore at once commence operations to collect their debts.

Luckily, however, debts are not collectable, even by gold-standard creditors, until they are due, and it is not two years till a free-silver President and Congress will be elected.

If the people in the State who owe debts have been unable to pay them when they matured this inability arises in a great measure from the low price of cotton, the returns being such as to allow little, if anything, with which to pay debts. If cotton is still to continue at the present prices, or near them, if the currency is still to remain contracted, no good can come to insolvent debtors by granting them longer delay in payment. The accumulation of interest, with losses arising from raising cotton at prices below the cost of production, could but add to their distress.

But the governor is equally in error as to the dangers to this class of debtors as he was in relation to the others.

There would be no economic business reasons why creditors having debts payable in lawful money would hasten collections lest they should be paid two years thereafter in the same money exactly. But the Governor thinks that this same lawful money would be depreciated—that is, less valuable—after remonetization than now, and therefore creditors would hasten to get this very same money now and keep it for the two years in order that they may have it on hand when the depreciation takes place. Stop and think and see whether this is not the exact proposition which receives Governor Stone's assent. Nobody proposes to put less silver into the dollar under free coinage than is in it now; so the silver dollar will be the same then as now. No change is proposed in the greenback dollar, or in any other dollar; they will all be exactly the same then as now. The difference, in the Governor's opinion, is that this same money will be depreciated, to what extent he does not inform us. Now the creditor pressing for collection, as predicted by Governor Stone, will press to receive the same money, and the same money will depreciate exactly as much in his hands as it would in the hands of his debtor.

Oh! but it may be said the creditor will seek to collect it now in order to invest it in property. But Governor Stone closes out this avenue by stating that all enterprises into which capital enters would cease, general suspension of business would ensue, and universal bankruptcy prevail. Under these conditions men who hold money never part with it—they hoard it. So then we have this absurd and ridiculous conclusion as the result of the Governor's reasoning on the subject, that creditors will insist on collecting their debts at once, lose all interest on them for two years in order that they may have on hand the very money which is then to be depreciated, according to his views. What have they made by this? Nothing. They have lost the interest.

There is no further exposure of the fallacy of the Governor's views needed.

THE RATIO OF 16 TO 1.

I notice now the last ditch in which the gold-standard men have intrenched themselves. They assert that the market price of silver as a commodity is about 32 to 1, and if we have unrestricted coinage we will have a 50-cent dollar of silver and this will drive out all the gold, and we will have silver monometallism. I admit there is plausibility in this argument, and it needs to be met with candor and fairness. The free-coinage men mean to have bimetallism as we had prior to 1873, and we do not mean by any rash experiment, however much we desire free coinage, to so act as to place our country in a position it did not occupy prior to that date.

I agree that law alone can not fix the value—that is, the exchangeable value—of anything. If Congress should enact that the value of every bushel of wheat shall be $1, and of every bushel of corn 50 cents, and of every pound of cotton 10 cents, I admit that the law would be utterly worthless, and that these articles would sell just as if no such law had been enacted. I also admit that if Congress and all the parliaments in Europe should enact that silver bullion, or that part of it not admitted to coinage, should be worth 100 cents or 129 cents an once—that such a law would not have the slightest effect on the price of silver bullion; and an international agreement between the United States and the principal nations in Europe to the same effect would be utterly valueless. Silver bullion, uncoined and uncoinable, would have the same value as before. Being but a commodity, with no use but a commodity use, its value would be fixed by the market sales, the demand and the supply. Then some one at first blush would say: "Why have free coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1, or at any other ratio, either by the independent action of the United States or by international agreement?"

A solution, I am sure, will be found in the following considerations. While it is true that law can not, by its mere enactment, give value to anything, law can increase the values of things or diminish them, by providing for their use for purposes, or prohibiting their use for purposes, which are highly esteemed by mankind, or for purposes for which the demand of mankind is great and urgent. An actual example in history of the increase in the value of a commodity by providing for its greater use is in the old laws of England, enacted to raise the price of wool, that no person should be buried except in shrouds or clothing made of wool. Decent burial is a necessity for every human being, at some time, and this exigent demand for wool, in addition to other demands, kept wool at a high price.

So the demonetization of silver in 1873 had both of these effects. It prohibited, in a large measure, the use of silver as money, a use to which it had been put for ages, and for which it is admirably adapted, and of course silver became less valuable in comparison with gold, which, by the same act, was increased in price, by compelling its sole use as primary money. As in case of burial, wool was essential; so in business, everyone must have money, and gold alone remained primary money. A very little reflection and one more illustration need only be made to prove this beyond doubt. Take the illustration I submitted some time back about long and short staple cotton—a law prohibiting short staple from being made into cloth. Short staple has always been used for that purpose.

Cotton cloth is one of the most urgent of human wants. Under such a law, long staple cotton would immediately rise greatly in price, to meet the exigent demands of humanity for clothing and other purposes, and short staple would go down, because one of the most important uses to which it could be applied had been taken from it. Long staple would go up several cents a pound and the other would go down, whereby the ratio of the value of the two would be greatly disturbed. But does anyone doubt that if the law should be repealed and short staple cotton should be admitted freely to the use of the weavers of the world—that then long staple would go down and short staple would go up, so that the old ratio in the value between them would be completely restored?

If this is so with reference to a thing which the world could do without, for, though it would be greatly inconvenient to do so, the world can be clothed and clothed fairly well without cotton by substituting for it wool, silk, flax, hemp, ramie, and many other textiles, why is it not true with reference to that thing without which the world can not live—the most exigent and essential of all human demands—money, which in itself and of itself supplies every human want? He who has money enough can want for nothing that is for sale in all the world. Money is in fact, as was well said by an eminent political economist, an order drawn by the Government in favor of the owner on all persons who have things for sale. Present the order and it is always and everywhere honored. A man may have a surplus of any commodity, which he may desire to exchange for some other commodity which he needs, but he may spend days in finding a man who wants his particular commodity and at the same time has a surplus of the particular commodity he wishes to procure. But every person wants money—and he wants more and more the more he has; he never has a surplus, and he is always ready and willing to exchange any surplus commodity he has for money. The desire for money is insatiable, and it is never satisfied for the reason that it commands all desirable earthly things. It commands not only that which satisfies our physical wants, but all that ministers to fancy or is craved by ambition or greed. It makes emperors and kings, presidents, senators, and governors. It overthrows empires, sets up new dynasties, makes war, and concludes peace.

The difference between uncoined and uncoinable silver or gold and gold or silver money is the difference between weakness and strength—the difference between what a few want in limited quantities and what all want in unlimited quantities.

I admit, my friends, that what I have thus far said, while it does completely establish that a ratio agreed on by all mankind between gold and silver coin would be stable, or so nearly so that variations in it would be practically harmless, yet it does not establish beyond doubt that in the present order the United States alone can effect this, though it goes a long way to prove it. I admit that you have a right to demand that I go further in my proof before you assent fully to the proposition that the United States, with the other silver peoples, can maintain this parity without the cooperation of some of the most powerful nations in Europe.

While once I believed this could be done only for a limited time, yet, as I stated then, that limited time would extend a long distance into the future. Subsequent reflection and subsequent experience in actual events, and a more thorough knowledge of the present and past monetary systems of mankind, have satisfied me that that long period, in which free coinage by the independent action of the United States without the cooperation of the silver-using nations will keep the metals at a parity, will extend into an indefinite future, as far ahead of us as existing institutions of any kind are likely to remain.

In order to determine what can be done by human action, it is well to consider what has been accomplished by the same agency.

During the present century, up to 1873, the market value of gold and silver varied but little from the French ratio of 15½ to 1—generally a little above it—occasionally a little below. And this stability in the ratio was maintained, notwithstanding that from 1801 to 1871, and even up to the year 1894, there was the greatest variation in the relative production of the two metals, varying from 29 cents' worth of silver to $1 of gold in 1851–60, to $3.22 of silver to $1 of gold in the years 1801–10, and ranging between these two the remainder of the time. Treating these metals as commodities merely, to be sold in the market for non-monetary uses, the stability in this ratio would have been impossible, for we all know that the increase of the supply of any commodity tends to decrease its value, and a decrease in the supply tends to raise its value. So we see that there was some other thing, some other force in operation during that period than the market value of the metals or commodities, which prevented a variation in the relative prices of gold and silver with the enormous variations in their relative supply.

That thing—that force—was the bimetallism of France fixing the ratio of price at 15½ to 1, and this seems now to be agreed upon by all candid gold monometallists.

As showing the potency of the French law by itself, I will notice the other agencies operating during that period to destroy the parity as fixed by the French ratio. Among these are: Demonetization of silver by England, demonetization of gold by Germany (taking place at different times), and, I believe, by the Scandinavian States, and the fact that the United States had a different ratio, namely, 15 to 1, till 1834, and afterwards 16 to 1. France was a first-class nation during this period, but during a large portion of it engaged in most ruinous and destructive wars. But France was not the greatest commercial nation, England being first then as now. Yet with all these variations in the relative production of the two metals, and all these changes in the monetary systems of Europe and the United States, France held the two metals everywhere at about the ratio she had fixed by law. Note, I said, the parity was maintained everywhere.

You have a right to demand of me an explanation of this. The explanation is that France was a great and rich country, having much to sell and buying much; that metallic money, gold and silver, was then and always will be in insufficient supply for the needs of the world—as witness the unsafe and dangerous devices to supply more to which I have alluded—doing 95 per cent of cash transactions on confidence and 5 per cent only with money, the banks lending three times the whole volume of our currency and six times their capital, and owing in demand obligations nine times as much as their cash and cash items. I say the insufficiency of such money was then and is now felt everywhere. So, under these conditions, a dollar. or a franc, good in France, a rich and great country, was equally good everywhere in the civilized world. But you may ask why the silver franc, legal-tender money in France, was equally good in gold monometallic countries (less the cost of transportation to France), when it was not a legal tender in those countries. The answer is, there is such an urgent, such an overmastering demand for money everywhere that money, good and legal tender in one great commercial country, meets this exigent demand everywhere.

Our present 50-cent dollar, as our gold friends call it, is worth 100 cents here, and worth the same all over commercial Europe, less the usual cost of transporting it to New York. Then I might ask our gold friends in return why it is that gold is worth in China the same as in London and in New York, though not recognized as money there? The answer is the same: The need of the world for money is such that either gold or silver, recognized as money, legal-tender money at a certain value in any great commercial country or countries, is of the same value everywhere. Then they may ask why the silver money of China, Japan, and Mexico is not worth as much in other countries as at home. The answer is, that these countries have little foreign commerce, little domestic commerce, and the economic forces behind their money are not therefore sufficient to raise its value in other countries to the home level.

These are plain truths, easily understood and incontrovertible, and they contain the solution of the problem before us.

The United States in territory, leaving out Alaska, is larger than all Europe, leaving out Russia. Their soil and climate are unequaled. The range of their productions covers nearly all that is valuable to man and all that is essential to human happiness. Taking the silver-using countries, there is produced in them and in the United States together every necessity and every comfort of human life. We are 70,000,000 people, and are increasing at the rate of 2 per cent per annum. Our country is comparatively new and undeveloped. More and better houses, roads and bridges, railroads and canals are needed. Money is needed to make them. We ought not to borrow that money from abroad, and would not if we had a sufficiency. Our mines are more cheaply worked and turn out more than those of other countries. The immense and valuable forests which now obstruct the farmer's plow need to be cleared away to make homes for our increasing population, 52 per cent of whom are landless. More and better schoolhouses and church edifices are needed, more museums, more galleries of art, more public libraries,

Our population is the most industrious and the most productive of all peoples and consumes more commodities, and therefore needs more money, than any other.

A great statistician and a gold monometallist, Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts, has stated in a public speech that we consume more than do 200,000,000 of the people of Europe—about three times as much per capita. By the extreme subdivision of labor now existing and still progressing, no man produces one hundredth part of the commodities he needs. He produces to sell for money with which to supply his wants. As production increases so does consumption, and so does the need for more and more money.

Let us compare our country a little further with Europe. I take my figures from an English statistican of world-wide renown, Mr. Mulhall.

The merchandise transported on our railroads is double that carried on all the railways in all the other countries in the world. I add that the merchandise carried on our waterways is one-quarter of that carried on the railways. All this merchandise is bought with money and sold for money on an average at least three times. With twice as much merchandise carried and sold and consumed by our people as in all the world together, does it not look a little as if we needed twice as much money as all the world? Yet we have only about one-sixth as much gold (the only good money, according to our monometallic friends) as is possessed in Europe.

Mr. Mulhall gives us some further figures of immense importance in this connection. By superior energy and skill, by the use of more steam and electricity, greater labor-saving devices, the United States possess more productive power than Great Britain, France, and Germany all combined. When we consider the more than 4,000,000 men in the standing armies of Europe who produce nothing and the 1,000,000 necessary to feed and clothe them, we may safely say that the productive power of the United States is quite as great as that of all Europe. And yet our friends of the gold standard say that we can not do what France alone did for nearly one hundred years—maintain the parity between gold and silver at our old ratio, which was 3 per cent less favorable to silver than the French ratio.

I have dealt in figures only as to our country's power. I have not indulged in Fourth of July glorifications. These cold figures prove beyond cavil our ability to establish, as England did, and as Germany did, our own monetary system without the consent of other nations. I quote from a distinguished enemy of independent action by the United States. He says:

In fact, at this moment our country is the richest in the world. It has in it every element of prosperity. * * * Nothing has ever been seen like the progress of this nation since the world began.

And now paraphrasing his further language to some extent, I say yet here we are, standing on the shores of the Atlantic, turning our backs on our own country and its greatness, and on the millions of our people suffering from the insufficiency of the volume of money, with our faces to Europe, we are begging, imploring, even on bended knees, monarchs and bankers across the ocean to allow us to use our grand powers and opportunities for still further progress in the advancement of our people.

I concur with Mr. Jefferson, who, in discussing foreign influence on our banks, foreign control of our finances, foreign dictation of the policies of our Government, the foreign possession and control of our newspapers, expressed the hope that we might find—

Some means of shielding ourselves in the future from foreign influence, political, commercial, or in whatever form it may be attempted.

And considering the ruin coming to us from this foreign influence, he used these words:

I can scarcely withhold myself from joining in the wish of Silas Deane, that there were an ocean of fire between us and the Old World.

And I reverently add than I can scarce refrain from joining in the same wish.

I have detained you too long for your comfort. The times seem to demand a compliance with the invitation of your committee to address you to-day. The subject is a great one—full of the deepest interest to you and to our whole country and to the latest posterity. The issues involved are no less than the control of our Government in its financial policy by the bankers of New York and of Europe or its control by the people.

The questions which underlie this issue, though plain to the common understanding, have been so obscured by sophistry and error that I deemed it a duty to discuss them at least as fully as I have done and to discuss them with candor, relying on facts rather than on eloquent declamation.

I thank you, one and all, for your attention under circumstances of discomfort. And in closing, allow me to express the hope, the prayer, that the Father who holds the destinies of men and nations in His hands may so guide and direct our actions and counsels that happiness and prosperity shall once again return and remain the everlasting heritage of the people of Mississippi and of the whole country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize any other gentleman who wishes to occupy the floor at this time.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House now take a recess until half past 10 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the House will take a recess until 10.30 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Accordingly the House (at 10 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.) was declared in recess.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for the purchase of reindeer for Alaska—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Mrs. H. H. Stevens, executrix of Wilkins Stevens, deceased, against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Attorney-General of the United States, replying to the House resolution of February 4 in relation to the efficiency of employees—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BABCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2652) to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 286); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. HULICK, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 3337) amending the act of June 8, 1880, entitled "An act to authorize the President to appoint an officer of the Navy or the Marine Corps to perform the duties of Solicitor and Judge-Advocate-General, etc., and to fix the rank and pay of such officer, and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 285); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CUMMINGS, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the joint resolution of the House (H. Res. 71) authorizing the preparation of a subject-catalogue of the books of the law library, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 290); which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HILBORN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 4463) to grant two condemned cannon and cannon balls to the Thirteenth Separate Company, National Guard of the State of New York, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 292); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. HILBORN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5096) to grant two condemned cannon and two pyramids of cannon balls to the Indiana Soldiers' Home, at La Fayette, Ind., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 293); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ELLIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 5286) providing for disposal of lands lying within the Fort Klamath Hay Reservation, not included in the Klamath Indian Reservation, in Oregon, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 294) thereon; which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. GRAFF, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 80) for the relief of the First National Bank of Newton, Mass. (Report No. 287.)

By Mr. HANLY, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 1494) for the relief of the legal representatives and devisees of James W. Schaumburg. (Report No. 288.)

By Mr. GRIFFIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill (H. R. 486) for the relief of William Henry Johnson. (Report No. 289.)

By Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill (H. R. 4510) for the appointment of Frank M. Marshall, as lieutenant on the retired list of the Army. (Report No. 291.)

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced, and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ACHESON: A bill (H. R. 5677) to provide for the erection of a public building at McKeesport, Pa.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds:

By Mr. COBB of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 5678) authorizing convicts to be paroled—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. PAYNE (by request): A bill (H. R. 5679) to repeal sections 4532, 4533, and 4534, and to amend sections 4516 and 4529 of the Revised Statutes, all relating to the employment, treatment, and payment of seamen on merchant vessels—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. RICHARDSON: A bill (H. R. 5680) to provide street entrances to alleys in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. LACEY: A bill (H. R. 5681) to amend section 2301 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by section 6 of an act approved March 3, 1891, entitled "An act to repeal timber-culture laws, and for other purposes"—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. HENDRICK: A bill (H. R. 5682) to prevent the purchasing of or speculating in claims against the Federal Government by United States officers—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MAHANY: A bill (H. R. 5683) to provide for the compensation and promotion of consular clerks of the United States of America, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HARDY: A bill (H. R. 5684) to increase the pension of veterans of the Mexican war—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JENKINS: A bill (H. R. 5685) to restore lands to private entry and render the same subject to be sold at private sale—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. MURPHY of Arizona: A bill (H. R. 5686) to segregate and return to the unreserved public domain certain land on the White Mountain Indian Reservation in Arizona—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. HOWELL: A bill (H. R. 5687) to erect a light-house at East Point Shoal, in Raritan Bay, New Jersey—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. WHITE (by request): A bill (H. R. 5729) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce"—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. JOHNSON of California: A bill (H. R. 5730) to amend section 24 of an act entitled "An act to create the California Débris Commission and regulate hydraulic mining in the State of California," approved March 1, 1893—to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

By Mr. PERKINS: A concurrent resolution (House Con. Res. No. 18) providing for the distribution and sale of compiled statutes in force in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: A resolution (House Res. No. 159) calling upon the Secretary of War for certain information relating to the harbor of Manitowoc, Wis.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills of the following titles were presented and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARHAM: A bill (H. R. 5688) granting a pension to Charles C. Hall—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BARNEY: A bill (H. R. 5689) for the relief of J. W. Boyd—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. BELL of Colorado: A bill (H. R. 5690) granting an increase of pension to Carrie F. Bissell, of Pueblo, Colo.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5691) granting an increase of pension to Sophia W. Buxton, of Durango, Colo.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BURTON of Missouri (by request): A bill (H. R. 5692) for the relief of Stephen W. Parker—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 5693) for the relief of the city of Racine—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. EVANS (by request): A bill (H. R. 5694) for the relief of Leo L. Johnson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. FLYNN: A bill (H. R. 5695) for the relief Francis Scala—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5696) providing for the hearing, trial, and adjudication by the United States Court of Claims of the claim of Albert Wood, and removing the same from the operations of the United States statute of limitations—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. GARDNER: A bill (H. R. 5697) granting a pension to Surg. B. H. Peterson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5698) granting a pension to Surg. Harvey E. Bowles—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HENDRICK: A bill (H. R. 5699) for the relief of the heirs of Carroll Winters—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HULICK: A bill (H. R. 5700) for the relief of the heirs of Mary Day, deceased, widow of Daniel Day, deceased—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HITT: A bill (H. R. 5701) for the relief of Julius Stahel—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HERMANN: A bill (H. R. 5702) to pension Susan Woody, widow of James Woody, who served in the war of 1812—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEIGHTY: A bill (H. R. 5703) granting a pension to Mary Macauley, widow of the late Brig. Gen. Daniel Macauley, United States Volunteers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. LITTLE: A bill (H. R. 5704) to grant an honorable discharge to and remove the charge of desertion against W. T. Vick—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MADDOX: A bill (H. R. 5705) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the estate of William Henderson, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McCALL of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 5706) to grant L. O. Gooch an honorable discharge—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5707) for the relief John Aldridge—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. MEREDITH: A bill (H. R. 5708) granting a pension to Mrs. Jane C. Ducrsan, a daughter of Thomas Norman, a Revolutionary soldier—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURTON of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 5709) to pension John W. Scott—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PICKLER: A bill (H. R. 5710) granting a pension to Eleanor L. Curtiss—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5711) granting a pension to Richard P. Pilkington—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5712) granting an increase of pension to John W. Hines—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5713) granting a pension to George Gamache—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5714) to pension Carrie V. Millar—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PRICE: A bill (H. R. 5715) to remove the statutory bar of limitation now standing against the claim of J. Viosca, and conferring full jurisdiction upon the United States Court of Claims to try and adjudicate said claim and render judgment therefor—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana: A bill (H. R. 5716) for the relief of the legal representatives of Alfred Duplantier, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SHERMAN: A bill (H. R. 5717) for the relief of the Atlantic Works, of Boston, Mass.—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. SMITH of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 5718) granting a pension to Malinda Kelly, of Jackson County, Ill.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SOUTHARD: A bill (H. R. 5719) to extend a patent of Joseph Zihlmann—to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. CHARLES W. STONE: A bill (H. R. 5720) for the relief of F. R. Lanson—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. TRACEWELL: A bill (H. R. 5721) to relieve Alice Utz, heir and legatee of Joshua Wiley, and to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction, and to remove the bar of statute of limitation—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: A bill (H. R. 5722) for relief of Daniel S. Miller, of Jasper County, Miss.—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. WRIGHT: A bill (H. R. 5723) for the relief of Helen M. Evans—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DALZELL: A bill (H. R. 5724) to remove the sentence of court-martial from the military record of John A. Swartzwelder, etc.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. THOMAS: A bill (H. R. 5725) granting a pension to Mary H. Lamont—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SPERRY: A bill (H. R. 5726) for the relief of Edward Rice—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. STEELE: A bill (H. R. 5727) granting an increase of pension to John Zartman—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. WHITE: A bill (H. R. 5728) to recognize Louis Semmler as of United States Veteran Volunteer Engineers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. ACHESON: Petition of J. C. Vansickle and 124 other citizens of Washington, Pa., praying for the passage of the Stone immigration bill—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. BROMWELL: Petition of the Western Tract Society, of Cincinnati, Ohio, in regard to changes in postal laws—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. COOK of Wisconsin: Petition of 165 citizens of Fond du Lac, Montello, Wis., and vicinity, favoring an adequate appropriation to establish and maintain a 21-foot channel in the harbor of Manitowoc, Wis.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. COX: Petitions of A. G. Ezell and others, of Elkton, Tenn., J. D. Couch, T. R. Simerson, and others, of Williamson County, Tenn.; in regard to the claim of book agents of the Methodist Publishing House at Nashville, Tenn.—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DALZELL: Resolutions of the Paint, Oil, and Varnish Club of New York, in favor of a general bankruptcy bill—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. EVANS: Petition of George W. Kircher and other citizens of Louisville, Ky., asking the adoption of a sixteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts: Resolutions of the Western Massachusetts Union ex-Prisoners of War Association, in favor of pensioning all surviving veterans who were inmates of Confederate prisons—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HEATWOLE: Petition of A. G. Crofoot and others, of New Auburn, Minn., in regard to Sunday-observance bill (H. R. 167)—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. HITT: Memorial and resolutions passed at a meeting held in Chickering Hall, New York, November 21, 1895, and indorsed by Rev. William Gardner and 63 other citizens of Hanover, Jo Daviess County, Ill., urging the Government of the United States to make every possible effort to induce the Governments of Christendom to put an end to the intolerable state of affairs in Turkey, which threatens with extermination so many Armenian Christians—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. HOOKER: Petitions of citizens of Houghton, Rushford, Sherman, and Panama, N. Y., against the sale of beer and spirituous liquors to immigrants at Ellis Island, Bedloes Island, and Fort Wadsworth—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. HOWELL: Petitions of J. R. Rollinson and 50 other citizens of Rahway, N. J.; Luther Walling and 50 others, of Monmouth County, N. J.; Benjamin F. Clark and 90 others, of Boundbrook, N. J., urging the passage of the Stone immigration bill—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. LACEY: Petitions of P. O. Burnham, Frank Bohae, and others, of Oklahoma Territory, in favor of free homes—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. LAYTON: Memorial of the Odd Fellows' Hall Association of New Orleans, La., urging the passage of a bill for the payment of a judgment recovered in the Court of Claims (Congressional, No. 7226)—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. MADDOX: Petition of the executor of Mathew Harper, deceased, late of Floyd County, Ga., praying that his war claim be referred to the Court of Claims—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. McEWAN: Petition of members of Jersey City Harbor, No. 6, asking for the passage of House bill No. 4242—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. PERKINS: Resolutions adopted in mass meeting at Ocheydan, Iowa, January 24, 1896, in regard to the recent outrages in Asia Minor—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. POOLE: Petitions of citizens of Syracuse and Canastota, N. Y., in the matter of the sale of beer on Ellis Island, Bedloes Island, and Fort Wadsworth, New York Harbor—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. PUGH: Papers to accompany House bill No. 2133, for the relief of Elizabeth Fugitt—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 2452, for the relief of William T. Moore—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 2453, for the relief of George Coburn—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 2454, for the relief of Allen Maze—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 3908, for the relief of W. H. Copley—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 3909, for the relief of James Littleton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 3910, for the relief of Thomas Dean—to the Committee on Claims.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 3911, for the relief of William E. Shepperd—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 3912, for the relief of Francis M. Henderson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 4299, for the relief of Joseph H. Watson—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 3787, for the relief of H. C. Herndon—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. STEELE: Petition of Dr. J. H. Forrest and other professional gentlemen of Marion, Ind., stating their objections to Senate bill No. 325 and House bill No. 2652 to regulate the practice of medicine and surgery, to license physicians and surgeons, and to punish persons violating the provisions thereof in the District of Columbia—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SOUTHWICK: Petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Dormansville, N. Y., against the sale of beer at Ellis Island, Bedloe's Island, and Fort Wadsworth, on Staten Island—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. STRONG: Resolutions and petition of the Ministerial Association of Delaware, Ohio, in favor of raising the age of consent to 18 years, and for other changes in the laws—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. TRACEY: Papers to accompany House bill No. 4199, to correct the record of Edward H. Munson—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 713, for the relief of Jacob Taylor—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 3524, for the relief of James McGowan—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, petition of citizens of Miami, Mo., for the improvement of the Missouri River at Miami—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Also, papers in support of House bill No. 3528—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TRELOAR: Papers to accompany bill for the relief of George H. Smallwood—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH: Petition of citizens of Warrens Corners, Niagara County, N. Y., in regard to the sale of beer at Ellis Island, Bedloes Island, and Fort Wadsworth—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 7, 1896.

The recess having expired, the House reassembled at 10.30 a. m., Saturday, February 8, and was called to order by the Speaker.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Speaker, more than five weeks ago we passed through this House in the brief period of two days a bill that, if enacted into law, would have relieved the present and future generations from an excessive interest burden and changed for the better the character of Government obligations. This measure in no way affected our currency system or disturbed the business or financial condition of our country; but it has now been returned to us from the Senate with every word except its number obliterated, and in its place has been substituted a most radical currency measure, which virtually establishes silver monometallism as our national currency.

Concurrently with the passage of the bill we sent to the Senate a measure which would have provided sufficient revenue to maintain the credit, meet the expenses, and pay the obligations of this Government. This measure certainly met the universal approval of all classes of our people, and yet we are informed that the same selfish interests propose also to return that wise measure to this House, obliterated in the same way, with a substitute identical in character with the one before us.

As a novice in the halls of Congress, I feel constrained to ask what character of statesmanship this may be called, and with what motives and with what purpose does the lordly branch of this Congress so act?

Our Chief Executive, in the paroxism of despair in which he found himself and the Treasury after the evil effects of his jingo message on the Venezuelan matter, appealed to Congress for assistance, and members of this House, including myself, were hastily summoned from our Christmas feasts and family circles to perform an important and sacred duty to our country.

We acted as we believed wisely and promptly, and as far as by our action we could gave to the Chief Executive and to our depleted Treasury the twofold relief desired. But what followed? The President ignored the acts of this House by proceeding to issue a hundred millions of bonds, running for a long period, and bearing a high rate of interest, while the Senate of the United States leisurely wets its silvery whistle with these two important measures.

This method of trying to securre legislation by whipping the devil around the stump does not seem becoming to a novice fresh from the country.

It seems to me that we are legislatively standing midway between the devil and the deep sea, and I for one am not willing to unite with his satanic majesty, who is bound to lead us into the clutches of the gold monometallists, and surrender our souls as meat for the shylocks; nor am I willing to be guided by the silver monometallists into the dangerous waters of the deep sea.

I gladly voted for the revenue bill, because it clearly granted needed relief to our Treasury, depleted by the destructive free-trade legislation of the past Congress. I also favored the bond bill, which was necessary in consequence of the same incompetent administration of our financial affairs; but, sir, I can not favor a substitute which is not at all germane to the question and entirely foreign to the original measure.

In view of the President's action in the sale of bonds, there is no immediate necessity for this measure. Therefore let us turn our attention to a subject upon which the American people are demanding the action of this House, and that, sir, should be a bimetallic currency bill providing for the use of both gold and silver as standard money, and a volume of currency that shall be equal to the population and the vast commercial interests of our country.

I am irrevocably opposed to the establishment of a gold monetary basis of currency in this country. My convictions and party principles emphatically pledge me to the restoration of silver to an equal position with gold in the currency of this nation. I am prepared to act upon a bill which shall tend to establish this object without waiting for a conference with any other nation.

Our forefathers were able to maintain our independence as a nation and establish a bimetallic currency without international agreement. We had courage to adopt tariff legislation for the prosperity and happiness of our people without consulting the interests of Europe.

We have, by the sacrifice of our best lifeblood and untold wealth, established liberty, freedom, and perpetual union, even against the hostile interests and unfriendly alliances of other nations, and now, sir, can it be claimed that this, the strongest, ablest, and wisest nation on the face of the globe, has not the courage or ability to establish and maintain a currency for its people without consulting the wishes or bowing to the dictates of the shylocks of Europe?

The people of this country, it seems to me, stand between two great evils, the one seeking to elevate the classes and degrade the masses by means of an endless chain of glittering gold, having its strong link stapled to the house of Rothschild, and endeavoring to encircle within its glistening tentacles the American people in order to feast upon their lifeblood and wither their substance, and, on the other hand, a band of silver, with its main links well secured in the grasp of the kings of the silver mines of the world, whose bold champions seek to lure us within its circle for their selfish interests and our misfortune.

I believe, sir, in taking the middle of the highway between these two great metals, and through the wisdom of the members of this House guide the financial chariot along the safe and more moderate course that has in the past, and must certainly in the future, lead us into more prosperous times.

I have no sympathy with the statesman who does not possess sufficient conviction to give him courage to act upon the most important public issue of the present day.

Our people are universally demanding action. You ask how we may act so as to maintain a parity of values of the two metals? I would invite an immediate conference of the nations, ignoring Great Britain, and unless they would consent to an international bimetallic currency I would establish such a currency for this nation, limited to the coinage of the American product, and I would exclude the foreign product by a wise and most stringent protective tariff on the importation of bullion.

Mr. Speaker, I have filed a motion to refer this measure to the Committee on Banking and Currency, with instructions to prepare and submit to the House a bill that shall provide a currency for the United States, to be composed of both gold and silver as standard money, without regard to the currency laws of any other nation, and with such restrictions and under such provisions as will secure the maintenance of the parity of value of the two metals, so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal; and I trust it may be favorably considerd.

Mr. Speaker, I have heard many disparaging remarks against the silver Senators and Members from the Western States, and I myself think that they are disposed to go to the extreme on the silver question, but the fault is not entirely with them. Their people have been watching with interest and fear the growth of the gold monster in the East and the dexterity with which the shylocks manipulate the present Democratic Administration in their interest, and they naturally demand radical action by their representatives with the hope of stemming the ruinous power of the gold monometallists.

While Eastern Senators and Representatives in their public utterances favor bimetallism, I fear there is a lurking influence and interest which withholds action, and I have no doubt should the Representatives of the great Middle States prepare and submit to this House a bimetallic currency bill, in accordance with the principles and platforms of the Republican party, we should have as much difficulty in securing favorable action thereon by those basking in the sunshine of the golden shylocks of Paradise alley, in New York City, as by the silver radicals of the Pacific Slope, but with a wise measure properly before this House for the establishment of a bimetallic currency I am confident we should command the united support of the Republican members on this floor. [Applause.]

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, the discussion of the measure now before the House for consideration, and the events which have transpired since the first session of the Fifty-third Congress, have emphasized the necessity which existed at that time for legislation additional to the mere repeal of the purchasing clause of what is commonly known as the Sherman Act. I, in common with a great many other Democrats, gentlemen on this side of the House, earnestly urged at that time that the mere repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act would not rehabilitate the national finances and would not give the country the relief which it was desired to obtain. It was then argued in behalf of those who advocated the unconditional repeal of that measure that the mere restoration of public confidence would restore normal business conditions, and with it the industrial activity and reasonable degree of prosperity which usually accompany those conditions. Subsequent events, Mr. Speaker, have demonstrated that the anticipations of those who took this ground were not well founded—have demonstrated that something more was needed than the mere cessation by the Government of its monthly purchases of silver bullion. I scouted at that time the idea that the derangement of national finances resulted from any want of confidence on the part of the people of this country or of Europe in the stability of American currency; and the fact that no such distrust existed then or has existed since has been proved by the avidity with which the commercial world has seized upon the proposition of the United States to negotiate its bonds whenever they were placed upon the market.

Mr. Speaker, the same cause of trouble exists now which existed then—that is, the existence of the demand notes, floating obligations of the Treasury, which are payable in gold, and which may be presented for redemption at any time that the holders of them see fit to do so. So long, sir, as we have out something like $500,000,000 of demand notes and obligations, so long the maintenance of the gold reserve will be absolutely necessary, and so long as commercial necessities or commercial advantages are provocative of the export of gold, so long will the people who desire to export gold come to the Treasury of the United States to obtain it—that is, so long as our demand obligations are payable in gold and furnish the easy means of obtaining gold from the Treasury of the United States. I can not perceive now, and never have been able to perceive, what advantage or benefit it is to the country that we should maintain this floating indebtedness, a floating indebtedness not called for by the necessities of the country, and one which ought never to have been permitted to exist one day longer than the necessities of the Government required.

Great complaints are made by gentlemen on the other side of the question—the free-silver advocates—of the payment of these obligations in gold coin. Such has been the policy of the Government since the Grant Administration; and this policy has been approved by the American people every time the question has been directly or indirectly submitted to them. I took occasion, in making some remarks upon the bond bill brought into this House in the closing days of the last session, to call the attention of the House and the country to the fact that while what is known as the Matthews resolution of 1878, declaring that we could, without violation of national honor, discharge national obligations in gold or silver, passed this House and passed the Senate by an overwhelming majority. Mr. Garfield, who was conspicuous in this House in opposition to it, was immediately thereafter nominated by the Republican party for the Presidency and elected. Mr. Blaine, who was conspicuous in the Senate for his opposition to it, was afterwards nominated by the Republican party for the Presidency, and though he was defeated he was defeated by a candidate who occupied identically the same position on that question that he did.

The example thus set was followed by the Harrison Administration; and when Mr. Harrison was defeated for reelection Mr. Cleveland, still more distinguished for his devotion to what may be called the gold standard and the payment by the Government of its obligations in gold, was elected to succeed him. And now, after an agitation which has lasted from the inception of this Administration—after all the appeals which have been made by gentlemen on this side of the House and on the other side of the House in favor of the policy of paying Government obligations in silver, the American people have sent here a House of Representatives which is overwhelmingly, if I am correctly informed, opposed to the payment of Government obligations in silver. If I be mistaken in this view, Mr. Speaker, the question can easily be tested if any gentleman who favors that policy will offer a resolution declaring it as the sense of the House of Representatives that these obligations should be paid in silver. By such a proceeding the question could be easily tested whether there is a majority of the membership of this House in favor of that proposition.

In looking over the House, Mr. Speaker, I observe that nearly all of those who have been distinguished for their earnest advocacy of this policy on the part of the Government are now conspicuous by their absence. The places which knew them once know them no more—at least the places in the national capital. If they come here they come here as spectators, and the clarion voices which they raised in behalf of what they considered to be the rights of the people are hushed so far as the National Council is concerned, and, I fear, for many, many years. It being, then, a settled fact that this policy will be maintained, what is the necessity or the use of retaining a form of currency which is a constant menace to the Treasury, which requires that in order to make the Government able to keep its promises there shall be maintained a gold reserve, and that that gold reserve shall be continually replenished by the sale of United States bonds, thus increasing the bonded indebtedness of the country? I believe, sir, that no sensible business man would pursue any such policy with respect to his own affairs, and I can see no substantial reason why that policy should be pursued by the United States.

Mr. BRUMM. Will it disconcert my friend if I ask him a question?

Mr. BOATNER. Not a particle.

Mr. BRUMM. The gentleman seems to be in favor of getting rid of what are known as the greenbacks and the Sherman notes. Is he prepared to propose any substitute for them; and if so, will he tell us what kind?

Mr. BOATNER. Certainly. I was coming to that question in a few minutes.

Mr. PICKLER. In connection with that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question, which he can answer when he answers the gentleman from Pennsylvania. My question is, are you in favor of the coinage of the American product of silver?

Mr. BOATNER. I am in favor of just as large a coinage of silver as can be maintained at a parity with gold.

Mr. PICKLER. That does not mean anything. Those of us who believe in the use of silver as money want something definite.

Mr. BOATNER. It does mean a great deal. If we can coin the entire product of the American mines and maintain it at a parity, I am in favor of that. If we can coin more than the American product and keep it at a parity, I am in favor of coining it. And, Mr. Speaker, right there, I think, is where the fatal mistake was made in the enactment of the Bland-Allison Act. That act—although no one seems to have been aware of it at the time, at least no one seems to have claimed for it the merit that it possesses in this respect—that act, in my judgment, possessed the real merit of inaugurating the only system of bimetallism that is practicable under modern conditions. The only sort of bimetallism which, in my judgment, is practicable at this time is that under which the Government buys the inferior metal and coins it on Government account, limiting the coinage to the amount which can be maintained at a parity.

So, sir, if those who enacted the Bland-Allison measure into law had not pari passu adopted a joint resolution suspending the effect of the resumption act and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue the greenback circulation—if they had permitted the resumption act, which was then in force, to remain in force, which applied all the surplus revenues to the retirement and extinction of the floating national debt, we would long since have had seven hundred or eight hundred millions of standard silver in circulation, and no greenbacks outstanding to make necessary the maintenance of a reserve fund of one hundred millions or any other sum.

The example of the French nation has been repeatedly cited here as one that we ought to follow. The fact that the Bank of France redeems its notes, at its option, in gold or silver is held as evidence that the United States might do the same. But gentlemen who make this argument fail to take into account the fact that the French Government did in 1874 exactly what we should have done in 1878. It then retired, or it had prior to that time retired, all of its floating obligations, and the Government of France to-day has not in circulation one dollar of demand obligations. The consequence is that the French Government has no reserve fund; the French Government has no parity to maintain. The French Government in one respect did just as we did. It limited the volume of its silver circulation to the amount which could be utilized and which could serve the purposes of gold, thus insuring its maintenance at a parity with gold, and having retired its demand obligations, it permits the Bank of France, which is the only note-issuing power in France, to redeem its notes in gold or silver at its option.

The same result would have been reached in this country if we had not adopted the joint resolution to which I have already referred, which requires the Secretary of the Treasury to reissue greenback circulation as rapidly as it is redeemed. A distinguished Senator, commenting at the other end of the Capitol upon this question, has said that there was no necessity for the reissuing of the greenback circulation, and the Secretary of the Treasury has been reproached for trenching upon the funds realized by the sale of United States bonds for redemption purposes and applying them to the ordinary expenses of the Government. Mr. Chairman, a very casual investigation of the subject will disclose the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury could not have pursued any other course unless by an absolute violation of the statutes.

While it is very true that the bonds issued under the redemption act of 1875 are issued simply for the purpose of replenishing the fund for redemption purposes, it is equally true that when the fund thus raised is used in the redemption of Treasury notes those notes, by force of the statute of 1878, must be covered into the general Treasury and must be reissued in payment of the debts and expenses of the Government. Therefore, sir, if there was not sufficient money in the Treasury, exclusive of the Treasury notes thus redeemed, to pay the necessary expenses of the Government the Secretary could not withhold payment by means of the Treasury notes which had been redeemed without an absolute violation of the statutes of the United States; and while we may condemn the system, while we may say that no such system ought to exist, we can not condemn the executive officers of the Government for obeying the letter and mandate of the law.

Mr. BRUMM. Would not the Executive be very potential in having a resolution of that kind adopted, enabling him to pay out silver and gold in liquidation of the floating debt?

Mr. BOATNER. I do not understand that the present Executive favors any such policy.

Mr. BRUMM. That is the reason I asked the question and wanted to have the gentleman make that point a little more fully.

Mr. BOATNER. I do not understand that any Executive who has ever filled the Presidential office since 1868 has favored such a policy as that.

Mr. BRUMM. I understood you to say, and wish to have the House understand the gentleman's statement, that the Executive would have adopted that course, but that the law would not allow him.

Mr. BOATNER. No; my friend from Pennsylvania misunderstood me. I was referring to the conditions and circumstances as they exist at this time, and to censures cast on the Secretary of the Treasury for using the redemption fund, as it is called, in payment of the ordinary debts and expenditures of the Government, and was explaining that he has not done so. I was explaining that the notes that had been redeemed by the Treasury to a large amount—$78,000,000, I believe, last year—notes which had been presented for redemption at the subtreasuries in the United States and which had been redeemed in gold coin, were by force of law carried into the general Treasury, and that by direction of the specific statutes the Secretary was commanded to reissue the same, and that in the mere execution of that statute he has paid out these notes for the debts and expenses of the Government; that while we may reprobate and condemn that policy of reissuing the floating obligations of the Government after their redemption, yet we can not justly condemn him for executing the law as he finds it upon the statute book. That is the point I was making.

Mr. POWERS. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, with his consent. I quite agree in his diagnosis of the situation. I think he has stated it forcibly and exactly. The practical question arising on that statement is this: How shall we proceed to effect the remedy?

Now, I wish to ask the gentleman from Louisiana this question: If the Secretary of the Treasury had lying in his Bureau by the side of the greenback that comes in and which he is to issue to pay other obligations—suppose that he had another bill derived from proper sources of revenue, to wit, duties on customs, ample to meet all the current expenses of the Government week by week and month by month—if, under those circumstances, he would not allow the greenback to remain there, where it belongs, without the necessity of the reissue?

Mr. BOATNER. That is very true. If we had, in the Fifty-third Congress, enacted into law the second section of the House bill, that would have remedied the difficulty to which the gentleman refers, because it would have enabled the Secretary of the Treasury to have issued short-time certificates for the purpose of raising funds to meet any deficiencies that might arise. But to have done so would have been to violate the act of 1878, which in this bill you were so very careful to preserve. Now, that is a species of demagogy to which the Republican party is addicted.

This bill says:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to repeal or modify an act approved May 31, 1878, and to forbid the further retirement of the United States legal-tender notes.

Now, that act was passed pursuant to a rampant sentiment in favor of the maintenance of the greenback circulation. If you have a redundant revenue you may violate the spirit of the law by hoarding the notes in the Treasury, which is another way of retiring or canceling them. If you hoard them in the Treasury you had just as well cancel them, because you do not comply with the mandate of the law by reissuing them. The law requires their reissue. If, therefore, you could meet a deficiency by an increase of revenue, or the issuance of time certificates of indebtedness, you would violate the spirit of the law, which expressly by this very enactment is to remain in full force and effect; you may accomplish the same purpose by borrowing money to meet the expenses of the Government, but in either case you evade and nullify the law you are so careful to retain in force. In any event, you would be dodging the question. You are afraid to meet the issue. You are hoodwinking the people with the idea that you are maintaining that law, when, as a matter of fact, you want to evade it; you know that the best judgment of the country is that it should be shorn from the statute books.

Mr. POWERS. I quite agree with the gentleman as to his view of the matter when he says that this was passed in obedience to a rampant sentiment——

Mr. BOATNER. It was more than two-thirds of the House.

Mr. POWERS. But now, let me ask, would it not be wise—after having seen the evils of that method of keeping the greenbacks in circulation—would it not be wise to inaugurate a new rampant feeling to relieve that condition somewhat in the way I have suggested?

Mr. BOATNER. I am trying to do that now; and if I can influence my good friend from Vermont I shall be very much obliged for his help.

Mr. POWERS. If that situation could be relieved, would there not be perfect safety to the gold reserve in the Treasury, and would it not be relieved if the revenues were ample to meet the expenditures of the Government under all circumstances—revenues arising from customs duties and internal revenue?

Mr. BOATNER. That would depend, Mr. Speaker, very greatly upon the general financial condition of the world and of the United States. If there was no demand for gold for export, of course it would. If our trade relations with the other side were such that Europe was being compelled to pay us gold in settlement of its balances, why, the result which the gentleman refers to would doubtless follow; but in the condition of doubt and distress which now prevails, the unsettled condition of business, the hoarding of gold to provide against possible dangers which the world sees ahead of it, and especially the United States sees ahead of it, why, sir, the only way to guard the gold reserve is to pay the United States notes when presented for redemption, cancel them, and when they are paid let them remain paid; and if the Government of the United States needs additional money to conduct the public business, let it be raised by taxation instead of by borrowing.

Mr. BRUMM. How about the medium of circulation, if there should be a scarcity by destroying these notes?

Mr. POWERS. Supply the loss of greenbacks by some other issue.

Mr. BRUMM. That is the point.

Mr. OWENS. I wish to ask the gentleman from Vermont—and I endeavored to get his attention while he was on the floor—I wish to ask him if the purpose of the Republican majority in passing what are known as the bond and revenue bills was to provide a means for retiring the greenbacks from circulation?

Mr. POWERS. The primary purpose, as I understand it, was to provide sufficient revenue for the Government, so that it could meet its daily expenses without trenching upon the gold-reserve fund. That was the primary purpose. The other political purpose of retiring the greenbacks is one that, I am frank to confess, probably does not meet the approval of a majority of the Republican side. I myself am in favor of retiring those greenbacks and substituting in their place some form of national-bank currency or other currency that will supply the deficiency in the circulation brought about by their redemption.

Mr. OWENS. I suspected that that was the gentleman's motive; but as his party disavowed that purpose on the floor of the House when these bills were before the House, I thought I should like to have an avowal from him.

Mr. POWERS. Well, the party does not represent all its members in their action upon the bond bill, no doubt, and in respect to that question.

Mr. BOATNER. I do not desire to be discourteous, but I must object to my friends taking me off the floor with a discussion between themselves.

Mr. POWERS. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. ROBBINS. I should like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BOATNER], while he is on that subject, if there is any law that authorizes or directs the Secretary of the Treasury to maintain the gold reserve? If so, where can that law be found?

Mr. BOATNER. There is no specific law directing the maintenance of any special reserve fund, but by the act of 1875 the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized—and the authorization amounts to a command—to sell certain specified descriptions of bonds of the United States for the purpose of redeeming the Treasury obligations of the United States. And by the same act all surplus revenues are authorized to be used for the same purpose. A short time after the enactment of that law the Secretary of the Treasury sold bonds of the United States, realizing a fund which approximated $100,000,000, which was known as the redemption fund, and which reserve fund has been known as the reserve fund ever since. And it has been the custom of the Treasury of the United States to maintain since that time a fund of gold of about $100,000,000 expressly for the purpose of meeting any demand which might be made upon it for the redemption of Treasury notes.

But, Mr. Speaker, recurring to the question of my friend from Vermont [Mr. POWERS], who inquired of me just now what, in my judgment, would be the best means of remedying this difficulty, I would state that the first and most efficacious remedy would be a cessation of this free-silver agitation. In my judgment the demand of a large and powerful party in the United States for the unlimited coinage of silver has done more and is doing more to unsettle national finances and to unsettle the business of the country than all other causes combined. There seems to be a determination on both sides of the House, and by factions of both political parties, to press this question to the front.

The result of the last election has shown, in my judgment at least, that a large majority of the sentiment of the people of the United States has condemned this project as vicious and impracticable. When I look around this side of the House and miss the faces of the veterans who have been here for years, and who have made this the leading issue, when I realize that Maryland, West Virginia, and Kentucky, three stalwart Democratic States, have gone Republican; when I see the great State of Indiana here without any representation at all on the Democratic side, and the State of Illinois, I believe, with only one, with only one Democrat from west of the Mississippi River, and the Democratic party shaken in almost every State of the Union, I for one can not see the sense, the wisdom, or the politics in the continuance of an agitation which not only unsettles the business of the country, which must be barren of the result sought to be attained, but seems destined to destroy the Democratic party as a national organization.

Mr. PICKLER. That is the great blessing that is to come out of it.

Mr. BOATNER. No doubt that is the Republican view of it.

Mr. BRUMM. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. What substitute would you have as a medium of exchange after the redemption and destruction of those notes?

Mr. BOATNER. I would increase our silver coinage up to the point of safety. I would increase our coinage at least to the extent of the bullion now in the Treasury. I would then take off the tax on national-bank circulation, except so far as necessary to pay the expense of maintenance. I would permit the national banks to issue circulation up to 100 per cent of the value of the bonds deposited. I would take the United States out of the banking business and confine it to the unlimited coinage of gold and the limited coinage of as much silver as could be maintained at a parity, which might be $750,000,000 or $800,000,000, and, then with a basic circulation of money of final redemption of $1,500,000,000 or probably $2,000,000,000, which it would likely reach, the banks of the country could do the rest.

Mr. BRUMM. The State banks?

Mr. BOATNER. Yes; and national banks.

Mr. BRUMM. Why do you want the 10 per cent tax on State-bank issues taken off?

Mr. BOATNER. Simply because I do not want to see a bank circulation of 10 per cent tied up idly and doing nothing. If a bank invests $120,000 for the purchase of $100,000 in United States bonds, I can see no business reason why it should not be allowed to issue circulation up to the par value. I do not see why they should not be allowed to issue 100 per cent instead of 90.

Mr. BRUMM. I understand the gentleman's remarks have reference to the retention of 10 per cent of the amount of the bonds deposited by the national banks. The matter that I had reference to was the tax on State-bank issues that you said you wanted to repeal, and the question I asked was if your object in having it repealed is to allow the State banks to issue money.

Mr. BOATNER. I do not want to go into that question. I have already made my record on that subject. That is a prohibitive tax on the State banks, but I had reference to the national banks.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman permit me a question?

Mr. BRUMM. Then the gentleman refuses to answer my question?

Mr. BOATNER. I beg your pardon.

Mr. BRUMM. My question was as to whether or not you are in favor of the repeal of the 10 per cent tax on State-bank issues because you favor the issue of State-bank notes?

Mr. BOATNER. Why, I stated to the gentleman most unequivocally that I had spoken and voted for the repeal of that tax. I am opposed to the interference of the United States with incorporated banks of the States. I think that those banks should be allowed to issue such money as may be found necessary. Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will not trespass on the gentleman's time by asking him a question now.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Speaker, I now desire to call the attention of the House to the difference between the financial status of the United States and that of France, it being argued here repeatedly that, as the Bank of France pays its notes alternately in gold and silver, the same might be done by the United States.

I find the per capita circulation of gold in the United States is $8.78; the per capita circulation of gold in France is $22.19. The per capita circulation of silver in France is $8.89; the per capita circulation of silver in the United States is $12.94. The per capita circulation of paper in the United States is $5.92; in France it is 84 cents. The United States possesses a gold stock of $618,000,000; France possesses a gold stock of $850,000,000. The United States possesses a stock of silver of $625,000,000: France possesses a stock of silver of $487,900,000. The United States has in circulation $416,700,000 of uncovered paper—that is, a paper with no specie behind it—nothing behind it but the credit of the United States; France has in circulation only $32,100,000 of such paper. France holds $231,900,000 more gold than we do, $137,100,000 less of silver, and $384,600,000 less of uncovered paper. It is this impregnable strength of financial condition which enables France to pay, or rather to authorize the Bank of France to pay, her notes in gold or silver at her option.

It is contended, Mr. Speaker, that the prices of all farm products are ruinously depressed by reason of the restricted volume of money of final redemption, which they insist is gold alone. This, in my judgment, is utterly unfounded.

The money issued under the Bland-Allison Act—in fact, all the silver money in circulation—is full legal tender for all debts, public and private; payment with it discharges the debt, and the Government is under no obligation to redeem the money.

There is no law authorizing its redemption, and, as a matter of fact, none has ever been redeemed at the Treasury or is likely to be. Hence, sir, the volume of money of final redemption is made up of our total stock of both gold and silver. It may be inquired, if this be true, if the Government is in no wise responsible for our silver circulation, what goes with the argument that silver can not be maintained at a parity with gold on its own merits, and that cheap money always expels all better or more valuable forms of circulation. In other words, if the credit of the Government is not maintaining our silver circulation at a parity, what is?

The answer, sir, lies upon the surface. Although the United States does not promise to redeem a silver dollar by exchanging gold for it, yet it receives it in payment of taxes, and as the expenses of this Government exceed every year the total amount of silver in circulation, a use is furnished every year by the Government itself for every dollar that is in circulation. In no other way can the fact be accounted for that a piece of metal worth intrinsically only 56 cents passes current at 100 cents, the equivalent of gold.

The French silver is maintained at par by the same means.

Contrast, Mr. Speaker, the silver circulation of the United States with that of all silver-using countries, those which have adhered to the free and unlimited coinage of silver. We find in all of them without exception that their money is worth its bullion value and no more. China, Japan, Mexico, and all the Central and South American countries have free and unlimited coinage, and all of them are on the silver basis.

Their money is not only depreciated, but rises and falls with the silver-bullion market.

How is this to be accounted for? Our friends on the other side say the difference is in our people; that the greatness and the power of the United States is so vast that we are able to overcome the laws of finance which govern the balance of the world, and by an edict to create value where none now exists. This is good rhetoric, but poor logic. Economic laws operate with invariable effect, and like causes produce like effects the world over. The reason that the currency of Mexico is debased is because that nation can give no artificial value to it so long as she admits silver to her mints without limit, and it is worth its bullion value. A dollar of the United States is worth nearly $2 of Mexico, because by reason of a limited coinage it serves the purpose and fills the place of a gold dollar, while the Mexican dollar, though legal tender and full weight, is worth 56 cents only.

But, sir, great as the American people are they can not control these natural laws which assert and enforce themselves without regard to statutory enactments; and we have an illustration staring us in the face to-day. One of these laws is that cheap money will always displace the more valuable. This rule, commonly known as the Gresham law, has been operating in our finances for several years past. While, as I have stated, our silver circulation is as good for all purposes of exchange, equal to gold, while it will buy as much as gold, and therefore passes current at par with it, yet the consciousness in the public mind that it is intrinsically worth only about half of its face value and the agitation in favor of furnishing the country with an unlimited supply of it, has produced the invariable result of giving extraordinary activity to the silver and of hoarding gold and its paper representatives. It is from this cause, sir, that the entire revenues of the Government are now paid in silver and that 65 per cent of all money in active circulation is silver. If this law operates on so small a volume comparatively how can it be expected that it would not drive out all other forms of money if silver should be admitted to the mints free of charge for mintage and in unlimited quantities?

It is not necessary, sir, to pursue the subject further. Enough has been said to give the reasons which compel me to withhold my support from the Senate amendment to the House bill. I have been charged with inconsistency upon this question. I admit that my views have undergone considerable modification since we were called to act upon the question in the repeal of the Sherman Act. While I was not clear at that time that free and unlimited coinage was impracticable if we could preserve the parity of our circulation, I believed then, as I believe now, that the best interests of the country will be subserved by the coinage of as large a volume of silver money as can be sustained at a parity, but that the free and unlimited coinage of that metal would be attended with disastrous results.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I can not be expected nor do I intend, in the short time allotted to me in this debate, to undertake to discuss in detail the merits of this great issue, and to point out fully the reasons why I am not in favor of the bill which was passed by the House, but am in favor and shall vote for the Senate substitute. I desire and will avail myself, however, of the privilege given to members of this House to hereafter extend what I have to say in the RECORD; but now, in the time allotted, I propose, without dealing carefully in statistics or in figures, to give to the House some of the reasons why I shall vote to concur in the substitute offered by the Senate. I shall not, however, undertake to answer the argument made by the gentleman from North Dakota, who regaled the House with an exhibition of maps and statistics and mystifying curved lines and figures.

It occurs to me that an incident which is related as happening upon a farm in the South soon after the war aptly illustrates these arguments, which are based upon maps and statistics and mystifying figures, mystifying to everybody but the expert who made them, and at last deceiving even the expert himself. The incident happened soon after the war and before the South had educated to any degree, as she has now educated to a very great degree, those who were our former slaves. At that time farming operations were carried on largely by the old masters and the ex-slaves in a kind of partnership, and so it was in this case, the crops being divided in a certain proportion between the landlord and the tenant, the landlord furnishing the tenant supplies, to be paid for out of the crop.

In the case in question the old negro had a large family that had to be fed and clothed. The crop was gathered and marketed and at Christmas time a settlement was to be had. The accounts were gone over. Great columns of figures were shown to the old negro, who stood scratching his head wondering what it all meant. Finally, when he had assented to all that the landlord had said, when he had admitted that he had received this amount to buy sugar and coffee, and that amount for shoes and clothing, and an order upon the store at this time, and another at that time, when he was shown that the crop had been sold, had brought so many dollars, and that the old man's part amounted to $250, while his debt to the landlord amounted to $256—when all this had been gone over, the landlord said, "Well, Moses, you understand it, don't you?" "Oh, yes; I understand it." "Well, it's all right, ain't it?" "Yes, it's all right, I reckon; but it strikes me, boss, that when you come to look at this thing, a naught is a naught and a figure is a figure, but it is all for the white man and none for the nigger." [Laughter.]

So, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that these maps and statistics and figures, while they may mystify and delude, deceive some, finally bring us to the conclusion that they are made all for the money kings and none for the people. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this substitute. I am in favor of it because to enact it is to carry out in practice the doctrines of the great Democratic party to which I belong, and which that party has taught for many years, at least during the years that I have been a voter. I am in favor of it because that great fight which we made in 1892, and which resulted in victory for my party, was based, so far as the section where I live is concerned, upon the argument and upon the assurance that Democratic success meant the remonetization of silver—"the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country, and the coinage of both gold and silver without discriminating against either metal or charge for mintage."

I do not speak idle words. I do not speak simply the interpretation that I put upon the teachings of my party at that time and that I expressed to the people in my district. I speak the words that were uttered in the platform of that party in 1892, words contained in documents which were sent out from the national headquarters, one of which I hold in my hand, and which taught us to tell the people that the Republican party, by its platform, was a party opposed to silver, while the Democratic party was in favor of it. And I believe, sir, that the good faith which we owe to the people who voted for us on that issue, I believe that the honesty of purpose which we told them we entertained at that time in advocating the Democratic doctrine should dictate to us that whenever an opportunity comes we should at least attempt to carry out our purposes and fulfill our pledges.

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman yield for a question at this point?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I should be only too glad to answer the gentleman's question if I can.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman think that the people of the United States in the last election declared for free silver?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I think that the Democratic party did; and I know that the Democratic party of the Southern States did.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman think that Missouri and Kentucky and Indiana and Illinois and other States which have heretofore had large Democratic representation on this floor, and whose Representatives voted for free silver in the last Congress, have indorsed free silver in this Congress?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I think the Democratic party in those States were so disgusted with the policy of the Democratic Administration and the failure of the Democratic House to pass a free coinage of silver bill that they stayed at home or voted for the opposition. I have the figures here which tell the tale of the election of 1894, and they show that 967,503 voters who had voted the Democratic ticket in 1892 either stayed away from the polls or voted the Republican or the Populist ticket.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That is so.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes; it is so.

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman think that the constituents of Mr. Bland, Mr. Clark of Missouri, General Hatch, and gentlemen of that class——

A MEMBER. What about General Tracey? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOATNER (continuing). Does the gentleman think that the constituents of the men I have named sought to punish the Democratic party by defeating those gentlemen?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I think that Mr. Bland and Mr. Hatch and those gentlemen who tried to be true to the party and the people were slaughtered because the people wanted to strike at the Democratic Congress and the Administration.

Mr. BOATNER. They struck the wrong men then.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes; but they were disgusted. I will answer the gentleman further that those who stayed at home were disgusted, while the pretended Democrats who went to the polls and voted against us did so because they disagreed with the party on some of its leading doctrines. Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to be drawn into a discussion of this kind, because it is mere side play. I am sorry that the gentleman from Louisiana has asked the question, but I shall not shrink from answering it. Does the gentleman regard as Democratic the scene that is being enacted in Kentucky to-day? When was it, until of late, until new doctrines and new theories had been introduced into the party, that men who were true Democrats refused to vote for the caucus nominee of their party?

Mr. BOATNER. Does the gentleman desire an answer to that question?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I have no time to spare, but I will hear the gentleman's answer.

Mr. BOATNER. If the gentleman does desire an answer, I will state to him that the fact he refers to merely shows the absolute destructiveness of the introduction of any such issues into the party. We are threatened with the loss of a Senator in Kentucky because the free-silver men of that State were not satisfied to stand upon the platform of their party.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Yes, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the Democracy is threatened with the loss of a Senator in Kentucky and with disintegration because a few men, a small minority, can not control the majority. When you are in the majority you have a right to frame the platform and claim that the minority shall assent to it; but if we succeed in making the platform and naming the candidate, you have no right to "bolt." I do not propose to "bolt." Wherever the Democratic flag floats there shall be my standard and there will I follow. Whomsoever my party may put up as its standard bearer, though I differ with him, I will hold up his hands and undertake to carry the cause of my party to victory, however much I may differ on some questions from other members of my party. [Applause.]

Mr. BOATNER. Will the gentleman allow me just there?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I have very little time.

Mr. SKINNER. I should like to ask my friend from Georgia a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will yield first to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SKINNER].

Mr. SKINNER. If the Democratic party should adopt a gold-standard platform, and nominate a gold-standard candidate for President, will you vote for him?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I will vote for any man whom the majority of the delegates who may be sent by the masses of the Democratic party of this Union to Chicago shall select as our standard bearer, though I may differ with him. [Applause.]

Mr. SKINNER. Then you are willing to sacrifice the interests of your people upon the altar of your party.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I am willing to forego temporarily my views and the consummation so devotedly hoped for, which must eventually come, and can only come through the Democratic party, in order to preserve the organization of that party, which, I believe as firmly as I stand here, is the only hope for the preservation of the liberties of this people. [Applause.]

Mr. BOATNER rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. These interruptions consume my time.

Mr. BOATNER. Only a moment.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. My time is almost out——

Mr. BOATNER. I will move that it be extended five minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. If that can be done——

The SPEAKER. It will be impossible to extend the gentleman's time.

Mr. BOATNER. Allow me just one moment. The gentleman called upon me——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I have not called upon anybody——

Mr. BOATNER. For my opinion in regard to the course of Democratic representatives in Kentucky who do not abide by the decision of their party, I wish to say that I do not indorse their position any more than he does.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I must go on; the gentleman has had an opportunity to make his speech.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. No, sir; I can not yield longer; I would do so if I could, but my time is nearly all consumed.

Mr. Speaker, I intended to say a great deal more. I am opposed to this gold standard because, in my judgment, both gold and silver are the money of the Constitution, and to demonetize silver is unconstitutional. In exercising the right granted to extend my remarks I shall quote the language of that distinguished lawyer, Daniel Webster, and shall also undertake to show that distinguished and gifted American and Republican, Mr. Blaine, agreed with him; and these two are surely worthy of being followed by me. I agree heartily with the present able Secretary of the Interior, my particular and warm personal friend, for whose views I have always the greatest respect, who said as recently as 1894, in canvassing the State of Georgia during a heated political campaign, that he believed that—

A gold standard is unwise and dangerous. I agree to the proposition that it is calculated to contract the currency; and by contracting the currency check industries, suppress business, and turn honest men out of places.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I hope I may be allowed two minutes more.

Mr. DINSMORE. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I had desired to say something in regard to the Gresham law. I had also intended to say something by way of answer to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means [Mr. DINGLEY], when he spoke of the endeavor of gold to find a suitable "yokefellow," and its inability to find it in silver. I had desired also to say something with reference to that gentleman's assertion that he was in favor of bimetallism but not in favor of "bastard bimetallism."

Sir, like him, I am opposed to bastard bimetallism. I am in favor of that pure, genuine, legitimate bimetallism guaranteed by the Constitution, advocated and promulgated by the fathers and framers of the Constitution, and taught us by great Democratic leaders in their speeches, by their votes, and by the party platforms drawn by them—the coinage of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country. I am, however, opposed to that illegitimate pretense and sham for bimetallism which was "conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity" in 1873, and which went through the American Congress "like the stealthy tread of a cat," unknown to even the Speaker of the House, Mr. James G. Blaine, and to but few of its members, and which escaped even the eye of President Grant when he signed the bill. I am opposed to it because it is the product of an unnatural, illegitimate union between England and Wall street and the Administration in power at that time. I am also opposed to that still more illegitimate product born in 1893 from a coalition between the same forces and the Democratic Administration.

Sir, the lesson taught us by the passing years is that the Democrats of this country are in favor of silver as standard money and money of final payment, and its remonetization as such money. Sir, when the election of 1892 was over, and the Fifty-third Congress was chosen, together with a Democratic President, the hosannas of that great throng of Democrats all over the country, whom I in part represent on this floor, went up with a shout, inspired by the hope that now, at least, the farmers and the middle classes, the laborers, and poor people of this country would have an opportunity to be heard through their Representatives, and that something would be accomplished to relieve them of the distresses that the Republican party had brought upon them when in power. But the men whom they had elected did not carry out, as they understood them, the promises and pledges on which they had been elected, so that when the fatal storm of the 6th of November, 1894, rolled away there was found on the beach of the political ocean the wreck of a grand and glorious party. The small band of Democrats remaining on this side of the House are but the flotsam and jetsam that floated from the wreck to the shores.

I have said that the Democratic party in 1892 favored the remonetization of silver and that the people so understood it. Whatever may have been the mental reservation of those who framed the platform adopted at Chicago on June 21, 1892, the words "that we hold to the use of both gold and silver as the standard money of the country and the coinage of both gold and silver, without discriminating against either metal, or charge for mintage" led all the Democrats who believed in gold and silver as standard money to feel assured that the Democratic party meant that it was in favor of bimetallism; not that now contended for in which gold alone is made the standard, but that which makes both gold and silver the standard money of the country. I hold in my hand a circular sent to me in 1892 by the national Democratic executive committee, numbered 7, headed, "The farmers and the currency question. More money, lower interest, fewer mortgages, more prosperity." That circular begins as follows:

By thousands of American farmers the money question is regarded as the supreme issue in national politics. Irrespective of party affiliation, they unite in demanding such reforms in our system of issuing currency as will result in giving the country a sound circulating medium, whose volume shall be sufficient for its business needs.

Discussing this question further, this circular, under the head of The Republican party's position, says:

Judged either by its past record or present promises it is evident that from the Republican party the debt-burdened farmer, struggling under heavy interest on his mortgages, has nothing to hope for. * * * By adroitly appealing to the patriotism of the people, on the ground that it was the only way in which the sale of bonds could be forced during the war, the Republicans succeeded in fastening the system upon the country and have since been able to defeat all efforts to abolish it. To its maintenance they are still pledged. * * *

The lengths to which the Republican party is willing to go in order to keep its hold upon the currency was well illustrated a few weeks ago by Secretary of the Treasury Foster in a speech delivered at Vermilion, Ohio, in which he said that the Government should extend the $500,000,000 of 4 per cent bonds, maturing in 1907, for fifty years at 2½ per cent, for the purpose of continuing the national-bank system, or, in other words, he wants to borrow money that they did not need and to present the bondholders with $11,000,000 yearly for fifty years; in all, $550,000,000, so that certain banks may have the privilege of issuing notes if they are so inclined. On the question of national banks the Republicans have always ranged themselves on the side of those interested in having money scarce and dear; none the less have they shown in all of their actions their lack of sympathy with the common people in their efforts to escape from the bondage of the money lender. In Congress, on the platform, and in the press they have nothing but ridicule for the earnest and sincere advocates of a more abundant and elastic currency, whom they contemptuously charge with desiring to debase the country's money. All pleas for financial legislation in the interest of the masses have been scornfully rejected. In the Republican national platform there is not a line, not a word, to indicate that the party realizes the importance of the currency question or has any solution to offer. While committed to the present illogical, inadequate, and absurd system, under which the farmers have been oppressed by high rates of interest on the capital they were required to borrow, the Republican party stands condemned by every fair-minded citizen who believed that the national prosperity would be vastly increased by the adoption of better methods for supplying money.

This was the message to the farmers of the country by the national Democratic executive committee in 1892 to secure their votes. This was the charge that they made against the Republican party, then in power—that "they had always ranged themselves on the side of those interested in having money scarce and dear"; that on all occasions the Republican party had shown "their lack of sympathy with the common people in their efforts to escape from the bondage of the money lender." The Republican party and its platform and its conduct in Congress was arraigned before the farmers of the country because of its advocacy of the issuance of bonds and its support of the money lender. It condemned the Republican party because the farmers under the Republican administration had been compelled to borrow at high rates of interest and had been oppressed thereby. And to-day we are confronted with a proposition to still further maintain the Republican doctrine of issuing bonds, of making money scarce and dear, and preventing the common people from escaping from the bondage of the money lender.

It may be said that this was intended only for the farmers; but it can not be safely and correctly contended that the great representative of the Democratic party—its national executive committee—in the conduct of the canvass of 1892 would send to the voters of the country such statements and such declarations unless they felt themselves justified by the history of the Democratic party and its platform. Continuing, this same circular declares:

The history of the Democratic party surely always favored the policy of safe expansion of the currency and has opposed the centralizing tendencies of Federalists and Republicans. They condemn the efforts of the Republicans to continue a banking system founded on the country's debt, and declare their opposition to any scheme to benefit the bondholder at the people's loss. They demand the repeal of the Sherman purchasing act and favor the coining of both gold and silver.

These are the interpretations put upon the platform by this executive committee in its address to the farmers. How truly the farmers believed it is told in the tremendous majorities that the Democratic party received in the great agricultural sections of the land. When they believed they had been misled and deceived, in November, 1894, they rejected the party for its failure to give them the relief it had promised.

We need not fear that the equal coinage of gold and silver as a standard money of the country will drive gold out if we are to be guided by the history of the imports and exports of gold for the past twenty-five years. The year that silver was demonetized—1873—there was exported $35,661,863 in gold from the United States, and this large exportation of gold continued to and including 1877, when it was $21,274,565, during the period the demonetization existed, an average during the five years of over $35,000,000 per year.

Immediately after the passage of the Bland-Allison Act, when silver was partially restored, the exports fell off continually until 1890, when they amounted to but $3,951,736. After the passage of the Sherman law in 1890, which converted silver into a commodity, we find that the exports increased from $3,951,736 in 1890 to $67,704,900 in 1891, in 1892 to $42,841,963, in 1893 to $101,844,087, in 1894 to $64,303,840, and up to November 1 amounted to $55,096,639 for 1895. So that if these figures prove anything (the table can be found on page 29, Report of Director of the Mint for 1895) they establish the proposition that when silver was demonetized the export of gold was large, and when it was partially remonetized in 1878, and until 1891, the export of gold decreased. We have here, therefore, a practical demonstration that when silver was recognized and required to be coined as standard money it did not drive out the gold.

This table demonstrated further that during these periods we had more and larger exports of gold whenever by law silver has been demonetized or its equal coinage of gold prohibited. The history of the two metals in this country from 1871 to 1895 demonstrates conclusively that we have nothing to fear from the Gresham law by remonetizing silver. The total exports of gold from 1871 to October, 1895, was $726,766,800, and during that period we had five years in which silver was demonetized, twelve years in which it was coined to a limited extent, two years under the Sherman law, and two years after the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act had been repealed. During this whole period the imports of gold only amounted to $140,696,468. In spite of the successful war waged upon silver in 1893, which culminated in the unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, gold continually "went out," although it was announced and understood that the United States was at last upon a gold basis. This bond bill which this House passed, and which we are asked to uphold by our votes, is but a measure to supply the Treasury with gold, because it has been drained of its gold by export in spite of the fact that there is now no coinage of silver, it having been stopped. If these figures do not demonstrate clearly that we have nothing to fear from the "bugbear" called the Gresham law, then they demonstrate nothing.

The distinguished gentleman from Maine declares that silver at its present intrinsic value can not be a yokefellow with gold, for the reason that it would drive the dearer metal (gold) out and we would come to a silver basis. I respectfully call the attention of the distinguished gentleman and the people to this table, that they may see that whenever the United States had yoked silver with gold the exports of gold have decreased, and whenever we have unyoked the two metals and endeavored to draw the commerce of the country by gold alone, in spite of the Gresham law gold has departed from the United States. I do not think it can be successfully maintained that gold does not vary in value; that as a standard of value it is fixed, immutable. The tables of the prices of gold, as contained in the reports of the Directors of the Mint, show that gold has risen and fluctuated in value continually. We find in the History of the Bank of England, by Francis Homans, page 154, that at one time—

A rise of 10 per cent in the current value of the stamp dollar took place; in the same year, in consequence of a rise in the price of gold, the dollars circulated by the bank were selling for more as bullion than their rate as coin.

The only solution that is offered for the coinage of silver by those who are advocating a single gold standard is that it can only come through an international conference, and that no international conference can be had, or at least nothing can be accomplished at any international conference unless England agrees to join in the conference and to fix the ratio for the coinage of silver and to fix its value as a standard. Let no one be deceived by any such false hope. It is but "keeping the promise" of bimetallism "to the ear and breaking it to the hope."

On May 27, 1895, the following letter from Sir W. V. Harcourt, chancellor of the exchequer of Great Britain, was sent in reply to the leading bankers of London, who had written him in behalf of the Gold Standard Association:

TREASURY CHAMBERS, Whitehall, S. W.

MY DEAR BERTRAM CURRIE: I have received with much satisfaction the address you have forwarded to me, which I recognized as bearing names among the most weighty which could be found to represent the judgment of the merchants and bankers of the city of London.

I can have no hesitation in giving to that address on the part of Her Majesty's Government the reply which you have a right to expect.

I concur entirely in the opinion expressed in your address, that the experience of well-nigh a century has proved that our present system of currency is suited to the wants of this great commercial country, and that to depart from it would be disastrous to the trade and credit of the United Kingdom.

Continuity of national policy is more necessary in this than in perhaps any other question. You may rely upon it that Her Majesty's Government will not depart from the course pursued by all the Governments that have preceded them, and will give no countenance to any change in the fundamental principles of our monetary system, or in any discussion in which they may be called upon to take part will they admit any doubt as to their intention firmly to adhere to the gold standard, which you justly regard as essential to our well-being as a commercial nation.

I remain, yours, faithfully, W. V. HARCOURT.

Such will be the answer that England will give to all efforts to establish international bimetallism. In the language of the Hon. John G. Carlisle, in a speech delivered in 1878, to be found on page 44, volume 31, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Appendix—

I do not believe that we should consult England.

In that speech he said:

England, having demonetized silver in 1816, and having steadily adhered to the gold standard ever since, can not possibly have any representation or voice in the proposed conference to consider the propriety of restoring to silver coin its money functions throughout the British Empire.

I believe, therefore, that the restoration of silver to its constitutional place as standard money of the country must come, if it comes at all, to the people of the United States through the efforts and action of the United States alone. We boast of our independence of England and insist that she shall regard our policy known as the Monroe doctrine; that she shall not establish or extend by force or other means her power over our sister American republics. We arouse the patriotism of our people by appealing to their love of liberty for our neighbors; but when it comes to the great question of a currency, to the question whether we shall be still further bound in bondage to the financial policy of England, it is said we must timidly submit until it shall suit her good pleasure to relieve us. To such an American policy I enter my firm and earnest protest.

Let us not be deceived that this measure authorizing the issuance of bonds will be indorsed by the people if it shall become a law. It is true enough that the Republican party in 1894 was returned to power in the great majority they hold in this House, and the Democratic party met an overwhelming defeat at the hands of the people; yet the figures of the elections of 1892 and 1894 will demonstrate that while the Democratic vote fell off nearly a million the Republicans only gained 215,000. The Democratic voters who voted in 1892 stayed at home and remained away from the polls in 1894. But they are ready and will vote now against that party and those men who shall endeavor to fasten upon them and their posterity the burden of bonds and the financial policy of England.

Already that policy—the single gold standard—has destroyed vast values in property of the people. In my own State, under the baleful influence of the single gold standard, from 1892 to 1895 property depreciated $15,377,777. In my own county during the same period property depreciated $2,716,696. It cost Georgia and Bibb County for three years these amounts to reach a gold basis. On the Stock Exchange in New York, as shown by the New York Herald of June 12, 1893, $700,000,000 was lost in stock for twelve months prior thereto. Wheat and corn depreciated $250,000,000, although there was a full crop, and cotton over $300,000,000. In the past two years it has required the issuance of $262,000,000 of bonds by the Government to maintain the gold standard, the yearly interest being about $12,000,000.

This loss of property, this shrinkage in value of land, of personal property, of stocks and bonds, these millions that have been added to the public debt, this burden of interest that the people must carry, represent the price that we have paid and are expected to pay to reach and maintain a gold standard. If this is for the interest of the people; if adding to the wealth of the bondholder and the money syndicates and the taking away of the values of the property of the people is the road to prosperity and happiness for our people, then, indeed, will we have to learn a new definition for prosperity and happiness.

I believe that the opening of the mints to silver in the United States and declaring it to be full legal tender for all debts would soon place it in its proper position, so that it would circulate with gold and not create a depreciated currency.

I desire to call attention to a fact which will demonstrate that the coinage of silver will increase its price. It has been stated that the statement made by the honorable ex-Speaker, CHARLES F. CRISP, on November 14, 1895, before the Georgia legislature—that just five years before that silver bullion was worth 94 cents an ounce. The Senate, mark you, not the House, passed a bill favorable to silver, and the general impression going abroad that Congress was going to legislate for silver raised the price of silver, and in ten days it was worth $1.07 an ounce, merely on the hope of its restoration.

This statement created surprise in some quarters and it was admitted to be a strong argument if it did not lack accuracy. Its accuracy was questioned and the statement made that it was not an accurate historical statement. In the spring and summer of 1890, when legislation was enacted to increase the use of silver, the price of silver rose in anticipation of favorable action. The Senate passed a free-silver bill some time in June. Silver commenced to rise in April. The average London price of silver bullion in London was 96.251 cents per ounce for March, 1890, 96.634 cents per ounce for April, $1.02 for May, $1.04 for June, $1.07 for July, $1.15 for August, and $1.16 for September. So that in London, as a result of expected legislation favorable to silver, silver rose from 43⅞ pence per ounce in the month of April to 51⅛ pence per ounce in September. Although the Sherman law did not pass until July 14, 1890, and purchases did not commence under it until August 13, silver commenced to rise in April and continued to appreciate, and it can not be ascribed to any other cause than to the fact that legislation was pending aiming to increase the use of silver as money and favorable action was expected.

Take the case of the closing of the mints in India in 1893. About the middle of June silver sold in London for 38¼d., which was equal to the highest price of that year. On the 26th of June the order closing the India mints was issued, and on June 30 it sold at 30⅛d. in London. In eleven days after the closing of the mints silver fell 21⅛ per cent. And so I might go on from one example to another to demonstrate the proposition I make that the coinage of silver as money and recognizing it as the standard money always has and always will increase its value.

All of the wealth of this country is so unevenly distributed that the millionaires and rich, while they form but 9 per cent of the population, own 71 per cent of the wealth, and the middle and poorer classes, although they form 91 per cent of the population, yet own but 21 per cent of the wealth. If we take the table of the distribution of wealth as prepared by Mr. Spahr, the rich, while only constituting 1 per cent of the population, own 54⅛ per cent of the wealth, and the term rich includes only 125,000 families; the middle classes, composing 10.9 per cent of the population, own only 32⅞ per cent of the wealth, and the poor, while composing 38.1 per cent of the population, own 13 per cent, and the very poor, who compose 50 per cent, own none of the wealth of the country.

One hundred and twenty-five thousand families of this country own over half of all the property in it. This bill we are urged to support, to authorize the issue of bonds and the continuance of the gold standard, will but diminish the number of families who own wealth and increase the number of the poor. The bond sale which occurred a few days ago has been heralded as a great achievement and as an illustration of the patriotism of the American people, who subscribed five times over the amount of bonds desired; but if we examine these bids and the successful bidders we will find that of the $100,000,000 of bonds the Eastern States get more than 92 per cent of them, and of this sum New York alone gets $78,000,000. The Morgan syndicate, it is true, gets only $33,000,000, whereas it was expected to receive about $65,000,000. It may have been a popular loan, but $92,000,000 of the loan went to the same people and to the same section that have heretofore formed bond syndicates with England to make interest out of the American people. I am opposed to and shall resist by my vote the passage of this bill, because I am not in favor of enriching further at the expense of my constituents the Eastern bankers and bond purchasers.

Let us take warning lest this continued concentration of wealth in the hands of a few shall lead to the ruin of this Republic. The words of President Lincoln come back to us almost as a prophecy when he said:

As the result of war, corporations have been enthroned and an era of high prices will follow. The money power will endeavor to prolong its reign until all the wealth is aggregated in the hands of the few and the Republic destroyed.

Mr. Webster spoke against the "concentration of wealth into the hands of the few as being detrimental to the perpetuation of liberty." History teaches us that at the downfall of Egypt 2 per cent of its people owned 97 per cent of its wealth; of Persia, 1 per cent of its people owned all of the land, and of Babylon, 2 per cent owned all the wealth. When the Roman Empire fell a prey to the invasions of the people of the North, the Goths and the Vandals, 1,800 persons in Greece and Rome owned all the known wealth of the world. As a result of the iniquitous financial policy which we are now taught to believe is a sound-money policy, the wealth of the country is aggregated in the hands of a few, and whether the Republic can live or will be destroyed, a victim to the greed and avarice of the few, is a problem for the most serious consideration.

I am opposed to this measure because I am taught that gold and silver is the money of the Constitution, the standard money of the Constitution, the money of final redemption. In the language of Mr. Blaine, "I believe that no power was conferred on Congress to declare that either metal should not be money. Congress, therefore, in my judgment, has no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold; no power to demonetize either any more than to demonetize both." I believe with that great constitutional lawyer, Daniel Webster, "that gold and silver at a ratio fixed by Congress constitutes the legal standard of value in this country, and that neither Congress nor any State has the right to establish any other standard or to displace the standard." He said, further, "that Congress has no power to demonetize silver any more than to demonetize gold; no power to demonetize either any more than to demonetize both."

I shall cheerfully vote to pass this substitute of the Senate in place of the House bond bill. I think we should do it in order to give the people the relief they so much need, and in doing so, in voting for this substitute, I but follow the illustrious example of the present Secretary of the Treasury, who, when a Representative of the people of Kentucky in 1878, said:

Our power of legislation over this subject will not be exhausted by the passage of this measure, and we ought not to halt for a single moment in our efforts to complete the relief inaugurated by it. The struggle now going on can not cease until all the industrial interests of the country are fully and finally emancipated from the heartless domination of syndicates, stock exchanges, and other great combinations of money grabbers in this country and Europe. Let us, if we can do no better, pass bill after bill, embodying in each some substantial provision for relief, and send them to the Executive for his approval. If he withhold it, and we are unable to secure the necessary vote, let us, as a last resort, suspend the rules and put them in the general appropriation bills, with the distinct understanding that if the people can get no relief the Government can get no money.

Mr. Speaker, for myself, I prefer to follow the advice of the Hon. John G. Carlisle, when a representative of the people of Kentucky, and when the recognized leader of the Democratic party, rather than the recent views promulgated by him as the Secretary of the Treasury. In the language of Hon. James G. Blaine, when a United States Senator:

If, therefore, silver has been demonetized, I am in favor of remonetizing it. If the coinage has been prohibited I am in favor of ordering it to be resumed. If it has been restricted I am in favor of having it enlarged.

Before concluding, I shall quote what was said by that great Georgian, always honored and always loved by his people, who devoted his life, his money, his talents, and his time to the interests of his State, and who died serving her in the gubernatorial chair, and who was known also as "the great tribune of the people"—Hon. Alexander H. Stephens. Upon an occasion, while a member of this House, when a measure was before Congress providing for the coinage of silver into full legal-tender dollars at the ratio of 16 to 1, he said:

The ruinous consequences which attend this bad act of administration—

Referring to the act of 1873—were seen in the failures of mercantile houses and business men, amounting to more than half of the public debt of the United States within the last nine years.

Now, I am for free coinage of silver bullion just as of gold. Gold and silver should be put upon a perfect equality as of yore in the ratio of 16 to 1. This would not only add to the value of real estate and all sorts of property in the United States, but it would greatly encourage and stimulate the mining of silver in this country.

In my view all the gold and silver that can be produced to our mints should be coined alike. The coin should be kept in the vaults of the Treasury and certificates of it given in all cases where certificates are preferred. These coin certificates should be the currency of the country; it would be the best in the world.

Mr. Speaker, we are told in mythology and by the great Greek poet Æschylus that Prometheus was the great benefactor of mankind, because he brought down from heaven, for the service of men, the fire which he kindled in a bundle of reeds at the chariot wheels of the sun. On account of this great blessing rendered to the human race he so offended the great Jove that he caused him to be bound and fastened to a pillar on Mount Caucasus, and there his chains were riveted by Vulcan with such power that he could no way stir. A vulture stood by daily gnawing and consuming his vitals, until Hercules at last rescued him from his chains and imprisonment.

So, Mr. Speaker, the power of money and of corporate wealth, combined in England and in Wall street, have bound the American people, because of their opposition to the will of the financial Joves, upon the Mount Caucasus of their greed and avarice, where the insatiable beak of the vulture gold has daily, for nearly a quarter of a century, been devouring the very life and vitals of the people. Their sufferings and their cries for help have continually rung out over the nation, and it will indeed require the power of a Hercules to free them. The people had fondly hoped that the incoming of a Democratic Congress and Administration would mark the end of their suffering and would be the beginning of their deliverance. In this they were disappointed. But the time will come, and is fast approaching, in my judgment, when there will come to the relief of the people, bound and chained as they are, a Hercules who will destroy this vulture and break their chains. I sincerely believe that it will be the Democratic party which will do this, and that the people will at last claim and acknowledge it as their deliverer. And when it shall be done, then, indeed, and not until then, will prosperity, peace, and happiness smile upon this great nation of ours as it once did. [Applause.]

Mr. MILNES. Mr. Speaker, when the bond bill in its original form was before the House in the early part of the session I voted for it—not because I was in favor of issuing bonds in times of peace, not because it was my idea of the course that ought to be pursued to relieve the financial situation, nor because I thought there was any urgent necessity for issuing more interest-bearing bonds, but because I believed it to be the policy of the present Administration to keep up the policy pursued for the last two years; that is, of issuing long-time 4 and 5 per cent bonds under the pretense of keeping up and replenishing the coin redemption fund. I say under the pretense, because as a matter of fact, as shown by a communication to Congress from the Secretary of the Treasury, there is not now and never has been a coin redemption fund. Every dollar which has been received from the sale of the one hundred and sixty-two millions of bonds has been poured into the common hopper of the Treasury, and from thence paid out for the current expenses of the Government.

Under existing law as construed by the President and Secretary of the Treasury they already have the power to issue an unlimited amount of long-time bonds at a high rate of interest. This being the case, and there being no probability of a repeal of that law, I believed it would be good public policy to authorize the issue of a more popular form of bond bearing a less rate of interest and running for a much shorter time. I am of that opinion still. But the Senate, has not in its superior judgment, seen fit to concur, but has adopted a substitute therefor. That substitute is now before us for our consideration.

Mr. Speaker, for the first time in all of my legislative career, either in the legislature of my own State or my short service in this honorable body, I find myself not in sympathy with a majority of my political associates on this floor.

Yet in duty to my own conscience, and as I believe in deference to the wishes of a large majority of my constituents, I am compelled to vote for the Senate amendment.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that this vote will not meet with the approbation of an aggressive and highly respectable number of my constituents who are honestly and earnestly in favor of the single gold standard and believe that a great calamity will befall the country if our mints are thrown open to the free coinage of silver.

I believe that these fears are entirely groundless, and instead of a great calamity a great era of prosperity would be the result of adding to our primary money the silver which God in His great wisdom has so bountifully placed at our disposal.

The Republican party, of which I am proud to be an humble member, has always declared in favor of bimetallism, and for my part I can not conceive of any true or honest bimetallism that does not give both metals an equal chance by free mintage at a given ratio to be fixed by the Government.

If our mints are to be closed to the coinage of silver, and we are to simply use it in limited amounts as a circulating medium, as token money, to be redeemed in gold, the same as we use and redeem paper money, then I do not think we have any use for silver as a money metal, because paper will answer the same purpose, is much more convenient, and certainly very much cheaper.

What we need is not so much an inflation of our currency, but more primary money—more money of redemption—money that the Government will not be called upon from day to day and month to month to redeem in gold, which it is called upon to furnish at such an enormous cost, which keeps enhancing in value and will continue to enhance, until in the end we shall have to declare our inability to meet all our obligations in gold and thus be in a very much worse condition than we are now, because our interest-bearing bonded indebtedness will be very much greater than it is now.

The cost of gold monometallism is altogether too great, and never has been or ever will be sustained by a popular form of government. In fact, none of the political parties, in either State or national conventions, have dared to go before the people declaring in their platforms in favor of the single gold standard, and yet both parties have adopted that policy in the administration of our financial affairs in direct and open violation, as I believe, of the letter and spirit of the law. The obligations of the United States, with the exception of the gold certificates, does not demand the payment of gold, but of coin, in the money of the Constitution—in gold or silver; and yet, with a large amount of silver in the Treasury, we have gone on issuing interest-bearing bonds to purchase gold.

But we are told that although the Government did not expressly agree to pay its obligations in gold, yet the holders of our bonds and other evidences of indebtedness expect to be paid in that ever-appreciating metal.

By what right or authority do they expect to be paid in gold, and gold only? Certainly not by the terms of the contract. The contract is in writing, borne on the face of the bonds and certificates themselves, which expressly state that they are payable in coin. I believe in living up to that contract to the very letter and spirit of the law.

Is there any member of this House who would give his note in writing, and when that note became due would expect to pay more, or in a different manner, than he agreed to pay? Should not the creditor or holder of such a note be satisfied to receive his pay according to the written contract? In a private transaction a man who should claim anything more or different from this would be considered dishonest, and would be frowned upon by all honest men.

But did the holders of our Government obligations expect to be paid in gold; and if they did, by what reasoning did they arrive at such a conclusion? Congress has time and again, when this question has been up for discussion, refused—absolutely refused—to make its bonds payable in gold, and has always insisted on making them payable in coin.

President Cleveland at the last session of Congress asked Congress to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds payable in gold. But Congress utterly refused to give that permission.

When the last sixty-two millions of bonds were offered for sale the President, in a message to Congress, said that if Congress would only authorize the issue of gold bonds he could save the Government some $16,000,000; but, under this great and tempting offer, Congress could not be induced to give him that authority.

The foreign syndicate that bought these sixty-two millions of bonds, and made, it is said, some $10,000,000 in the transaction, could hardly expect that they would be paid in gold, because Congress, in considering that very transaction, absolutely refused to be bribed into making them payable in gold. I have said that gold had enhanced in value. Is there anyone here who doubts that proposition? Gold is like any other commodity. It is subject to the same law of supply and demand. It makes no difference whether the demand is made by legislative enactment or some other cause, the result is the same.

When the United States, in 1873, demonetized silver and put the whole burden of redemption on gold, from that moment gold began to go up and silver began to go down. When France, Germany, Italy, and other nations shortly after also closed their mints to the coinage of silver, another blow was given to the white metal. Gold took another upward turn and silver was further debased. When the mints in India were closed, the last fatal blow was given to silver—a blow from which it can never recover until it is again placed in the proud position from which it has been wrongfully driven by legislative enactments by this and other nations.

As the United States was among the first to strike it down, it should be the first to reinstate it. Professing to be friends of silver will not do it. Professing to believe in bimetallism will not do it. Nothing short of its restoration to the proud position it held prior to 1873 will accomplish the desired result. I do not believe that the ratio of 16 to 1 is imperative. For my part, if I could have our mints opened to the free coinage of silver I would be willing to compromise on any reasonable basis if I could gain the main object, namely, free coinage and full restoration as money of redemption.

But we are told we must have honest money, sound money, the best money known to the civilized world. I am in favor of honest money. Every friend of silver is in favor of honest money. What is honest money? Honest money is that which is a full legal tender for all debts, public or private. Honest money is that kind of money which is authorized by law and recognized as full legal tender, and backed and supported by a responsible government. Honest money is that kind of money which has the full purchasing power of any other kind of money.

If our mints are thrown open to the free coinage of silver, and its legal-tender qualities kept intact, it will pay just as much debt and have as great a purchasing power as any other legal-tender money. But we are told, Mr. Speaker, that it will not pay a foreign debt; that gold is the only recognized money of the civilized world. The United States can not legislate for foreign countries. We can not make any money legal tender and oblige foreign countries to accept it, whether it be gold, silver, paper, or any other form of money. We can only do that which seems best for us to do, that which in our judgment will accomplish the greatest good to the greatest number of our own people.

The rulers of the Old World, the kings, emperors, and czars of monarchial Europe, rule over these subjects, or claim to rule over them at least, by divine right, by authority received direct from heaven, and the people of those countries submit.

The United States of America, the 70,000,000 of free and independent citizens of this country, possessing sixty-five billions of accumulated wealth, deny the God-given right of men to rule and oppress their fellow-men, and have declared that all men are born free and equal, with the right to life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness.

England, the head and front of the single gold-standard nations of the Old World, believes in and practices free trade with the other nations of the world. We have not followed Europe in adopting a monarchial form of government. We have not adopted, and I do not believe we ever will, adopt the English doctrine of free trade. Neither should we imitate them in adopting the single gold standard. I believe that the United States of America is great enough, strong enough, and its people patriotic enough to formulate a financial policy of its own, regardless of what the balance of the world may say or do.

But we are told if we throw our mints open to the coinage of silver that gold will disappear from circulation and that our currency will be contracted to that amount. Yet the very attempt to keep up the single gold standard has driven gold from circulation. It is said that we have in circulation in this country gold to the amount of $600,000,000. I believe that this is a gross exaggeration; but even if it were true, what has become of the vast amount of gold produced by the United States since 1792?

During the last one hundred years we have produced in the United States gold to the amount of nearly $2,000,000,000; deduct from this the $600,000,000 now claimed to be in circulation. The query then arises, What has become of the billion four hundred millions of gold which we produced in the first century of our existence as a nation, but which has gone from us? During this same period, according to the report of the Director of the Mint, $1,233,004,476 in silver has been produced by the United States.

On the 1st day of January, 1895, $625,192,694 of this silver remained in the United States; $607,811,782 had gone from us, gone to fill up the coffers of foreign nations, gone to pay our immense and growing foreign indebtedness, gone into the control of foreign bankers and syndicates to be used by them to force the United States to issue more interest-bearing bonds in order that we might be enabled to keep up the gold standard.

Just so long as we continue to pay our immense foreign indebtedness in gold, just so long will it continue to flow out of the country like a mighty river in an ever-increasing torrent. No one knows, no statistics show the amount of our foreign indebtedness.

Of the vast amount of farm products, machinery, and other exports we send abroad we keep a record. We know just how many bushels of corn and wheat and oats we send to foreign countries. We know the amount and value of our immense exports of beef and pork, cheese, butter, and other products.

Our custom-house officers furnish us with the record of all our imports from other nations and their estimated value.

But no one knows or can approximate with any certainty the amount of our foreign obligations. Not only are our Government, State, and municipal bonds largely owned abroad, but our 180,000 miles of railroads, bonded in many cases to double the amount of their actual cost, have sold abroad their bonds in such vast amounts that the sum total is appalling and beyond human comprehension.

But this is not all. This is an age of trusts and combinations. We have our sugar trust, grown so mighty and powerful that it is openly confessed that it controls legislation and scandalizes public officials. Our match trusts, our cotton-seed oil trust, our standard oil combinations, our brewery combinations, our great mining and manufacturing interests, all of these and many others, representing every form and kind of American enterprise, have sent abroad their bonds, mortgages, and other forms of indebtedness until the sum total pales into insignificance our national and State debts.

Our bonds and other debts owned at home, by our own people, can be paid in any kind of legal-tender money—in greenbacks, in gold certificates, Treasury notes, national-bank notes, and even in despised silver or silver certificates. But when it comes to paying this same class of indebtedness to foreigners who are fortunate enough to own them gold and gold alone is demandep and paid.

As soon as the foreign investor takes our national, State, municipal, commercial, industrial, or other form of American indebtedness abroad, that moment they become payable in gold, and gold alone will be received; so that practically, under our system, the Government of the United States not only undertakes to pay in gold its own bonds, but all the other indebtedness sent abroad by State, municipal, commercial, and industrial corporations; undertake to do that which it is a physical impossibility for it to do, except by continually selling its bonds for gold, and in time there must be an end to this process. When do you propose to stop this debt-increasing system? In my humble judgment it is better to stop now and make use of the vast amount of silver found in greater abundance in our own country than in any other country in the world and thus double the amount of primary money and make it possible not only now but in the future to redeem our obligations in gold or silver, in the money of the Constitution, in the money that was always found good and sufficient until degraded and destroyed by foolish, wicked, and vicious legislation.

What remedy does the present Administration offer for all the ills that it is acknowledged we are suffering under? What remedy do all those who advocate the gold standard propose to cure the sick financial infant?

They tell us to retire the greenbacks and Treasury notes. They tell us to issue five hundred millions more of Government interest-bearing bonds, and thus increase the burdens of an already overburdened and overtaxed people.

But would this solve the problem? Would this do away with the scramble for gold? If it be true that our gold goes abroad to pay our foreign indebtedness and the vast sums expended every year by our men of wealth who go abroad for pleasure—and I firmly believe it is true—then the remedy proposed would not stop the demand for gold.

In my judgment if every greenback and every Treasury note were called in to-morrow and canceled it would not lessen the demand for gold for export, so long as our foreign indebtedness, principal and interest, is payable in gold. It might not be so easy for the banker or the exporter to get his gold as he gets it now. But get it he would, or else default would have to be made in gold pay ments, and the last state of things would be as bad or worse than the first. The trouble is, Mr. Speaker, and gentlemen of the committee, that there is not gold enough to go around, and the sooner we recognize this fact, which is or ought to be patent to every thinking mind, the sooner we shall find the true remedy for our bad financial condition.

Let us, then, as Republicans, who are in so large a majority in this House, not only profess bimetallism but act bimetallism. Let us add to our redemption money the products of our mines, gold and silver, giving them both an equal chance for free coinage and in the redemption of our vast indebtedness.

We are told that gold is the recognized standard throughout the civilized world. This is true so far as monarchical Europe is concerned. Yet I believe it to be true that even in Europe those countries using the greatest amount of silver are the most prosperous. France to-day, according to its population, is using twice the amount of silver we are using without any ill effects, and is recognized as being the most prosperous of all the European powers.

Japan, with her 40,000,000 of people, has made mightier strides in the last twenty years in the great onward march of progress and civilization than any nation on the face of the earth, and uses, I believe, nothing but silver. China, with her hundreds of millions of population, though not so progressive on account of her dense prejudices and her unpopular form of government, uses nothing, I believe, but silver. India, with its teeming millions, which has but recently closed its mints to the coinage of silver, yet uses nothing but the white metal as primary money.

Mexico, which is fast emerging from a half civilized condition to the rank of a first-class nation, keeps her mints open to the coinage of silver, and according to all the evidence and information we are able to gather, is in a more prosperous condition than at any other time during her existence as a nation.

The South American Republics, all great silver using nations, are prosperous and progressing at a rate never dreamed of before.

I cite these nations, not that I believe or am in favor of emulating their example by adopting silver monometallism, but to show that nations can and are prosperous even under that condition, and to call your attention to the fact that if it is the true and only honest policy to adopt the gold standard then it would be the honest and best policy for Japan, China, India, Mexico, and the South American Republics to adopt the same policy. If, according to the theory of the gold-standard advocates, these nations, with their hundreds of millions of population, with their vastly increasing commerce at home and abroad, should conclude to be honest and adopt the single gold standard, where are they going to get the gold to do it with?

They would be forced to do precisely what we are doing now—issue their bonds for the purchase of gold.

And the scramble that is now going on among the different nations of the world would be intensified to such an extent as to become intolerable. It would demonstrate to a still greater degree (that which is already patent) that there is not gold enough to go around, and the consequence would be that gold would go higher and higher. The products of the farm, the factory, and mines would go lower and lower, and it would become more and more of a burden for men to live and pay their honest debts. Let us pause while there is yet time in this mad career—this unholy scramble after gold.

I am a Republican. I cast my first vote for Abraham Lincoln in front of Petersburg, Va., in 1864, and have continued to vote the ticket ever since.

I am a firm believer in the principles of the Republican party, and do not believe that a full measure of prosperity will again be reached until the Republican party is again placed in full control of our national affairs and a protective policy again fully restored.

I do not believe that all the ills we have suffered in the last three years were brought about by the demonetization of silver in 1873, but I do believe that making gold practically the only money of redemption has had much to do with the steady and gradual decline of products, business, and profits that has been going on for the last twenty years.

If the Republican party had not been voted out of power in 1892 and the Democratic free-trade party voted in, times would not have been as bad as they are now. We should have been enjoying a measure of prosperity, at least. But I do not believe that this nation will again reach that measure of prosperity which we are entitled to and should enjoy until both gold and silver are again used as a basis for all of our currency.

The convention in which I was nominated adopted a platform in which appears the following declaration:

Resolved, That we believe in the largest possible use of silver consistent with the maintenance of our national credit, and that we also believe in the use of gold and silver as the money of our nation, and that silver should be restored to its time-honored position in the nation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that platforms are made merely for politicians to ride into office on. I believe they are made for honest men to stand upon, and for one I intend to stand upon that platform as I understand it.

I do not apprehend that any patriotic citizen of this great Republic is desirous of destroying the credit of this great nation. For one I desire to build up and strengthen the credit of the nation, and believe that the surest and easiest way to accomplish this result is to provide more standard or basic money, and this can only be done by throwing our mints open to the coinage of silver.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what was the time-honored position of silver in this nation? For nearly a century from the foundation of the Government up to 1873 our mints were open to its free coinage at a ratio of from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1. I do not pretend to say that we may not at any time change this ratio.

The Constitution of the United States expressly places the power to fix the value in the Congress, and to coin gold and silver—not gold alone, but gold and silver.

The platform of the Republican party adopted by the State convention in the city of Grand Rapids in July, 1894, adopted the following plank in regard to silver:

We believe in the use of gold and silver as money metals, to be maintained in circulation on a perfect equality and inconvertibility.

We recognize the so-called silver question as one of the paramount political issues of the day, and believe that the people of this State and country do look to the Republican party, the party of ability and progress, as the only party that can give a wise and adequate solution of this problem. We therefore pledge the Republican party of Michigan to use every effort in its power to restore silver to its historic position in the United States as a money metal.

We pledge this in the belief that permanent prosperity will not be assured or justice be done until silver takes its time-honored place side by side with gold as one of the two great money metals of the world.

In 1895 the Republican platform again declared its adherence to the platform of the silver plank of 1894.

All these declarations in favor of the restoration of silver to its time-honored position in the nation mean something, or else we are dishonest and are attempting to deceive. I believe they mean just what they say, that silver should again be restored, and shall cast my vote for its restoration. The distinguished gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], in his intensely interesting and able speech delivered on this floor yesterday, like all men who believe in the single-gold standard, says he believes in bimetallism, but points out no way of reaching that desired haven except through international agreement.

I agree with him that international agreement would be the best possible solution if it could be brought about. But the gentleman from Maine knows, as we all know, that there is no human probability of any such agreement. We must therefore adopt some other means, or else give up the fight for bimetallism and settle down to the single gold standard, with all its blighting consequences. Mr. DINGLEY tells us that there are now in the Treasury 353,000,000 silver dollars, kept there to redeem an equal amount of silver certificates which are now in circulation. This is right and proper as the law now stands upon the statute books, but the law is a bad law. It is a law which discriminates against the circulation of silver.

There never should have been a law making any of our various forms of paper money payable exclusively in gold or silver, but in gold or silver, at the option of the Government.

If every silver certificate is to be backed by a silver dollar deposited in the United States Treasury, then the same policy should be pursued with all other forms of paper money. No discrimination should be made against any form of our currency. The Government should not discredit and throw doubt around its own obligations.

If we, by our actions as the representatives of the people, throw doubt or discredit on our own money, we can not expect the people, and especially those of other nations, to have the most unbounded faith in it.

The trouble is, gentlemen of the committee, our whole financial system is illogical, inconsistent, and dishonest. Professing to make silver legal tender, yet we refuse to pay it out in payment of our obligations; professing to be bimetallists, yet we have adopted the strictest kind of gold monometallism.

Mr. DINGLEY says, "Take a five-dollar gold piece, melt it up, and it is worth just as much as bullion as it was when coined and bearing the Government stamp." This is true, but why is it true? Because you have done for gold precisely what we are now asking you to do for silver, namely, allowing the holder of the gold bullion to take it back to the mint and have it recoined into legal-tender money without cost.

When silver enjoyed this same constitutional privilege for nearly a century of our national existence, a silver dollar could be melted up and be worth just as much as when it was coined and bore the stamp of the Government. The difference is in the treatment of the two metals—treat them both alike, on equal terms, and then it will be fair to make comparisons. It is not fair to debase and cheapen silver by destroying by legislative enactment practically all demand for it and then turn around and say that it is not fit for standard redemption money because it is too cheap.

My distinguished friend from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] says that if we open our mints to the free coinage of silver and expect to keep the two metals at a parity we must believe that free coinage will double the value of silver bullion. The error in this statement is this: He insists on measuring all values in gold, which has been made abnormally high by the extraordinary demand created for that metal by making it the only money of redemption. Take away that demand, or a considerable portion of that demand, and the price of gold will fall. Increase the demand for silver by making it perform part of the work now performed by gold alone and silver will go up and meet on a common level with what is now called the more precious metal. The production of the two metals on a basis of 16 to 1 have been about equal. There is no overproduction of either metal.

But, Mr. Speaker, my time has expired. Allow me to say, in conclusion, that I have no sympathy with those who believe in the formation of a new party based on a single idea for the solving of this question.

A party formed on a single idea never did succeed and never will succeed.

I am a Republican, and propose to make my fight inside the ranks of the Republican party, a party which has the confidence of the people of this country.

Our Democratic friends can not succeed in restoring silver, because the people of this country have no confidence in them. If they should undertake it they would be sure to make a bungling job of it. just as they did with tariff reform. Our Populist friends can not succeed, because they enjoy to a still less degree, if that were possible, the confidence and respect of the American people. In fact, the Populists are not now, nor never have been, true bimetallists. They are simply inflationists. Their wild and visionary schemes of almost unlimited fiat money will never be indorsed by the people of this country. So, Mr. Speaker, our only hope for true bimetallism is through the Republican party. For one, I cast my first vote for it. I expect to cast my last vote for it. [Applause.]

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 59 minutes a. m., Saturday, February 8) the House adjourned until 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 8, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY M. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 5474, a committee bill, to provide for the extension of the time within which suits may be brought to vacate and annul patents upon public lands, and for other purposes, to which the Committee on Public Lands have prepared some amendments, be ordered to be printed with the proposed amendments.

There being no objection, the order was made.

BRAINERD AND NORTHERN MINNESOTA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 3009) granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota.

The SPEAKER. That motion is in order. This bill does not go to the Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 4, at the end of the bill, add section 6:
"That Congress reserves the right to alter, amend, and repeal this act or any part thereof."

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

On motion of Mr. FLETCHER, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

SIOUX RESERVATION, DAKOTA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. 3728) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889.

The Senate amendment was read, as follows:

On page 2, line 28, after the word "shall" insert "not be for a longer period than ten years and shall"; so that it will read "Provided, That such leases shall not be for a longer period than ten years," etc.

Mr. MADDOX. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

The SPEAKER. This is the House bill with a Senate amendment. The question is on concurrence with the Senate amendment.

Mr. MADDOX. I did not understand it; it is all right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to have this amendment read again, Mr. Speaker. I did not understand the reading of it before.

The Senate amendment was again reported.

The amendment was concurred in.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in behalf of the Committee on Printing with regard to a question touching the RECORD, and to make a parliamentary inquiry.

I find in the RECORD of the 7th a speech printed, I suppose, under the consent of the House, put in by Mr. STALLINGS of Alabama, a reprint of many pages of an address by Senator GEORGE at Winona, Miss., last year. I beg to remind the Speaker of the action taken by the House when consent was granted to members to insert speeches in the RECORD. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY], in response to the request of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP], said:

I ask unanimous consent also that gentlemen may be permitted to print speeches on this question for the period of ten days, with the understanding that they shall be such speeches as would ordinarily be delivered if an opportunity had offered on the floor of the House, and not to be a compilation of chapters from books and essays from magazines, which shall be excluded under this consent. I make this suggestion because once before, when a similar consent was given, members immediately began to print all the books in the library.

The Speaker, in submitting the question, said:

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

It was submitted on the proposition and under the limitation named by the gentleman from Maine.

Now, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the instance here cited is in clear violation of the consent given by the House. I understand that there are other instances, thus early, of this character.

Mr. DALZELL. I should like to ask the gentleman if he is aware that a member of the House from Texas has published the speech of another member of the House from Texas, delivered somewhere in Texas at a political meeting?

Mr. PERKINS. My attention has been called to that, Mr. Speaker, but I have not seen the instance in the RECORD.

Mr. HARTMAN. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. We have none of us any disposition, I assume, to violate any agreement or rule of the House. I want to cite my own case in this regard. On yesterday I had the honor of addressing the House for half an hour on this pending bill, and during that address I said that I would publish certain extracts from newspapers. Now, I want to know whether the rule which the gentleman refers to excludes me from doing that thing?

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. PERKINS. No——

Mr. HARTMAN. Because I do not desire to violate a rule of the House.

Mr. PERKINS. No; the statement of the gentleman from Maine included this:

With the understanding, therefore, that it is to be such speeches as might ordinarily be delivered in the House, with such extracts as are usually read and belong to a speech, and not chapters from books, etc.

Mr. HARTMAN. The extracts which I propose to insert are of the usual kind.

Mr. PERKINS. The instance to which I call attention, Mr. Speaker, is one in which the entire address of a Senator is repeated, and certainly it appears to us that the Senators have ample opportunity to make expression of their views without our assistance on this side of the Capitol.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. PERKINS. I have also now called to my attention the fact that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PENDLETON] availed himself of the privilege by reprinting a speech delivered by the Hon. J. W. BAILEY at Sherman, Tex., on the 11th day of last June.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my parliamentary inquiry is as to whether this consent of the House is to be violated in this way. It would be better to withdraw that consent than to permit this to continue, and I wish to ask that these violations of that consent be marked and ordered stricken from the permanent RECORD; and I hope that instances of this kind may not be repeated, but that the exercise of the privilege may be confined within the limitation of this generous consent of the House. I think for myself that where speeches are printed in the RECORD by consent of the House they should be marked in the RECORD "Printed by consent of the House of Representatives," so that it might be understood that they were no part of the proceedings upon the floor of the House.

The understanding was distinct and clear, and in my judgment no gentleman has a reasonable excuse for violating that understanding.

Mr. Speaker, I submit that parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether my friend has offered any resolution or not. Of course the House will understand it is very difficult to determine exactly what is or what is not an abuse of the privilege to print. I am very sure the Speaker himself does not propose to decide that question.

Mr. PERKINS. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. CRISP. I say it is very difficult to determine what is or what is not an abuse of the privilege to print remarks, and I am very sure that the Speaker himself will not decide that question. It has frequently arisen, during my service here, and, as I say, it is very difficult to determine. Now, I recollect very well the statement of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] at the time this consent was obtained, and I agreed with it. I thought it was right and proper.

But I am not prepared to say that that to which the gentleman calls attention is a violation of the rule. either.

Mr. PERKINS. It is a violation of the consent under the limitation.

Mr. CRISP. Now, why? Suppose that I should rise in my place and be recognized by the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole to make remarks upon the question now pending, and I should have in my possession an address delivered by some other gentleman on that particular subject at some other place, which I regarded as a full, able argument on the subject, and I should say, "Mr. Chairman, I propose to read in this connection the remarks made by Mr. Jones" at such a place and such a time, and I should read. Now, would you strike it from the RECORD?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir; there could be no objection to that, to anything you might read here in your own time, but this is quite a different case. The House has given consent to any member to print without speaking, without occupying time, in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, the remarks he would have liked to submit in the open House.

Mr. CRISP. That is it.

Mr. PERKINS (continuing). That consent was limited to such remarks as he would have made, but to print speeches that he might find in the Congressional Library or where not was not included in that consent.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman assumes that. I do not know whether it was or not.

The only rule, Mr. Speaker, that has ever been adopted, or ever can be, on the question of this right to print, where it is given, is this: That the speech shall not be impertinent; that it shall not be foreign to the subject at issue, contain any personal matter, and, of course, Mr. Speaker, it shall not be a cooperation between half a dozen gentlemen to print a book, or anything of that sort; but when you come specifically to define what is a violation of this privilege it is hard to do it. Now, I would have no doubt that what was done a few years ago, when a book was printed, when one gentleman presented one chapter and another another, and another another, that that was a violation of the spirit of the rule; but if I get up in my place and present an address made by a gentleman anywhere in the United States on the pending subject-matter, I am inclined to think it is not a violation of the rule.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman will permit me, there is no dispute here as to what the gentleman might do when he gets up in his place——

Mr. CRISP. Can not he read it?

Mr. PERKINS (continuing). And what he might offer.

Mr. CRISP. Can not he read it?

Mr. PERKINS. He could read it.

Mr. CRISP. Could not he read what the gentleman said, if he chose?

Mr. PERKINS. There is no question about that, if he chose.

Mr. CRISP. Now, what is the gentleman's point?

Mr. PERKINS. Now, here is the point. Unanimous consent of the House was asked to print speeches outside of the debate occurring in this House, and such speeches as gentlemen might prepare by the aid of midnight oil and much perspiration, where they could not get time here, that they could for a period of ten days, under this unanimous consent, print those speeches in the RECORD, that they might have the advantage of them in their several districts. But that unanimous consent was limited. It was specifically provided that that consent did not extend beyond the production of the individual member.

Mr. CRISP. Oh, no.

Mr. PERKINS. But that he could use such extracts as he would like to make——

Mr. CRISP. Ah!

Mr. PERKINS. In the ordinary course of his speech; but that he could not transfer bodily a speech, or a magazine article, or a book from the library. That was clearly understood, and as to these two instances that have been referred to, they are in clear violation of the consent of the House.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I ask permission to say a word upon this question.

Mr. CRISP. One moment. The gentleman has overlooked the statement in the RECORD, and I had myself. I call his attention——

Mr. PERKINS. I read it.

Mr. CRISP. I call the gentleman's attention to it:

Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to avail myself of this opportunity of making a permanent addition to the literature on the subject of finance. I will ask to be allowed, as I believe I am already under the special rule permitted to do, to have printed in the RECORD, in the ordinary type, the speech of the Hon. J. Z. GEORGE, of Mississippi, delivered at Winona, Miss., on Saturday, July 13, 1895.

I am informed that the gentleman did that in the open House. I was not here myself.

Mr. RICHARDSON. That is true. I am so informed by the reporters themselves.

Mr. CRISP. He rose in the open House and asked that permission.

Mr. BRUMM. There is no doubt about that; I was here.

Mr. CRISP. Now, that seems to cover the whole case.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, in reference to the other case. The gentleman from Alabama stated that he understood he had already consent.

Mr. CRISP. Yes; but he also asked permission of the House last evening.

Mr. PERKINS. That may be. I can not deny that. Of course any consent that the House may at any time choose to give is not a thing for me to criticise or make contention about.

The SPEAKER. Has the gentleman from Georgia the RECORD containing the speech before him?

Mr. CRISP. I have.

The SPEAKER. What was said on that occasion? Was the consent of the House asked by the presiding officer or was it stated that consent had been already given?

Mr. CRISP. It does not appear that there was any response to the statement or suggestion of the gentleman from Alabama. The Chair will see what took place on page 1507 of the RECORD.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Alabama proceeded under the assumption that he already had consent, which consent does not appear to have been granted.

The SPEAKER (examining the RECORD). There does not seem to have been any consent granted in this case.

Mr. CRISP. No further than as I have stated. But, Mr. Speaker, what does appear in the RECORD shows that there was no purpose on the part of the gentleman from Alabama to violate the spirit of the rule, and that he intended to print what he would have been glad to read if he had had an opportunity, and that is what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] asked might be accorded to members, the right to print such speeches as they would make if they had the opportunity.

The SPEAKER. The last clause of the request made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] reads, "with the understanding, therefore, that it is to be such speeches as may be ordinarily delivered in the House, with such extracts as may be usually read belonging to a speech, and not chapters of books or magazines," and matters of that kind.

Mr. CRISP. But, as the Chair sees from the RECORD, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] notifies the House that he desires and intends to print the speech. It is true he assumed that he had already the right to do it, but he asked additional consent to do it, and no objection was made to that request.

Mr. PERKINS. It does not appear that the question was submitted to the House.

Mr. CRISP. It does not.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, Mr. Speaker, of course it would not be any part of my duty here to call attention to a case where the House had given its consent; and in what I have said I have been referring only to instances which come under the general consent of the House as limited and defined in the request of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY].

Mr. CRISP. This is not a speech of unusual length, and no doubt the gentleman from Alabama would have been glad to have read it if he had had an opportunity. However, as the gentleman from Iowa doubtless has a proper purpose in view in calling attention to this matter, I submit that if there is anything to be done about it the gentleman had better adopt the course which has been adopted on previous occasions and have the subject referred to the Committee on Rules or in some way direct the attention of that committee to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the suggestion of the gentleman from Georgia would be a satisfactory one to the House. The Speaker, of course, would not like the task of discriminating in such a case as this. It rests largely upon the good faith of members what shall be printed under a general leave to print, and it is very possible that the particular cases which are made the subject of question on this occasion might readily be disposed of with the consent of the gentlemen who have put the speeches in the RECORD, the presumption being that they did not intend to violate the rule.

Mr. PERKINS. I certainly have no purpose in this matter except to protect the RECORD. I have no feeling against any individual member. I think that in time past the leave to print has been abused, and, so far as I am able, I desire to prevent that abuse in this Congress. In these two instances, however, I will ask that unanimous consent be given for the printing of these speeches in the RECORD; but I hope hereafter the conditions of the general consent will not be violated, and that any member who has occasion to print a speech of this character will ask for unanimous consent apart from the general consent which has been granted. Now,

Mr. Speaker, to clear up this matter, I ask unanimous consent that these two speeches be retained in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the continuance in the permanent RECORD of the speeches which have been printed in the daily RECORD by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. STALLINGS] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PENDLETON], respectively.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. 1464) to amend chapter 76, laws of 1893;

A bill (H. R. 2175) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation; and

A bill (H. R. 3812) to authorize the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw Nation, in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following Senate bills were taken from the Speaker's table and referred by the Speaker as follows:

A bill (S. 1447) authorizing the President of the United States to nominate Lieut. Commander R. G. M. Brown, now on the retired list, to be a commander on the retired list—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (S. 1740) to amend section 5294 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relative to the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to remit or mitigate fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

BOND REDEMPTION FUND.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for further consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of consideration of the pending bill.

[Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EVANS] desires to be recognized and to utilize thirty minutes of his time and then yield to his colleague [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. EVANS. That is my purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EVANS] is recognized.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, it is by no means my purpose upon this occasion to discuss the currency generally, because, if for no other reason, the question before us does not call for it.

The only matter to be determined is, Shall the House concur in the Senate's action in substituting for our bill for maintaining and protecting the coin redemption fund a measure having objects which do not even in the remotest degree bear upon it? Analyzing the Senate's substitute, we find that it relates to four distinct subjects, not one of which is germane to the House bill. They are: First, the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1; second, the coinage of the silver seigniorage now in the Treasury; third, the calling in of all greenbacks and Treasury notes of denominations of less than $10, and the reissue of the same in bills of that denomination, and fourth, requiring the redemption of our paper currency in gold or silver coin at the exclusive option of the Secretary of the Treasury. This last is doubtless under the hope that we shall at some more or less remote date have a free-silver Secretary.

I shall only discuss the first of the measures proposed by the Senate substitute, and that with brevity. The consideration of the free-silver clause of the proposed substitute does not, as I have indicated, legitimately involve any discussion of the general subject of currency, but only that of the coinage, which, though a wide and most important one, falls far short of the limits of the other. As far back as there was money silver and gold were the metals mainly used to make it, and while other metals, from time to time, were also used, yet in that process of evolution by which the best was found gold and silver alone have survived, and if the process of selection is to be continued on the same lines, the friends of silver may, by their extravagant unwisdom in insisting upon the 16 to 1 ratio, force the survival of gold as the fittest, and by the elimination of the least fit put us on a basis of that gold monometallism they so much dread. Unless this is done, it seems to me, from the standpoint from which I view the question, that both metals may continue to be used if there can be an adjustment of all controversies as to their respective values upon such a basis and in such a way as to secure and maintain, at least approximately, the parity of the intrinsic value of the quantity of metal to be put into a dollar made of each. If this is done the two old and traditional money metals will continue their companionship, but in no other way can this result be reached. It may not be reached even in that way, but it will never be attained by free coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of rejecting the substitute and of insisting upon our own bill, for several reasons, which I shall take the liberty of presenting to the consideration of the committee. The chief of these is, that we should resist with all our power the creation of fiat money to any extent whatever. No candid and intelligent man will contend that the two metals have now a relative value of only 16 to 1. Their real relative value is unquestionably nearer to 32 to 1. Now, to put into one coined dollar 100 cents of value in gold and into another coined dollar only 50 cents of value in silver, and call them the same thing, is to create in the latter 50 cents of mere fiat money; that is, money which is such by mere fiat or command of the Government alone, and not money which, to that extent, has any intrinsic value whatever. In my judgment this is utterly irrational and unphilosophic, not to say fantastic and absurd, and will ultimately be so regarded by those not blinded by too direct an interest in silver mines or silver miners.

It will not do to say that greenbacks are fiat money, for as long as they are redeemed and redeemable in gold there is nothing like fiat money about them except their legal-tender quality, which, however, becomes immaterial from that standpoint as soon as they are redeemable on demand in gold. When we speak of money and not of its mere paper symbol or representative we mean a quantity of the precious metals the weight and fineness and consequent intrinsic value of which is ascertained by a mark thereon lawfully made by the almost ineffaceable stamp of the Government mint, and we do not mean that unintelligible and elusive phantom called "primary money" or "money of ultimate redemption" by those who employ terms which, like many of those of the old alchemists, nobody so little understands as those who use them most glibly. Any coin is a fraud to the extent that the Government stamp upon it misrepresents its intrinsic commercial value, and our Government, of all others, with its magnificent financial record, ought not to be guilty of putting such a fraud upon her people. We demand honest dollars, every one of which has an intrinsic value equal with the other; one we can tie to at home and abroad; one that the laboring man can rely upon without fear that its fluctuations in value can cause him a loss before he can hasten a time to spend it in order to prevent that loss, and all equally valuable intrinsically, thus excluding fiat money of every sort. We can not afford to have two coins called a dollar, each a legal-tender in paying debts, while one is worth 50 cents and the other a hundred. Such a folly would amaze the thoughtful man of the present and would most certainly astonish our posterity.

The result of such a state of things would be the exclusion of the more valuable dollar from circulation, because, of course, a sensible man would not use 100 cents of value when 50 cents of value would serve him as well, and we should soon be upon a silver basis, and have in consequence a second-rate commercial standing before the world along with Mexico and other free-silver countries, instead of having the magnificent position we have had and to which we are so fairly entitled. Instead of standing in the front rank and at par with the proudest countries of the world, we should sink to a 50 per cent below par position as soon as we reached the silver basis, and our dollar, inflated at home, would be dishonored abroad.

I do not deny that I have a sympathy with our friends of the silver sections of the country, whose expectations may have been disappointed, and who have thought that we should continue to buy enormous quantities of silver the Government had no use for in order to give their principal industry a market for its product. This was a hope fostered by the act of 1878 and the Sherman Act, but it must be remembered that this alternative was thereby presented, either that the small silver sections must give up this unwisely and injuriously bestowed advantage or else that the vast majority of our people and the great preponderance of other sections of the country must suffer injury the extent of which would be so enormous as to be incalculable.

Before proceeding further I will pause long enough to pay a deserved tribute to the Sherman bill. It demonstrated to the country by its operations that the more favor was shown silver the less valuable that metal became. The longer the act was in force the lower silver descended in price and the more there was of commercial and financial disturbance. This is a lesson that should not be lost nor forgotten by the thoughtful legislator. But it is made matter of observation in this debate that the Government should not only permit the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, but should maintain the parity of the two coins.

Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States may go to the absurdity of declaring that 50 cents in silver shall be equal to 100 cents in gold, and of announcing that it will maintain that declaration against all comers, and with its immense resources and powers it may for a time make the declaration good by exchanging a gold dollar for a silver one every time it is desired; but even its resources are limited, and if free and unlimited silver coinage should go on for any length of time, or if the Sherman Act, which was far short of free coinage, had continued in operation, even our great Republic would have had to acknowledge that it was unequal to the task of losing 50 per cent of every silver dollar it was called upon to make equal to a gold one. There are some things which are impossible, and this would be one of them.

The people of this country were willing and are willing "to do something for silver," as the phrase is, but they are not willing to do that much, nor to "be done" that much.

We can possibly digest the number of that sort of silver dollars already upon the financial stomach, but that the limit has been reached was demonstrated by the panic of 1893–'94.

It comes at last, Mr. Chairman, to a question of wise expediency. Is it wise or expedient to coin both gold and silver, or only one of them? If we make the dollars equal in intrinsic value, use both metals, but if one is only half as valuable as the other, then to coin both upon equal terms would be an act of immeasurable folly which, while it might enrich a few silver miners or benefit politically or otherwise those who depend upon them, would come as near to ruining the rest of us as any one thing could.

There is nothing sacred and there should be nothing sentimental about it. It is a matter of plain common sense.

If you can put a hundred cents' worth of silver into a dollar, then coin silver; but if that is impractical it is because silver has ceased to be a proper coinage metal, and in that event it would be folly to coin it, because, while it might benefit the few, it would ruin the many.

Mr. Chairman, the second objection I urge to the substitute is that the free and unlimited coinage of silver would, to the extent of the difference in intrinsic value between gold and silver dollars, result in the repudiation of public, and especially of private, obligations. Of course, such a system of coinage would promptly drive all the gold out of circulation. The people would understand that the silver dollar, so called, was really only half a dollar, except for the mere purpose of paying debts that had been contracted on a gold basis, as the present basis certainly is. Prices might be inflated as they were in times of depreciated currency during the war, but debts would be stationary and dischargeable in a currency only half as valuable as that with reference to which they had been created. Though belonging myself to the debtor class of the people, I am utterly opposed to this and to every other form of repudiation, however insidious may be its approaches or however alluring may be its disguise.

I have already alluded to the fact that the inevitable result of the passage of such a law as the Senate proposes in the first section of its substitute would be the driving out of all the gold currency, for it could not be retained when it can at home and abroad be converted into that which can perform double its functions at least in paying debts. It will be seen that with the gold dollar worth intrinsically double as much as a silver one it can be used in that ratio in purchasing anywhere its less valuable substitute. To put it otherwise, the possessor of 100 cents in gold will part with it for another commodity which can so soon be converted into what is equivalent for debt-paying purposes to 200 cents, although that 200 cents represents 100 of mere fiat. All gold currency would, in this manner, soon dissappear in the work of dumping the silver of the world upon us.

Because it seems to me that nothing but evil and confusion could result from the adoption of the substitute I most earnestly oppose it.

Viewing the matter, Mr. Chairman, from another standpoint, I oppose the adoption of the substitute because the House bill is an excellent and proper measure within itself, which has had already the happy fate of exerting a most potent and valuable influence for good upon the Treasury, for even while it had only passed this House, and was being stabbed to death in the other, it has, by the operative force of being discussed and passed here, yielded to the Government a net income of some $7,000,000 in gold coin. While it was being discussed in this House we were threatened with the loss of the amount of the enormous profits that a New York syndicate was to make by another sale of a hundred million dollars of Government bonds at a premium of about 4 or 4½ per cent, but under the pressure of the bill as passed by the House, under pressure of the discussions in this body, in short, under that much stress of sound Republican doctrine and statesmanship the Administration has been forced into changing its programme and into offering that hundred million loan to popular subscription, and in this way has been enabled to sell the whole amount at a premium of about 11 per cent, and with bids made for nearly five hundred million more than were for sale. Yet with the value of the House bill thus demonstrated the Senate of the United States sends back to us this wholly irrelevant substitute, which it seems to me this House should never concur in. It should insist upon its own measure, the wisdom and value of which has been thus so signally demonstrated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. EVANS] to now yield to his colleague [Mr. McCREARY].

Mr. EVANS. I do.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, when Congress convened two months ago there was a surplus in the Treasury of $98,000,000, exclusive of the gold reserve. With more money on hand than was necessary to defray the current expenses and meet the obligations of the Government and a financial system that was a perpetual menace to the gold reserve, the President in two messages asked for legislation to relieve the country by a complete change in our financial system. He referred to the United States notes, commonly called greenbacks, and Treasury notes, which have been draining the gold out of the Treasury, and showed that they were the great source of embarrassment and danger, and recommended such a revision of our monetary laws as will give us an adequate and elastic but not a contracted currency.

The House of Representatives responded to the President's request with a general tariff bill increasing the burdens of taxation $44,000,000 annually, although the President in his message and the Secretary of the Treasury in his report declared that there was no necessity for increasing the revenue and no necessity for imposing additional burdens in the way of taxation upon the people. The House of Representatives also responded to the President's message by the passage of another bill authorizing the issue of 3 per cent coin bonds, redeemable in five years from date and payable in fifteen years. That relief was not such as the country expected; that was not such relief as the President asked. It was unwise, unnecessary, and inadequate. We already had upon our statute books a law authorizing the issuance of bonds, and the strong proof of it is that within the last few days bonds have been issued under the act of 1875.

While one branch of Congress was passing a free coinage bill and the other branch of Congress was seeking to pass a tariff bill, the gold reserve fell below $50,000,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury was forced to make a sale of bonds in order to keep the gold reserve at $100,000,000. The success of the Government sale of 4 per cent bonds at a high premium, which was equivalent to less than 3¼ per cent bonds, has been hailed throughout the country with gratification. The amount asked for was five times oversubscribed. Four thousand six hundred and forty bids, aggregating $568,000,000, were made when only $100,000,000 were desired. It is clear that the public credit of the United States is not excelled by any other nation of the world. The financial independence of our country has been conspicuously demonstrated, and it is believed that not since the resumption of specie payments has anything happened so encouraging to business interests and so promotive of confidence as the success of that sale.

This vote of confidence in our country, this vindication of the patriotism and resources of our people, proves that the people of the United States have no fears that the bonds will be paid otherwise than they have always been paid—in the best money coined. There is but one unpleasant feeling in connection with this splendid transaction, and that is a feeling of deep regret that a nation with such sound credit, whose obligations command such a high premium, should have such unwise and vicious financial laws as to be forced, though her revenues are large and her Treasury surplus ample, to become a heavy borrower of gold to meet the obligations which proper legislation should have provided long ago.

Mr. COX. One word just in that connection. Have you before you a statement showing who made the subscriptions for the bonds?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I have not; but there were 4,640 bids, and I can say to my friend from Tennessee that not only did the bankers make bids, but many bids have come from private individuals all over the country, and thus we have the best evidence we have ever had in our country of the confidence that our people have in our Government.

I desire to say in this connection that the Democratic party is not responsible for the existing financial condition. Republicans in 1873 stopped the coinage of silver dollars. Republicans in 1890 passed the Sherman bill, which made silver a commodity and which required Treasury notes to be issued which were held to be redeemable in gold. Republican legislation put our Government in the banking business. Republican legislation required greenbacks and Treasury notes to be redeemed in gold as desired by the holder, and Republican legislation brought about the conditions which have required bonds to be issued to maintain the gold reserve in the Treasury. My friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] to-day spent nearly half of his hour in glorifying the Republican party—that same party which was in the majority in the Fifty-first Congress, but went out of power so signally in the Fifty-second Congress; the same party that gave us the McKinley tariff bill, but refused to give that McKinley tariff bill a vote of confidence at this session by restoring it, but went only part of the way in its restoration; that same party that gave us the Sherman law in 1890, but made haste to repeal it in 1893. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] glorifies his party now as he did in the Fifty-first Congress. His eloquent words, his well-rounded sentences, and his prediction that the Republican party would be in the majority at the next election are not new to the older members of this House, for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVEVOR] indulged in these same predictions in the Fifty-first Congress.

Mr. BOATNER. That is a habit of his, is it not?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I think it is a habit of the gentleman from Ohio. He is an optimist, particularly in politics, and especially when it comes to the election of a Republican President. He spoke in "linked sweetness long drawn out" about the Republican prospects in the Fifty-first Congress, yet when the people spoke at the following November election they crushed his hopes and the hopes of many other Republicans, and elected a House of Representatives with nearly a hundred majority of Democrats. If Republican Representatives will continue to make such a record as they have made in the last two months in this Congress, there is good ground for hope that when the next election occurs there will be a repetition of what happened after the record of the Fifty-first Congress had been considered by the country, and the people will again show their wisdom by sending a majority of Democrats to the next Congress. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I have limited time and can not yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. If Representatives will increase my time I will be glad to answer any question.

Mr. Chairman, I have referred to what the House of Representatives did, and now I desire to refer to what the Senate did in response to the message of the President of the United States. The Senate of the United States responded to the message of the President by passing a free-coinage bill as a substitute for the House bond bill, and the Senate substitute is now under consideration. I voted against the House bond bill and I am opposed now to concurring in the Senate substitute. This substitute for the House bill provides for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, that is, 16 ounces of silver equal to 1 ounce of gold, when to-day the commercial or market value is 32 to 1. It means that there shall be a change in the monetary system under which we have been living and transacting business for many years. It means that our mints are to be thrown open to the free and unlimited coinage of the silver bullion of the world, and when coined it is to be delivered to the owners of the bullion, and all the people of the United States, but not of other countries, are to be compelled to receive the silver dollars coined as legal tender in the payment of all debts.

I am in favor of the largest use of silver and the largest coinage of silver consistent with the preservation of the credit of our Government and the maintenance of the parity of the two metals, so that a dollar, whether of gold or silver or paper, will have the same debt-paying power and the same purchasing power; but no more silver should be coined than will float at par with gold.

I am opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver by the United States alone. There is not a country in the world now successfully maintaining alone the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver, and every country which has alone persisted in the effort to maintain the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold has come to a silver basis. Every free and unlimited coinage of silver country is on a silver basis, and there is no free and and unlimited coinage country in the world that uses both gold and silver concurrently and equally as money. There is not a free and unlimited coinage country in the world that has one-fourth as much money in circulation per capita as we have in the United States, and there is no free and unlimited coinage of silver country where the laboring man receives fair pay for his day's work.

I regret that the time allowed me will not permit me to discuss at length the propositions I have just presented. They speak for themselves and will not be denied. I desire now to come nearer home with my argument. Gold and silver in the United States have never circulated concurrently and equally under free-coinage laws, but have only circulated concurrently and equally under acts of Congress preserving the parity of the two metals and providing for their circulation. The first coinage act was passed in 1792. The colonies had but a short time before gained their independence, and our Republic had taken its place among the family of nations; but the President and his Secretary of State (Thomas Jefferson) and his Secretary of the Treasury (Alexander Hamilton) were confronted with serious monetary difficulties which occupied much of their time and required much consideration. After considerable deliberation and examination it was agreed that a bill should be passed fixing the ratio at 15 to 1. The coinage act of 1792 was accordingly passed. The theory now so earnestly proclaimed, that we can by mere fiat of law establish a ratio which will remain regardless of the real value of metals, was not even considered at that time, but it was agreed by Jefferson and Hamilton and their associates that—

If the double standard was to be attempted at all it should be predicated on a ratio to be fixed by the commercial or market value of the two metals.

It was soon discovered that gold was undervalued at the ratio of 15 to 1, and that gold had disappeared from circulation. In 1806 Mr. Jefferson stopped the coinage of silver dollars, and no more silver dollars were coined for twenty-nine years, or until the administration of General Jackson. In 1834 President Jackson, aided by Daniel Webster, Thomas Benton, John C. Calhoun, and others, succeeded in having a bill passed increasing the ratio from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1, thereby making 16 ounces of silver equal to 1 ounce of gold. This was done to bring gold again into circulation, and from that day to this gold has been the standard. It was, however, soon ascertained that under this ratio silver was undervalued, and in a short time there was no silver in circulation. Congress passed the act of 1853 to supply the people with small money. At that time all the half dollars, quarters, and dimes coined under the acts of 1792 and 1834 were of full weight and had a bullion value which exceeded their money value, and this caused them to disappear.

The act of 1853 was passed by a Democratic Congress and it recognized gold as the standard, and it provided for the coinage of small pieces at the rate of 384 standard grains of silver to the dollar instead of 412½, as had been done before. This subsidiary coin was made legal tender only to the amount of $5, and in 1879 it was made legal tender for $10. I pause at this point to ask an important question, which I hope my free-coinage friends will consider carefully: If gold retired from circulation under the act of 1792, which fixed the ratio at 15 to 1, because the bullion in the gold dollar was worth 4 cents more than the bullion in the silver dollar, and if silver retired from circulation under the act of 1834, which changed the ratio to 16 to 1, because the bullion in the silver dollar was worth 3 cents more than the bullion in the gold dollar, how is it possible now to maintain gold and silver in concurrent circulation under a system of free coinage at the ratio of 16 to 1 when the bullion in the gold dollar is worth about 50 cents more than the bullion in the silver dollar?

In 1862, in order to carry on the war, Treasury notes were made a legal tender and paper money was used for many years afterwards, the Congress of the United States having suspended specie payment in 1866, which was not resumed until 1879. It was in 1873 that the act was passed by the Republican Congress which dropped the coinage of the silver dollar. In 1878 the Bland-Allison Act was passed, which made silver dollars a legal tender and providing for the coinage of not less than $2,000,000 worth of silver bullion nor more than $4,000,000 worth per month. Under this act over 400,000,000 of silver dollars were coined. From the passage of the Bland-Allison Act in 1878 gold and silver have been circulating in our country upon an equality, the act of July 14, 1890, also requiring that the two metals shall be maintained on a parity with each other.

I will not dwell longer on this point, for I think it is clear that gold and silver have not in our country circulated together concurrently and equally under free-coinage laws, but have done so under laws enacted by Congress limiting the coinage of silver and requiring the parity of the two metals to be preserved.

The Senate free-coinage substitute seeks to change our monetary system, and the onus is on its supporters to show plainly and conclusively not only that the free, unlimited, and independent coinage of silver would not result in injury, but also that it would be beneficial. The United States under the existing conditions has never alone tried this system which has been disastrous to every other nation that has tried it alone and has brought each of them to silver monometallism. Appeals to passions and prejudices, attempts to array one class of citizens against another, and bold assertions unsupported by facts and reason will not be sufficient in discussing this vital and important question. People want facts; they desire truths, and will not be satisfied with fallacies, assertions, and exaggerated statements. I am neither a gold monometallist nor a silver monometallist. I am in favor of the coinage and use of both gold and silver, but, as I have said before, I wish the parity of the two metals to be maintained all the time, and no more silver should be coined than can be floated at par with gold.

Mr. CLARDY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Yes, sir.

Mr. CLARDY. What law now keeps gold and silver at a parity?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. The act of 1890, which declares that it is "the established policy of the United States to maintain the metals on a parity with each other upon the present ratio or such ratio as may be provided by law." I will say further to my friend from Kentucky that the purchasing clause of the act of 1890, commonly known as the Sherman Act, was repealed in 1893, but the clause to which I refer, which is in the second section of the act, was not repealed.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will ask the gentleman if he did not vote against the Sherman law?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I voted against the Sherman act in 1890, and I earnestly opposed the purchase of four and a half millions ounces of silver per month as provided in that act to be stored in the Treasury as a commodity, and Treasury notes issued on it which were held to be redeemable in gold. I voted, as did the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], to repeal the purchasing clause of the Sherman law in 1893. The clause of the bill providing for the maintenance of gold and silver on a parity with each other, as the gentleman well knows, was not repealed, and there were other clauses of that bill that were not repealed. That clause, for instance, which provided for the redemption of the Treasury notes which had been issued under the Sherman act was not repealed, because such action would have been repudiation of over $100,000,000 of Treasury notes which were in circulation.

Mr. BOATNER. If it will not interrupt the gentleman, I would like to ask him a question.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I can not yield unless my time is extended.

Mr. BOATNER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Kentucky be extended for ten minutes.

Mr. KEM. Since there are members on this floor who are seeking a little time to speak and can not get it, I must object to any gentleman's time being extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, a part of my time has already been occupied by gentlemen who have interrupted me, and I hope I shall not have that deducted from the time allowed.

I was about to say when interrupted that gentlemen who advocate the free coinage of silver by the United States alone are not bimetallists. Bimetallism means "the concurrent use of gold and silver as a circulating medium of exchange at a fixed relative value." The existing law in our country fixes the ratio at 16 to 1. The commercial ratio to-day is 32 to 1. If we had free coinage of silver, with our mints open to the coinage of the silver bullion of the world, it would probably go to 35 to 1, so that there would be no fixed relative value, and the inevitable effect would be silver monometallism and not bimetallism. We have at present in the United States, in round figures, about sixteen hundred millions of all kinds of money in circulation, about one-third gold, one-third silver, and one-third paper. We therefore have about as many silver dollars in circulation as gold dollars, but each is equal in debt-paying and purchasing power. This never happened until after the coinage laws of 1878 were enacted. Assuming, therefore, that the concurrent circulation of gold and silver on terms of equality and parity is the real object of all good citizens, what more could free-coinage men ask than has already happened? We have coined fifty times as much silver in the last seventeen years as we coined in the previous eighty-one years, and we now have about one-third gold, one-third silver, and one-third paper, all circulating upon a parity. This showing conclusively refutes the charge of the free-coinage-of-silver men that the object of sound-money men is to establish gold monometallism.

In these important times there should be confidence as well as currency. Nothing should be done to disturb values, impair confidence, or injure the business interests of the country. In the last quarter of a century monetary conditions have changed all over the world. In the year 1870 the production of silver in the whole world was $55,000,000. Last year the production of silver in the world was $216,000,000. In 1870 the silver production of the United States was $16,000,000. Last year it was nearly $70,000,000. Thus the annual production of silver has quadrupled since 1870, not only in the United States, but in the world, while the production of gold in the world has not even doubled, the whole gold production of the world being in 1870 $130,000,000 and in 1895 $200,000,000. The monetary situation has been further changed because all the nations of Europe have closed their mints to the coinage of silver. Germany began in 1871, and in 1873 completed the work of closing her mints to the coinage of silver. The other great nations of Europe followed her in rapid succession, India being the last to close her mints to the coinage of silver in 1893.

If we propose to inaugurate great financial reforms in our country we must admit the truth of history, and we must submit to monetary laws that are older than our country. The United States can not alone by the passage of a free and unlimited coinage law jump to the rehabilitation of silver and the reestablishment of the parity of gold and silver. It required fourteen countries, including the United States, to maintain the free coinage of silver prior to 1873. Even the Latin Union countries of France, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, and Greece were compelled to suspend the coinage of silver in 1876 when no longer supported by the other nations of Europe. It has been repeatedly said that France maintained the double standard from 1816 to 1873, and that we should follow her example. From 1816 to 1873 France, instead of maintaining silver in circulation by giving it a peculiar value, merely coined silver like other nations of Europe and at the same ratio. In 1876 France stopped the free coinage of silver, and has never restored it since that time. She is now using as we do, both gold and silver in about equal quantities, and maintaining gold and silver on a parity upon the old ratio. Legislation can not annul or change the inexorable law that "the relation of supply and demand is the regulator of value." The real cause of the reduction in the price of silver is that it only costs about half as much to produce it now as it did twenty-five years ago. Four times as much silver is being produced now as was produced a quarter of a century ago, and all the nations of the world have closed their mints to the free coinage of silver except Mexico, Bolivia, and Peru, and a few other small nations which coin but little. If we examine the map of the world we will see that the countries which recognize both gold and silver in their monetary systems have the largest volume of money and the largest per capita, andthose which have silver alone as money have the smallest volume of money and the smallest per capita. The United States, France, Spain, and Switzerland lead in the list of nations, and have from $16 per capita to $37 per capita, while Mexico, with its singe silver standard, has but $4 per capita, and Peru less than $3 per capita, and China not as much as $1 per capita.

Mr. Chairman, during this debate advocates of free and unlimited coinage of silver have said that the free and unlimited coinage of silver will put much money in the pockets of the people. I deny that statement. Free and unlimited coinage of silver will not fill the pockets of the people with money. Neither the Secretary of the Treasury nor the silver mine owner will give freely to all who will take. Those who will be most benefited by the free coinage of silver are the silver mine owners who reside in the States of Colorado, Montana, Idaho, and Nevada, and in the Territories of Arizona, Utah, and New Mexico, with a population of about one million and a half. Would it be wise or just for 68,000,000 of people to have a changed monetary system which according to the experience of Mexico would give us a 50-cent dollar in order that the silver mine owner may prosper and grow rich at the public expense.

It has also been asserted in this House that the prosperity of a country is regulated by the amount of money in circulation, and if the amount in circulation is doubled it is claimed that prices would be doubled also. I am in favor of plenty of money in our country to meet the demands of business and trade and prosperity, but a superabundance of money does not make prosperity or increase the prices of commodities. In France the per capita circulation is at present $37; in England the circulation is $19 per capita; yet there is no appreciable difference in the prices of commodities in these adjoining countries, and labor commands higher prices in England than in France. In the United States the per capita circulation is $22. In France the per capita circulation is $15 more than in the United States, yet the prices of farm products in France are not as high as they are in our country, and labor does not command such wages. I have here a statement on this subject which I desire to present, because it is so applicable. It was compiled by Hon. K. NELSON from the Annual Statistical Abstract of 1894, and from the October Statistical Abstract of 1895, and shows the total money circulation, the gold circulation, the silver circulation, and the per capita circulation, and the New York export price of wheat and cotton for each year from 1872 to November, 1875. It is as follows:

Year.	Total money.*	Per capita.	Total gold.†	Total silver.‡	Wheat, per bushel.§	Cotton, per pound.
						Cents.
July 1, 1872...	$738,309,549	$18.19	$25,000,000	----------	$1.47	19.3
July 1, 1873...	751,881,809	18.04	25,000,000	----------	1.31	18.8
July 1, 1874...	776,083,031	18.13	25,000,000	----------	1.43	15.4
July 1, 1875...	754,101,947	17.16	25,000,000	----------	1.12	15
July 1, 1876...	727,609,388	16.12	25,000,000	$21,055,128	1.24	12.9
July 1, 1877...	722,314,883	15.58	25,000,000	37,884,853	1.17	11.8
July 1, 1878...	729,132,634	15.32	25,000,000	55,134,653	1.34	11.1
July 1, 1879...	818,631,793	16.75	125,785,182	69,797,503	1.07	9.9
July 1, 1880...	973,382,228	19.41	233,659,679	74,411,914	1.25	11.5
July 1, 1881...	1,114,238,119	21.71	321,072,397	115,292,505	1.11	11.4
July 1, 1882...	1,174,290,419	22.37	363,280,345	133,289,859	1.19	11.4

* Statistical Abstract, 1894, page 30. Statistical Abstract, October, 1895, page 489.

† Statistical Abstract, 1894, page 27. Statistical Abstract, October, 1895, page 489.

‡ Statistical Abstract, 1894, pages 28 and 29. Statistical Abstract, October, 1895, page 489.

§ Statistical Abstract, 1894, page 417. Statistical Abstract, October, 1895, pages 481 and 482.

Year.	Total money.*	Per capita.	Total gold.†	Total silver.‡	Wheat, per bushel.§	Cotton, per pound.
						Cents.
July 1, 1883...	$1,230,305,696	$22.91	$404,460,863	$154,746,435	$1.13	10.8
July 1, 1884...	1,243,925,969	22.65	411,770,843	182,778,019	1.07	10.5
July 1, 1885...	1,292,568,615	23.02	468,398,141	184,320,836	.86	10.6
July 1, 1886...	1,252,700,525	21.82	434,263,950	186,958,828	.87	9.9
July 1, 1887...	1,317,539,143	22.45	467,766,118	246,250,603	.89	9.5
July 1, 1888...	1,372,170,870	22.88	512,208,683	306,649,367	.85	9.8
July 1, 1889...	1,380,361,649	22.52	493,611,797	363,090,028	.90	9.9
July 1, 1890...	1,429,251,270	22.82	505,089,782	407,867,574	.83	10.1
July 1, 1891...	1,497,440,707	23.41	527,382,232	474,509,782	.93	10
July 1, 1892...	1,601,347,187	24.44	549,662,443	548,516,702	1.03	8.7
July 1, 1893...	1,596,701,245	23.87	501,177,852	596,413,614	.80	8.5
July 1, 1894...	1,660,808,708	24.33	562,316,579	590,650,772	.67	7.8
July 1, 1895...	1,598,859,316	22.72	525,599,252	570,169,756	.692	8.6

*Statistical Abstract, 1894, page 30. Statistical Abstract, October, 1895, page 489.

†Statistical Abstract, 1894, page 27. Statistical Abstract, October, 1895, page 489.

‡Statistical Abstract, 1894, pages 28 and 29. Statistical Abstract, October, 1895, page 489.

§Statistical Abstract, 1894, page 417. Statistical Abstract, October, 1895. pages 481 and 482.

This table shows that during the period from 1872 to 1878 when silver dollars were not coined, when there was scarcely any gold and silver in circulation, and when the per capita circulation never exceeded $18 and was down as low as $16, the prices of wheat and cotton were higher than they have ever been since. It shows also that as our circulation has increased and as our gold and silver money has increased prices have in the main been gradually dropping lower and lower, and that they were never so low as in the year 1894, when our aggregate gold and silver circulation was the highest and when our per capita circulation was near the greatest amount it has ever attained. The table shows conclusively that prices have not been lowered through a want of currency, or through a want of either gold or silver, and that the prices of wheat and cotton during the five years that silver dollars ceased to be coined, from 1873 to 1878, were higher than during any five years since, and that the prices of cotton and wheat were never so low during any five-year period as during the five years succeeding the silver purchasing law of 1890. Fall of prices is mainly due to hard times, overproduction, inventions, competition, and reduced cost of transportation.

It has also been asserted that money is scarce in the United States. We have a larger volume of money in circulation in our country than any other nation on earth, amounting, according to the last report of the Secretary of the Treasury, in round figures to $1,600,000,000. France stands next to the United States, with $1,400,600,000; Germany has $900,000,000, and Great Britain $800,000,000. The Director of the Mint in his last report shows that our per capita is nearly three times as great as the average per capita of civilized nations. Our facilities are also greatly increased by our thousands of banks and a greater mileage of railroads and telegraphs than any other country of the world.

It has been repeatedly asserted during this debate that the passage of the Senate substitute authorizing the free and unlimited coinage of silver would put silver on a parity with gold. The object lesson in Mexico answers this assertion fully. Since the enactment of a law authorizing the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver in Mexico gold has disappeared from that country, and they now have silver monometallism, and the Mexican silver dollar, although it contains 6 grains more of silver than the American dollar, is only worth 53 cents. But, Mr. Chairman, let us see what has happened in the United States. In 1878 a law was passed providing for the coinage of not less than $2,000,000 worth of silver nor more than $4,000,000 worth of silver per month, and that law was in force until the Sherman law repealed it in 1890, yet silver declined in value. In 1890 the Sherman silver law was passed, which provided for the purchase by the Secretary of the Treasury of 4,500,000 ounces of silver bullion monthly, or 54,000,000 ounces of silver bullion per annum, for which Treasury notes were issued, being about the entire product of silver of our country, yet silver continued to go down, and in 1893 the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act was repealed, but this did not prevent silver from going to the low price of 50 to 51 cents on the dollar. Legislation has not helped the price of silver. The causes that depreciate it are not subject to legislation. If our mints were thrown open to the free and unlimited coinage of the silver of the world, instead of silver going to a parity with gold, silver dollars would be worth the bullion price of silver, our silver dollars would be worth about 50 or 51 cents to the dollar, and we would soon have in this country, as they have in Mexico, silver monometallism.

The time has come, in my opinion, when there should be no cowardice on the money question. If a man is for sound money, let him stand up for it with courage, advocate it, and vote for it. If he is for the free and unlimited coinage of silver, he should also be candid and courageous. Some of my friends take that position, and I am not here to criticise them; but I believe that the United States alone can not maintain the free coinage of silver, and if it should undertake to do so it would bring disaster, hard times, and such a disturbance of values in this country as has never been known before.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Does the gentleman from Kentucky think that the nations of the world acting together can maintain the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio here proposed?

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I am in favor of an international agreement. At the Brussels Monetary Conference, where I had the honor to serve as a delegate, I advocated an international agreement. Our last national Democratic platform declared in favor of securing the parity of gold and silver through international agreement, and the act of Congress approved November 1, 1893, repealing the purchasing clause of the Sherman law, declared in favor of securing the equality of gold and silver by international agreement or by safeguards of legislation. The German Reichstag and the French Chamber of Deputies have both declared in favor of issuing invitations to a monetary conference looking to an international agreement for the rehabilitation of silver at a common ratio, and in England the House of Commons concurred in the expression of the Governments of France and Germany. Our Congress, at the close of the last session, authorized the appointment of delegates to an international monetary conference, and I am heartily in favor of this movement which looks to action, not by one nation, but by many of the great nations of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. I should like to have a little more time.

Mr. HEPBURN. I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Kentucky.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], who has been recognized, yields ten minutes of his time to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. McCREARY of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I have not time to present as fully as I desire my objections to the Senate substitute, but I will take time to present some of the effects of the free and unlimited coinage of silver in the United States. Its financial effect would be to drive out of circulation the gold in our country, which now amounts to about $600,000,000. According to the Gresham law and to the experience of all countries in the past, depreciated money always drives good money out of circulation. Free coinage of silver would have the same effect in the United States that it had in Mexico and Peru, where gold ceased to circulate after free coinage was authorized.

The foreign commerce of our country amounts to hundreds of millions of dollars per annum. Last year about $700,000,000 worth of products went from the farms of this country. Our commerce has to be carried on with money that is sound and international and as good as gold, and our whole foreign commerce amounted last year to over $1,400,000,000. The effect of the free and unlimited coinage of silver on our great commercial interests, especially if our gold coin ceased to circulate, would be paralyzing if not ruinous.

There is another view to which I call the earnest attention of the members of this House. On the 23d of January, less than one month ago, 16 United States Senators who are the advocates of the free and unlimited and independent coinage of silver, and who represent silver-producing States, signed a declaration which has been widely published, in which they said:

> We are in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 by the independent action of the United States, and we are in favor of a tariff which shall be sufficient to equalize the cost of production in the United States and in European and Asiatic countries, and that the protection incident to such tariff shall be equally distributed in every section of the United States, and between the various products and industries of each State.

This shows that free coinage of silver and protection are moving hand in hand. Free silver coinage is an obstruction to international commerce. The tariff is also an obstruction to international commerce. Free coinage of silver means protection to the mine owners of the West, and the tariff means protection to the manufacturers of the East.

It is claimed that the interests of debtors demand the free and unlimited coinage of silver. Who are the largest debtors in our country? The United States owes a little over $900,000,000; cities, counties, municipalities, owe about $1,100,000,000; building and loan associations, $450,000,000; savings banks owe their depositors over $1,700,000,000, and other banks owe their depositors about $3,000,000,000; and it is asserted that the bonded debt of the railroads of the United States amounts to $6,000,000,000. We thus see who the principal beneficiaries would be if free coinage of silver was authorized. Certainly no just and patriotic man would be willing to allow these debtors to cancel their debts by the payment of one-half of the amount they owe. They originally received sound money worth 100 cents to the dollar. They should not be allowed to pay in depreciated money, but should be compelled to pay as they borrowed—in sound, honest dollars. Those who have deposited their money in savings banks and building associations, and those who have insured their property or their lives, have been paying good money worth 100 cents to the dollar. I am opposed to any law that will rob these people or deprive them of one-half of the amount honestly due them. The national Democratic platform of 1892 declares—

The farmers and laborers are the first and most defenseless victims of an unstable and fluctuating currency.

The truth of this statement is manifest. No person would be injured more by the free coinage of silver than farmers and laborers.

Free-coinage men are clamoring for a free-coinage President and a free-coinage Congress. The evils and hardships which would follow are difficult to state. As soon as it was known that a free-coinage President and a free-coinage Congress had been elected every holder of a Government bond or security would present it for payment, if due, or, if not due, put it on the market for sale. Every holder of a note or other obligation against a debtor would call on the debtor for immediate payment, and if he failed to pay suit would be instituted, because free coinage of silver would mean that the silver dollar would come to its bullion value in our country, as it has in every other country, and the holders of Government bonds and the holders of individual notes or promises to pay would desire to collect the amount due before the new Congress could pass the free-coinage law. The credit of our Government would be greatly impaired, if not destroyed, and no individual could borrow money or get an extension unless he promised to pay in gold, and thus free coinage would bring gold contracts, values would be so much disturbed, business so interrupted, capital so alarmed, and enterprise so crushed that farmers, wage earners, and business men would be the principal victims, and their injuries can not be estimated.

Mr. Chairman, I am admonished that my time is about exhausted, and I desire to say before I close we have to-day in the United States more money than any other country in the world. We have coined more silver dollars in the last seventeen years than have been coined by all the other nations together. In the last twenty years, as shown by the report of the Superintendent of the Census and the Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, the value of the property in the United States has increased from $30,000,000,000 to $65,000,000,000, and the wealth of the United States is greater, according to the reports of Mulhall and François, than any country of the world, England standing next and France third. This grand and glorious record should be sufficient, and we should not now attempt a monetary experiment which many of the best financiers and truest patriots think would bring disaster and hard times and great injury to the business interests of our country.

The United States as a gold-standard country stands in agriculture, commerce, manufactures, Christianity, education, art, science, literature, inventions—all that it takes to make a grand and glorious nation—with the great gold-standard countries of France, England, Germany, Russia, Belgium, Switzerland, Spain, Italy, Brazil, Chile, and others. Does any patriot and lover of progress, improvement, and advancement desire that our country shall leave the proud position of equal and leader among the greatest nations of the world and go backward and join the nonprogressive silver-standard countries of China, India, Bolivia, Peru, and the semicivilized nations of Africa?

The Senate has passed and sent to us a free coinage of silver substitute, which we are now considering. This should not alarm the country or cause any uneasiness among the advocates of sound money. There are 9 silver States with a population not equal to that of the State of New York, yet they have 18 Senators and only 12 Representatives, while New York has 2 Senators and 34 Representatives. In a few days the vote will be taken in the House, and then the representatives of the people will show by a great majority of more than 2 to 1 that the free coinage of silver by the United States alone has been laid to rest.

The last national Democratic convention held at Chicago voted down an amendment offered by Mr. Patterson, of Colorado, in favor of the free coinage of silver. No Democrat can consistently contend to-day that the convention of 1892 declared for free silver, for so far as that convention made a declaration on that subject it specifically refused to indorse free silver. A careful examination of all the national Democratic platforms adopted since the Democratic party was organized will show that not one of them declared in favor of the free coinage of silver, but that every national Democratic platform adopted since 1868 contains a declaration in favor of sound or honest money. Another national Democratic convention will be held in a few months and the declaration of that great convention will reverberate all over our country in favor of sound money and opposed to the free and unlimited and independent coinage of silver.

I see my time has expired. In conclusion, I quote from Samuel J. Tilden, one of the greatest statesmen our country has ever produced. He said:

Uncertainty is the prolific parent of mischief in all business. There can be no permanent prosperity or financial safety as long as there is serious agitation and uncertainty of money questions.

We have had depression in business, trade, and agriculture, but times are improving, prices are advancing, business is reviving, capital is seeking investments, and laborers' wages are increasing, and there is every reason to hope that our country will soon be blessed with the same industrial and agricultural progress which made it so prosperous a few years ago. Nothing should be done now to retard the onward movement. If we will be satisfied with existing conditions, and not seek to inaugurate great monetary changes, we will have a new era of prosperity and our country will move onward to the accomplishment of its grand and glorious destiny. [Applause.]

[Mr. HEPBURN addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. TOWNE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

[Mr. HALL addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Chairman, whatever may be the outcome of this debate and whatever seriousness may be manifested by the advocates and opponents of this measure, all of us are conscious of the fact that one of the great coordinate departments of this Government, the assent of which is necessary to enable this bill to become a law, is unalterably opposed to the free and unlimited coinage of silver. Our action, therefore, whatever it may be, being absolutely barren of any possible results, will amount to nothing.

This debate has now been in progress two days, and much earnestness has been manifested by many gentlemen. It is perfectly clear that gentlemen honestly differ as to the good or evil that would attend the enactment of this bill into a law. For my part I believe that the interests of the people of the United States would be better subserved by having both gold and silver as money metals, provided that the chief commercial nations of the earth would unite in adopting both metals as money metals or a sufficient number of the principal commercial nations agree to this, so that the two metals would not separate, and that they would both remain in circulation in common in the chief commercial nations of the earth.

Although my predilections are wholly in favor of silver, yet I am unable to bring myself to a positive, affirmative belief that the United States should attempt to maintain silver at a ratio of 16 to 1 without the concurrence of some of the other chief commercial nations. There is no question in my mind but what gold would disappear. The money of least value will always be used for circulation, and the money of greatest value will always hide itself. In all the chief commercial nations silver is to-day discounted. If we attempt to make it a money metal without limitations, it follows inevitably that in the course of trade we will gather in the silver and lose our gold. This means that we would be placed on a silver basis. Bimetallism would be only a theory with us. We would in fact become monometallists, with silver as our money.

The question for decision is, Would this condition be beneficial to the people of the United States? The first inquiry should be, How would silver monometallism affect the laboring people, the farmers, business and professional men of our country? Would the unlimited coinage of silver start any factory in the United States and thereby give employment to any men that are to-day idle? If I owned a silver mine and the Government of the United States, would assume the expense of coining my silver into money and give it back to me free of all costs, and if, in addition to that, the Government of the United States would enact that this silver should be money with full legal-tender qualities, it certainly would be a boon to me, but I fail to see how it would be of any benefit to my neighbor who has little or no property and who is out of employment. How would this benefit the grocer, the merchant, the tailor, and the doctor?

But we are told that the demonetization of silver destroyed half the redemption money of the country, making the value of all of the property of the country to be measured by one-half the amount of money it had been measured by before, and that the logical result of that contraction is to depreciate the value of all property one-half, unless for some local reason property in some particular place maintains its former value. If this be true, it is of great moment and great importance, and I would regard it as my highest duty to vote to remonetize silver at the earliest possible day. But I am unable to see that this is true. Whatever value has attached to property anywhere in this country, so far as the quantity of money fixes the value, was regulated by the volume of money in the country. This volume of money has not been contracted to any extent whatever by the redemption of silver. Not a single dollar of silver has been demonetized. There has been no reduction in the volume of silver money in this country by the demonetization of silver or otherwise. All that was done by demonetizing silver was that the Government refused to make any more silver money. Not that it destroyed what it had, but simply refused to make more silver dollars. There was no contraction in this. Every dollar of silver money of the United States has all the properties and all the values that it ever had. If, therefore, property of the country has depreciated in value, it can not be attributed to the destruction of silver currency of the country, because it has not been destroyed. It can not be attributed to the contraction of the silver currency, for it has not been contracted. It seems to me that the claims of the advocates of unlimited coinage of silver, in this respect, must go down before the facts.

But it must be conceded by the advocates of the gold standard that property has depreciated in value recently all over the country, except it be in some favored place where for local reasons its value has been maintained. The wages of labor have gone down all over our country; worse than this, the factories and workshops of our country have closed their doors, and have either wholly or partially failed to give employment to labor. Poverty and distress have followed among the laboring people in all the laboring centers of our country. Retail merchants in our towns and cities have been unable to sell their goods, and stagnation in business circles and bankruptcies and assignments for the benefit of creditors have followed where but a few years ago prosperity prevailed.

Our duty here is to relieve the country of this condition so far as legislative action will relieve it. The advocates of the unlimited coinage of silver attribute this condition in part to the scarcity of money in the country. On last Tuesday the Secretary of the Treasury opened the bids that he had received in response to his offer to sell $100,000,000 in Government bonds. It was found that nearly $600,000,000 had been bid for this proposed issue of one hundred millions of bonds, and of this large amount perhaps five hundred millions of this money was offered by the people of our own country, and this offer is in gold. This shows conclusively that there is at least $500,000,000 in the United States now seeking investment at a rate of from 3 to 3½ per cent interest. In the face of this fact it can not be truthfully said that the business paralysis of the country is due to the scarcity of money. It means that the holders of this money are afraid to invest it in business enterprises and that other active and keen business men of the country are afraid to take the risk of borrowing this money and investing it in business enterprises. Therefore it is that labor is idle to a great extent, and such portion of it as is employed is employed at reduced wages. The laboring people can not buy and pay for the goods of the merchant, and these bankruptcies and assignments have followed where business is being done on borrowed capital.

What, then, can we do as a Congress that will ameliorate or tend to ameliorate this condition? To answer this question let me take into account some existing facts. The revenues of our country are to-day, in round numbers, $50,000,000 less annually than the current expenses of the country. The total of our exports from this country is less than the total of our imports, so that the balance of trade is against us. We are therefore constantly shipping money out of this country to pay trade balances instead of having it shipped into this country for the same purpose. The bonds of our private corporations, railroads, and other interests, are largely held in Europe. The payment of interest on this indebtedness is a constant drainage from our country. Many millions of dollars are spent annually in Europe by tourists from the United States. United, these different sources make an enormous drainage of money from this country. Congress has no power over the tourists, nor has it power over the individual transactions of our citizens and our private corporations, but it has power to place tariff duties upon products of foreign countries which are sent to our shores. A proper tariff duty levied upon imports can at once reduce the volume of imports and increase the revenues derived therefrom. We can in that way turn the balance of trade in our favor instead of against us, as it is now. But of far greater value to us as a people than the revenues derived by these higher duties is the fact that the people of our own country will thereby be enabled to make and manufacture the things used in our own country, and by so doing furnish labor with employment and capital with investment.

This House of Representatives attempted to reach that end by the passage of the tariff bill in the early days of this session. I believe that every Republican in this House voted for that bill and every Democrat voted against it. The Republican party is not in control of the Senate. It can not force the passage of that bill. The Democrats and Populists of that body have thus far refused to consider the bill, notwithstanding the fact that we are hearing from all over our country of the business stagnation, of the idleness of labor, and of the appeal for relief.

I believe that the only safe way for the remonetization of silver is by international agreement; but some of the silver advocates say that we never can obtain an international agreement. Maybe they are right. It is possible that silver as a money metal, without limitations, is a thing of the past, but I am not inclined to accept that as a fact. I am ready to vote for a discriminating tariff. I am ready to vote for a high protective tariff bill, and at the same time confer upon the President of the United States the power to suspend a portion of the duties upon the imports from any country or countries which will unite with us in the remonetization of silver. It is claimed by some that if we should do this, that other countries would retaliate upon us. I think it quite likely they would, but this country of ours produces the foods for the people and we can make and manufacture for ourselves other things we need. We are better equipped for a war of this kind than any other nation upon the earth. We can not be outdone in a war of this kind. This nation is entitled to a voice and an influence in the affairs of the world. Our views upon what should constitute the money of the world are entitled to the consideration of every commercial state. I would use the markets of this country as a means of enforcing upon the nations of the earth the wishes, wants, and necessities of the people of our country as to what shall constitute the money of the world.

I am reluctantly driven to the conclusion that an attempt on the part of the United States to coin silver at the ratio of 16 to 1, without limitations, and without concert with any other nation or nations, would result disastrously to our people, and that we would have a depreciated currency. The ones who would first suffer from the depreciated currency are the people who are the least able to bear the burden. It would primarily fall upon the labor of the country, and secondarily upon the business men of the country, and, so believing, I can not support this bill.

Under consent given, Mr. STOKES submitted the following as an amendment to be proposed to the bill:

Add at end of bill the following:

"SEC. 5. Provided, Nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit the adjustment of contracts made subsequent to 1873 upon the basis of the purchasing power of the dollar at the date of the contract, as such purchasing power shall be certified by the Bureau of Statistics."

Mr. OGDEN submitted the following amendment:

Strike out all after line 7, section 3, and insert:

That a special fund, to consist of not less than $200,000,000 in coin, one-half of which shall be in gold and one-half in silver, to be known as the redemption fund, be, and is hereby, set aside from any gold coin and gold bullion and silver coin and silver bullion now in the Treasury, which special fund and excess thereof shall be used for the redemption of United States notes and Treasury notes of 1890, and for no other purpose.

SEC. 2. That on the passage of this act all gold coin and gold bullion, less an amount sufficient to pay all outstanding gold certificates, shall be transferred by the Secretary of the Treasury to the redemption fund.

SEC. 3. That on the passage of this act all standard silver dollars of 1890, together with an additional amount of standard silver dollars previously coined, and equal in amount to the estimated coinage value of the uncoined silver bullion now on hand and purchased under the provisions of the act of July 14, 1890, shall also be transferred to the redemption fund.

SEC. 4. That the United States notes and Treasury notes of 1890, when presented for redemption at the Treasury of the United States, or at the office of any assistant treasurer of the United States, shall be paid in the following manner and no other, to wit:

When the aggregate amount of gold coin and gold bullion on hand exceeds the sum of $100,000,000, and the amount of standard silver dollars on hand also exceeds $100,000,000, the holder of such United States notes or Treasury notes of 1890 shall, at his option, be paid in gold coin and gold bullion or standard silver dollars; but when the aggregate amount of gold coin and gold bullion is less that $100,000,000 the holders of said notes shall be paid in standard silver dollars, provided there be more than 100,000,000 standard silver dollars on hand.

Whenever the redemption fund shall be reduced below the sum of $200,000,000 payments of above-described notes shall be paid one-half in gold coin and gold bullion and one-half in standard silver dollars.

SEC. 5. That for the purpose of maintaining the redemption fund at a minimum of $200,000,000 in specie, the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to exchange the above-described notes which have been redeemed for gold coin and gold bullion and standard silver dollars already on hand in the Treasury, or which may be received into the Treasury hereafter from any source, and said notes, when so exchanged, may be reissued.

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to make suitable rules and regulations by which any holder of gold coin and gold bullion, or of standard silver dollars, may exchange the same at the Treasury or any subtreasury of the United States, free of cost, for an equal amount of United States notes or Treasury notes of 1890.

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to coin the silver bullion of 1890 into standard silver dollars at a rate of not less than $5,000,000 per month, and use the same as fast as coined to replace the standard silver dollars transferred to the redemption fund by the provisions of this act.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 2904) and had come to no resolution thereon.

PRINTING OF CERTAIN MAPS AND TABLES.

Mr. HARTMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent on behalf of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] who addressed the House this afternoon. He has some plates illustrative of charts he spoke from during the evening, and desires me to ask unanimous consent of the House that these plates may be given to the Public Printer for use in publishing his remarks, without any expense to the United States Government at all. They will go into the pages of the RECORD, and being already prepared, will cause no expense to the Government. He furnishes the plates at his own expense.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Montana?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the members present to this fact, at the request of the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole: That as yet there are not enough gentlemen who have given notice to him of a desire to speak to-night to occupy half of the time, and that on Monday the applications are so numerous as to far exceed the time that will be available for general debate. Therefore, unless time is occupied by some of these gentlemen this evening they will not be able to secure an opportunity of being heard. I make this statement so that gentlemen may act accordingly.

Mr. OGDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion, in view of his statement?

Mr. DINGLEY. Certainly.

Mr. OGDEN. In view of the fact that the time of so many gentlemen has been extended for a long time on both sides, would it not be wise to extend the time of the debate one more day?

Mr. DINGLEY. Oh, no; I think this thing has dragged long enough.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the House take a recess until 8 o'clock this evening, and at 10.30 o'clock to-night take another recess until 10.30 on Monday morning, exclusively for debate on this bill; the debate to take place in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted indefinitely to Mr. ANDERSON, on account of important business.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HALL. Mr. Speaker, while in Committee of the Whole to-day I was making an address, and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. TALBERT] and some other of my Democratic friends thought when I referred to the lower animals not changing their minds I had a personal reference to some of them. I desire to disclaim any such intention. [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. It was not necessary to disclaim it.

The SPEAKER. In accordance with unanimous consent, the House now stands in recess until 8 o'clock this evening for debate only on the pending bill.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 17 minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until 8 o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House was called to order by the Clerk, who read the following communication:

SPEAKER'S ROOM, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 8, 1896.

Hon. ALEXANDER MCDOWELL, Clerk:

I hereby appoint Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota as Speaker pro tempore for the evening session.

T. B. REED, Speaker.

Thereupon the House, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue, with Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota in the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, I will read a bill which I propose to offer as a substitute for the measure now pending before the House. It is as follows:

A bill for the coinage of silver dollars, restricted only by the law of supply and demand, and to maintain the parity of gold and silver without loss to the Government.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be lawful for the owner of any silver bullion of standard purity and fineness produced from any mines in the United States to deposit the same at any of the mints of the United States and receive therefor its market value on the day of deposit in standard silver dollars of the United States, and sufficient amount of said bullion shall be coined for this purpose as provided in the act of July 19, 1837. The Secretary of the Treasury shall fix each day the market price of silver bullion, basing it on the market price thereof on the next preceding day in the American market, and he shall not be required to receive or have on hand for coinage, under the provisions of this act, more than 25,000,000 ounces of silver bullion at any one time. The Secretary of the Treasury shall also prescribe and enforce such rules and regulations as shall prevent purchase or coinage of any silver bullion not the product of the mines of the United States.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury, under such regulations as he may prescribe, is authorized and required within one year to redeem or replace all the United States notes and Treasury notes of the denomination of $1 and $2 now outstanding with notes of not less denomination than $5, and the one and two dollar notes thus received in the Treasury shall not be reissued, but destroyed.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury, under the same regulation as is prescribed in section 2, is authorized and required within two years from the approval of this act to redeem and replace the one and two dollar silver certificates with silver certificates of not less denomination than $5, and the one and two dollar certificates so replaced shall not be reissued, but shall be destroyed.

SEC. 4. That in case the silver dollar at any time declines below its face value and ceases to circulate at par the Secretary of the Treasury is then authorized and directed to exchange gold for the said silver dollars on presentation until they shall again be current at their face or par value. And to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to do this, he is hereby authorized and directed to sell such portion of the gain or seigniorage arising from coinage under this act as may be required for this purpose.

SEC. 5. That in case said silver dollars at any time fall below par, the purchase and receipt of silver bullion at the mints and the coinage of silver dollars shall cease, but whenever the silver dollars received by the Secretary of the Treasury for gold shall have been by him again paid out and such dollars shall again be freely current at par, the coinage thereof shall be resumed as hereinbefore provided for.

SEC. 6. That no silver dollars coined under the provisions of this act shall be receivable for deposit under the third section of the act of February 28, 1878, and no certificates shall be issued therefor.

SEC. 7. That a sum sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

SEC. 8. That this act shall take effect thirty days from and after its approval.

Mr. Speaker, I did not arise with the design of making a speech upon this subject at the present time, but to offer the bill I have just read as a substitute for the one now pending before the House (the concurrent resolution of the Senate). I will say, however, that there is a general demand all over the country, regardless of party lines, for a wider use of silver, and also for a safe use of the metal.

This bill is framed to meet the law of supply and demand, to give to the people of the United States all the silver that they may be able to use, without putting gold at a premium or permitting silver to fall below par. It is designed to make a much larger use of coin and not to lessen the paper money now in existence. I view it, Mr. Speaker, as perfectly safe along all these lines.

I believe that if the free coinage of silver can be attained and the parity of the two metals maintained, it can be accomplished within the prescribed limits of this bill. It has not yet been shown by anyone that this nation could maintain the free coinage of silver while twelve or thirteen of the principal nations of the world are upon a gold basis or a limited coinage of silver.

It must he remembered if free coinage were adopted by this nation and gold should go to a premium, which it is believed would be the result, that the $500,000,000 of gold in the United States would at once cease to circulate or be used as money; consequently the volume of money would be lessened this amount. This would reduce our coin more than one-half, and it could only be replaced by coining and putting into use the vast sum of $500,000,000 in silver.

I am in favor of international bimetallism. The principal nations can, and the principal nations should, maintain the parity of the two metals; and this nation should not cease to work along this line until this object is attained. It was a most serious movement for the European nations to join in cutting the measure of values in two.

Mr. Speaker, I will state that I consider the demonetizing of silver by England and by European nations a crime. Gold and silver have been considered and used as money from the dawn of history until the present time. We find the impress of each inscribed on rocks and rolls, upon papyrus, parchment, and paper, upon everything that has been used to mark values or to make records. Abraham came up out of Egypt rich in cattle and in gold and silver. The golden sun and the silver moon have been used in all ages as symbols of the two metals. I should like to see gold and silver, like these two great orbs of day and night, go on and on, circling the world, ministering to the woes and wants and happiness of man forever.

Mr. YOAKUM. Mr. Speaker, the Democracy and silver have run together from the foundation of our Government, and there exists no reason for their divorcement, and in 1896 the great battle will be fought for the rehabilitation of this money. The agitation might as well be precipitated, so that the sentiments, hopes, and aspirations of the people may crystallize and be thoroughly reflected in the delegations and conventions that will be assembled this year. The patriotic and intelligent citizen knows that he must take an active part in all measures that affect our material prosperity; and we think that if the European control of our finances secures another lease of power in 1896 their domination will be permanent and silver money as an issue will be dead for at least a century.

At each recurring Presidential contest we are assured that international cooperation will be secured by a conservative declaration on silver by the American Government, and in the interest of the integrity of the Democracy we have been induced to accept a plank in our platform that is of dubious meaning. But we have now reached a juncture in our history when we must establish a financial system that is purely American, that does not require the sympathy, cooperation, or consultation with foreign powers; a system that recognizes gold and silver as the money of ultimate payment. I have no more confidence in an international arrangement than in an interplanetary arrangement. I would as soon expect the sun and moon to come down and confer with the earth about the quantity of heat the sun should emit in summer season as that the gold-standard countries should agree with the United States as to the relative value of gold and silver, and this in spite of the recent declarations of the German Reichstag and the British Parliament professing friendliness to an international financial conference.

To this end we must all toe the mark and answer roll call. No theory must stand in the way, and when we put it in our platforms, and preach it from the housetops, and place it on our foreheads, and write it on our wristlets, and the Democratic press and Democratic leaders speak but one language, we will form such a concentration of forces that we will strike monometallism with such cyclonic power that we will drive it before us "like leaves before an angry wind." And if the people of this generation are to see silver remonetized it will not be through the efforts of any fiatists, or irredeemable paper money element, or by the advocates of the railroad ownership, or the subtreasury friends, as the good sense of the people revolt against such high-handed and revolutionary measures. The rank and file of the American voters are restless and dissatisfied with the action of the Fifty-third Congress on the monetary issue, and while they are ready and willing to aid and assist any movement inside or outside of party lines that will restore silver, they are not willing to lend countenance to any of the above measures advocated by the Populists that they suspect might subvert any fundamental principle of the American Government or impair its efficiency.

While the masses are restless, they are patriotic; while they want to repair, they will not impair; and I challenge any man's devotion to our great country who advocates anarchy or revolution as a means of adjusting the present troubles that have gathered around us, for no man is entitled to respect who will question the ability of our people to compose our differences on finance through the ordinary instrumentalities of civil government. The incurring of the great bonded indebtedness is unfortunate for us, as a great many people will rush to the conclusion that the Democracy indorsed it; but nothing is so fallacious. The bonds are issued to maintain the gold reserve, a policy which grew up in the Treasury Department during the Administration of the Republican party.

The reserve does not exist by virtue of any statute; if so, we might have repealed it. It is only kept up as an earnest of our good faith toward our creditors who hold our interest and noninterest bearing obligations. The reserve, according to the custom, should be held at $100,000,000; not that it represents our fund to redeem our debts, for it exceeds that amount at $10 to $1. The gold reserve ought never to have been established; but as it is said to represent our debts, we silver men insist that these debts were contracted at a period when silver as well as gold was a standard of value, and hence the outstanding obligations ought to be paid off in gold and silver in proportion to the quantity of the money the Treasurer may have. If such a policy should prevail, one-half of our greenbacks presented for redemption would be redeemed in silver, and the gold reserve would not have to be replenished in a half century, and the good faith and integrity of the Government could not be questioned, because we would be paying our debts in lawful money and hence according to contract.

But we are told that this course would affect our credit abroad. In answer to this we ask, who is it that depletes our Treasury and renders a bond issue necessary? Is it the man abroad? No, sir; it is the speculator in Wall street that carries the greenback and Sherman note to the Treasury and demands the gold for them; and why? Because the paper is not good? No, sir. Is it because the gold is leaving the country and the country is growing panicky? No, sir. Then why? Because, sir, he wants the obligations of our Government to draw interest in bonds; whereas if they were paid in gold and silver he could not force a bond issue, as the quantity of money would be sufficient to pay off these notes and not reduce the reserve to low-water mark. Who is it that can complain of the greenbacks, the favorite money, as Lincoln once said of the "plain people"? As long as this money is used strictly for the purposes of money, that is, merely as a medium of exchange, as it is by the humble artisan, mechanic, and farmer of the South and West, there will be no panicky symptoms and no depletion of the reserve and consequent issue of bonds.

Who is it that conjures us to sustain our nation's credit? Sir, it is the very men who are depleting our Treasury by the presentment of greenbacks for redemption, and a change in our currency system is not as essential to our integrity as a mere change in the Treasury Department. How long shall we be mocked by such a makeshift and such a scheme of robbery? Rothschild, who stood behind Germany and dictated the extortion from France of $1,000,000,000 in gold, who has a mortgage on every European throne, has taken charge of our financial affairs and makes eight millions in the first deal. Out of nine subtreasuries, from the 14th of January to February 1, 1895, inclusive, there was drawn the sum of $37,972,140, and from the New York subtreasury alone $36,591,905, thus substantiating that our Treasury is being depleted and the financial panic precipitated by the money speculators.

Those who live under a mantle of wealth keep us excited by the war cry of "National honor, national credit," etc., which, it is said, can not be maintained except by securing the smiles of the foreign money lenders, who seem to be the guardians of our honor and credit. One thousand persons in Europe to-day hold obligations against our people aggregating $13,000,000,000, and hence hold over 70,000,000 people, with $60,000,000,000 of wealth, in custody. Why, sir, if war should shed its somber shadow over our Union and threaten its dismemberment, would we consult our foreign creditors; would we await the convocation of the chamber of commerce or the meeting of national bankers? No, sir; we would lean upon the true source of political power, the host of plain people, who ought to be heard in peace as well as relied on in war. Their interest is our interest, and we can not afford to disregard them.

The debt of the nation is thirty-nine billions, of which the foreign debt is eleven billions, and at 5 per cent interest exacts from us five hundred millions annually—more than all the gold in the Union. How will we pay it? We propose the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver, which will give us one hundred and thirty-two millions annually, thus stimulating our industries and giving employment to our idle forces and increasing our productions and maybe turn the balance of trade in our favor, enabling our trade to settle off our foreign-held debt, and thus contract our debts instead of our currency, and place wages and products of labor upon equality with securities wherever held.

For thirty years we have legislated in the interest of securities and creditors instead of debtors, and every plan proposed or enacted has sunk our people deeper into the quagmire of discontent, until we have reached the juncture where there must be framed a law for the home builder and wealth producer. This is our duty as the representatives of the people—to secure them comfort and protect them against the exacting demand of the gold speculator. Stop the creation of debt and all the world will say that America is the home of the purest, the truest, and the best people of earth.

If I were managing the Morgan-Belmont syndicate, I would bid for the one hundred million bonds offered for sale by Secretary Carlisle, and I would lay the law down to him, and force him to accept my bid, and I would not offer but one-half as much as the common herd, either. Yes, sir; I would talk very plain to the Secretary of this United States Government, and if he rejected my bids I would go down next day and extract every gold dollar out of the reserve with paper money and force another sale, or drive this helpless Government to a silver basis. This procedure is very simple, but it is feasible, and why Morgan & Co. do not do it is because of the charity and indulgence toward a helpless object, and how long they will continue their kindness is conjectural. The fact is, they intended to clean us up last year, but the President and Secretary Carlisle entered into a contract, by the fifth provision of which the syndicate was to help us hold up our financial system. Let me read it:

> Fifth. In consideration of the purchase of such coin, the parties of the second part, and their associates hereunder, assume and will bear all the expense and inevitable loss of bringing gold from Europe hereunder; and, as far as lies in their power, will exert all financial influence and will make all legitimate efforts to protect the Treasury of the United States against the withdrawals of gold pending the complete performance of this contract.
>
> In witness whereof the parties hereto have hereunto set their hands in five parts this 8th day of February, 1895.
>
> J. G. CARLISLE,
> Secretary of the Treasury.
> AUGUST BELMONT & CO.,
> On behalf of Messrs. N. M. Rothschild & Sons, London, and themselves.
> J. P. MORGAN & CO.,
> On behalf of Messrs. J. S. Morgan & Co., London, and themselves.
>
> Attest:
> W. E. CURTIS.
> FRANCIS LYNDE STETSON.

When this contract was complete, November, 1895, the reserve began to sink, until to-day it is only $45,000,000, and this would have been gone had it not been checked by an offer to sell $100,000,000 of bonds, double the amount before.

What a humiliating spectacle to a great and powerful people, to place ourselves in the grasp of a monster that will not spare us, and when we demand the recognition of silver, so as to aid gold in the payment of our obligations, and thus stop the depletion of the reserve and issue of bonds, we are told the honor and credit of our country demand that we shall be impoverished and robbed by the money grabbers and speculators, and that we must not interfere with the pleasure of these cormorants as a matter of honor.

The passage of the Senate substitute will do what? It will recognize silver as money, and thus increase the volume of the money with which to liquidate all our obligations. This itself would forever stop the sale of bonds and break the endless chain that is gradually crushing out the last vestige of love of country we are possessed of. The only hope of giving satisfaction to the people is to increase the volume of money and stop the issuance of bonds.

There is no way to avoid the issuance of bonds as long as we continue the payment of our debts exclusively in gold. The speculator has conceived the plan of forcing bond issues. We need the spirit of Daniel Manning, Secretary of the Treasury in the first Administration of Cleveland. We all remember the effort made by the bankers of New York when they threatened to throw this Government into a panic. He stood in their midst and talked like an inspired man, and he was inspired by a love for his country. He said:

GENTLEMEN: The Treasury is willing to furnish gold for any legitimate demand, but if you attempt to draw upon the Treasury gold after to-day as you are now doing, for hoarding or speculation, I shall adopt an effective remedy for the protection of the Government's reserve. We have a cash balance of over $150,000,000. Not one of you doubts for a moment the ability and purpose of the Government to maintain specie payment. But if you continue to withdraw gold I shall at once order that you be paid 10 per cent in silver coin the first day, the second day you will be paid 20 per cent in silver, and the third day 30 per cent, and so on until one-half is paid you in silver.

"But," exclaimed the astonished bankers, "this is in violation of the implied obligation that the Government will pay in gold."

"Make no mistake about that, gentlemen," replied Mr. Manning, "the law says 'coin,' and the Treasury will exercise its undoubted prerogative."

Since then we have surrendered to these fellows, and when they cry panic the bonds are issued to strengthen the public credit and inspire confidence in the ranks of the conscienceless speculators. A short notice, signed by Mr. Carlisle, that a percentage of the greenbacks would be paid in silver will settle the symptom of panics, and the greenbacks will circulate as money, the banker and speculator will then use them as a means of exchange of property as the humble mechanic and farmer and other classes do, instead of using them as a means of exhausting the Treasury of its gold money.

We have four remedies prescribed for the situation, and all concede the evil of the present system, which has been denominated by President Cleveland the endless chain. The vice of this chain is that every link in it is made of gold, whereas it ought to be alternatively silver. But we say we have four remedies.

First. The President proposes one great issue of bonds to absorb the paper money. He has no following of any moment on that theory.

Second. The Republicans advocate the issue of bonds at a lower rate of interest, and increase of tariff, and a payment of public debts in gold.

Third. The free-silver men concur in this bill passed by the Senate.

Fourth. The Populist element believe we ought to issue an irredeemable paper money and pay off debts in that money.

The Republican theory is that by a high protective tariff the balance of trade will be turned in our favor and thus stop the export of gold. The history on this question militates against their theory. In 1893, when we had three years of McKinley protection, which gave the highest rates in the history of the world, the gold reserve ran lower than at any period in fourteen years, and, in fact, for the first time, in that period it was thought necessary to issue bonds to protect the reserve, and the plates were prepared and the following official order was issued by a Republican Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1893.

SIR: You are hereby authorized and directed to prepare designs for the 8 per cent bonds provided in a Senate amendment to the sundry civil bill now pending. The denominations which should first receive attention are $100 and $1,000 of the coupon bonds and $100, $1,000, and $10,000 of the registered bonds.

This authority is given in advance of the enactment, in view of pressing contingencies, and you are directed to hasten the preparation of the designs and plates in every possible manner.

I inclose a memorandum for your guidance in preparing the script for the body of the bond.

Respectfully, yours, CHARLES FOSTER, Secretary.

To the CHIEF OF THE BUREAU OF ENGRAVING AND PRINTING.

This ought to satisfy any reasonable mind that the high tariff will not protect the gold reserve and prevent the issue of bonds. Just at this time the Democracy came into power and fell heir to the condition that was forcing the Republicans to a bond issue, and as no change in the methods of payment was made, the result was the Democracy had to shoulder the responsibility of the act.

Then we turn to the Populist party and we see they demand a paper money without basis on any coin or thing of value; that is, an irredeemable paper money—an unknown currency to America.

While the people are restless and dissatisfied, and are seeking the reinstatement of a system of pure bimetallism, which is the recognition of the metals at the mints, they are not oblivious to the fact that the Populist party is uncompromisingly in favor of the issue of scientific or inconvertible paper money, which, if a true theory of finance, supersedes the necessity of further coinage of either gold or silver. The truth is, the advocacy of an irredeemable paper issue and a metallic money of either gold or silver is the merest nonsense in the eyes of enlightened people or the veriest tyro in financial learning.

The only reason anyone can give for advocating the coinage of gold and silver is because of the inadequacy in the amount of gold supply to furnish a medium of exchange for the business of the people. If there was a sufficiency of gold I would not favor the further coinage of silver, for it is the volume of money we are working for. If the Populist idea of money is correct, that the paper with the stamp of the Government on it will make it good money, they ought not to urge the further coinage of either metal, because we could under that theory issue as much paper money as the business of the country demands.

Now, if you believe the Populist paper money theory, we would have enough paper money to furnish the business world a medium of exchange, and no reason could be further urged in favor of gold and silver. We might believe in gold and silver and paper based on the two metals, but there would be a glaring inconsistency in one advocating gold and silver and paper money, if the latter is good without redeemability. No man can conscientiously believe in the intrinsic value theory and also in the fiat theory, and the Populist when he becomes thoroughly honest will scout and scorn your gold and silver as money, because they are based on the intrinsic value idea. If the Populist fiat doctrine be good, intrinsic value in money is useless; but if the intrinsic value theory be correct, fiat money is worthless, if not foolish. How a man can advocate either theory is plausible, but how he can advocate both doctrines and be consistent I can not conceive.

Then, again, it is very properly suggested that such a character of money is not authorized by our Constitution. It only authorizes us to coin money and regulate its value. The Populists claim we have the power to make money and create its value. They claim, however, that the Supreme Court has upheld an irredeemable paper money. If the Supreme Court of the United States has ever decided that inconvertible paper is money, and that an act of Congress making it a legal tender is constitutional, then we will admit that the Populist idea is correct, and we stop to assert that such a paper was never issued by an act of Congress and hence was never before the Supreme Court for determination. The only decision ever rendered by them was one in which they sustained the constitutionality of the legal-tender acts, which provided for the issuance of the greenbacks, which were a promise to pay by the Government and which were paid in coin.

Judge Strong, in rendering that decision, in volume 20, page 313, of United States Reports, says:

The legal-tender acts do not attempt to make paper a standard of value. We do not rest their validity upon the assertion that their emission is coinage, or any regulation of the value of money; nor do we assert that Congress may make anything which has no value money. What we do assert is that Congress has power to enact that the Government promises to pay money shall be for the time being equivalent in value to the representative of value, determined by the coinage acts, or to multiples thereof.

This decision, which is very lengthy, was carefully drawn, so that the court would not lead any student into the false conception that Congress could, under any provision of the Constitution, impart value to an otherwise valueless material by simply impressing thereon the stamp of the Government. But for fear that some one should draw improper conclusions from the language used, that Congress could make money out of paper or anything else without regard to its intrinsic value, Justice Strong said:

It is, then, a mistake to regard the legal-tender act as either fixing a standard of value or regulating money values, or making that money which has no intrinsic value.

Mr. TALBERT. Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding my views on this question have several times already been expressed and sent out to the people, I feel constrained on this occasion, in their behalf, to again place myself on record, both by my voice and by my vote in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1; therefore I shall heartily support and vote for the substitute for the House bill as sent from the Senate, which means the opening of the mints of the United States to silver and relief to the people; and there has been so much said that my mind, in thinking of this much discussed subject, reverts to the old negro preacher who was addressing his flock with great earnestness on the subject of "Miracles," as follows: "My beloved friends and brethren, de greatest of all miracles was 'bout de loaves and de fishes. Dey was 5,000 loaves and 2,000 fishes, and de twelve 'postles had to eat 'em all. Now de miracle is dat dey didn't bust." [Laughter.] Now the people, Mr. Speaker, have been stuffed on this subject for the last three weeks; or, I might say, for the last few years with silver speeches, and the great wonder is that they haven't "busted." [Laughter.]

The subject under discussion has taken a very wide range in this House, embracing almost every other subject in the catalogue of political economy.

Mr. Speaker, even secession has been lugged into the debate by certain parties on this floor in order to direct attention from the real issue. But however much gentlemen may desire to dodge the issue it can not be done, for at last the whole matter reduces itself to this simple, single question, Will this House rehabilitate silver, the people's money, which was stricken down and demonetized by the dastardly hand of the gold monometallist assassin in 1873, the greatest crime of the nineteenth century against the people, or will its members shrink back like cowards and fail to do their duty to those whom they claim to represent here?

This, Mr. Speaker, is the only real question now before this House; and while gentlemen have ranged all over the earth for argument against it, they have used mere sophistry and flapdoodle. They have tried to mystify and muddle the real issue, but it is only at last a simple question of common sense, and it is to be seen in the settlement of this question whether or not this House will show itself brave and courageous enough, as they have done at the other end of the Capitol, to give back to the American people the money of the country, which was substantially taken away in 1873. Ye blatant advocates of a single gold standard may look at it as you will and mystify it as you please by your long and labored arguments, but the great question after all is simply one of money. All other issues to-day shrink into utter insignificance when compared to the great overshadowing influence of the financial question of this grand nation of ours. To-day it seems that the great money power, allied to corporate wealth, has a hold on the throats of the people, overruling and overriding their rights, controlling political conventions, manipulating party platforms, dictating State and national legislation, and even invading the courts of the land, corrupting both judge and jury of State and nation.

How plainly must the conviction be riveted upon the minds of all intelligent, thinking people that a despotism of corporate wealth has subverted our free democratic institutions. How plain it must seem to the casual observer that the premonitory symptoms of despotism are upon us and that we are fast hastening to a period when we will have a union of the purse and the sword, a combination more dangerous than that of church and state. Then, to put it even more plainly, the issue is, Shall the citizen or the dollar rule this country? Shall manhood or money make our laws? Shall we have a free Government or shall we be ruled by a moneyed aristocracy? On which side will you align yourselves? There is no middle ground. It is not and should not be made a partisan question, notwithstanding some members have brought into the discussion their partisanship. They should leave out all their bitterness and prejudices, quit calling each other names—for there is no argument in calling names—and look alone as one man to the present distressed condition of the country, with the laudable and patriotic ambition and desire to give relief thereto both in deed and in name. It makes no difference whether you are a Democrat, a Republican, a Populist, or what not; this is your country and its people are your people, and what benefits it and them ought to be your pleasure and desire to do.

Then comes the question more forcibly, Are you willing to do right by the great masses of the people of the United States (the laboring people), for I take it that we are all laborers in one sense or another; are you willing to align yourselves with the corporations, the money power, and the monopolists of the country? I dislike very much indeed to think so. Then come to the relief of those toiling masses who are to-day, while I stand here and plead for them, in their far-off homes looking with anxious hearts to you to come to their rescue and take away from their throats the grasping hand of their destroyer, and let them be able to pay their debts and to place bread on their tables and clothes on their backs. This much, gentlemen, they ask you to do, and this much you can do, at least to a very great extent, by giving them back their money by the free and unlimited coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1.

Mr. COLSON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TALBERT. Certainly.

Mr. COLSON. I would ask the gentleman from South Carolina, how near, in his opinion, would the remonetization, or rather the adoption of the bill before the House, bring the commercial ratio between gold and silver to the legal ratio of 16 to 1?

Mr. TALBERT. Why, Mr. Speaker, in answer to that question, I will say that if silver were put back to the position it occupied before 1873 the natural law of supply and demand would regulate the ratios, legal and commercial. Only give silver a chance and it will take care of itself as it was done of old.

Mr. COLSON. I ask the gentleman how near the remonetization of silver would bring the legal ratio to the commercial ratio? I ask for information.

Mr. TALBERT. As I have already said, if you give silver the same chance with gold, as it had from the time of Abraham down to 1873, the law of supply and demand would regulate it. The legal ratio and the commercial ratio fluctuated somewhat before the demonetization, but to such a small extent that business was not disturbed. But now, while the legal ratio is 16 to 1, the commercial ratio is 34 to 1. They have gradually grown to their wide difference since 1873 because silver has been denied by law an equal showing with gold, a very natural consequence.

Mr. WANGER. Do I understand the gentleman to say, then, that silver at 16 to 1 of gold will circulate currently?

Mr. TALBERT. I think so, with maybe some slight fluctuations, first in favor of one and then the other; and, Mr. Speaker, why I think so is this: It did it for seventy years, on up to 1873; that is, sometimes one was more plentiful than the other, sometimes one metal being used almost entirely; but the legal and the commercial ratios kept so near together as not to disturb business, and I see no conditions so much changed as to prevent it now in case silver is remonetized, which I hope it will be. The ratios, legal and commercial, will be reestablished proportionably without exact concurrent circulation, judging the future by the past.

Now, I want to say right here and right at this time that all the evils predicted as following the restoration of silver to its original position, as due to the mintage laws, are based simply on prophecy and not upon precedents, for there is not one case going to show any of these evil consequences. We had none of these evils when silver and gold had the same showing. There is no precedent for it.

A MEMBER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TALBERT. I do not wish to be in any manner discourteous, but will say as my time is limited, I would like to proceed without further interruption.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Carolina declines to yield.

Mr. TALBERT. Now, Mr. Speaker, I know that the advocates of a gold standard are keen and shrewd, and make many ingenious and fine-spun arguments here on this floor to show that the gold standard should be preserved and that silver should be kept down; but, sir, I shall stand first, last, and all the time for the money of the people, the money of "our daddies," and more, the money of the Constitution—silver.

It is truly astonishing to me to hear some of the speeches in this House against silver, coming from the ranks of those claiming to be Democrats. It seems to me to be clearly in violation of their own platform, in violation of the dictates of the Democratic party, and such a course on their part has caused the almost universal overthrow and complete wreck of the organization, and, if persisted in, will inevitably result in its entire disintegration. While this is a serious matter and one not to be made a source of levity, I can not help being amused at the turn the discussion has taken. One member will get up and say with wild gesticulation and great force, "If silver is remonetized the country is ruined"; another will grow eloquent and say, "If silver is not remonetized the country will go to destruction." So here we are "between the devil and the deep sea," and this again brings to mind the old darky preacher of whom I have already spoken, who on another occasion was addressing his flock on the subject of "The broad and the narrow ways," and, warming up to his subject (and making a mistake), said: "My bredren, dere's but two roads for you to trabbel; one leads to eternal damnation, and de udder one to hell and destruction." At this old brother Pompey, who was sitting near a door, made a break, and reaching for his hat exclaimed: "Dat bein' de case, dis darky takes to de bushes," and away he went. [Laughter.]

Now, gentlemen, what shall we do? Let us not take to the bushes. [Laughter.] Let us not dodge the issue, but let us come out like men, and men who are not afraid to back their judgment by action. Let us do that which is just and right to those whom we are sent here to represent. Let us do our duty though the heavens fall. [Applause.]

Men get up here and say that if we open the mints of the United States to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, the silver of the whole world will be dumped in here on us. Well, now, Mr. Speaker, if that be the case, just let them dump. I am one of those who would like always to be at the dumping. [Laughter.] If they send their silver here to be coined, do you not suppose that they will exchange it for our produce—corn, wheat, oats, cotton, and many others? And in that way the prices of our products will be advanced, giving us just returns for what we produce, and putting into circulation that which we so much need, thereby enabling us to remove the iron heel of the monopolist from our necks. [Applause.] But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this would not be the case, for, as the National Bimetallist has well said:

> Silver-standard countries are now taking substantially the whole of it, and the opening of our mints would in no way limit their requirements. For the goods which they sell in Europe and America they must be paid, and paid in silver.
>
> The essence of the American bimetallists' claim is that the people of the United States should have the right to the unrestricted use of both metals as money, and having the right the use will necessarily follow in the best and most advantageous way. If concurrent circulation be maintained and parity preserved, as bimetallists believe will be the case, well and good. Should our gold be exported, it will only be for value received, and the silver which remains will perfectly perform the business of the country, just as it has done in time past and just as it is doing in silver-standard countries to-day.

The House bill as it passed and was sent to the Senate authorized the issuing of bonds and certificates of indebtedness; both of said features are objectionable, and I voted against both, for I am unalterably opposed to issuing any interest-bearing obligations when notes can be issued without a cent of interest to the people. But since that time the bond feature has been eliminated, from the fact that bonds have been issued under the old law to the tune of $100,000,000, thus making the sum of $262,000,000 issued within the last two years by Cleveland, Carlisle, and company, whose only ambition seems to be to issue bonds, shoot ducks, destroy silver, retire greenbacks and Treasury notes, and, in the end, to make slaves of the American people, in order that they, with a few other money-mongers, may grow fat and be at ease. And all this, too, in direct violation of the very letter of the law. Lamentable and sad state of affairs, yet true. However, some good has been done by the agitation of this bond-issuing business, as "the powers that be" did finally advertise for a popular loan by inviting bids for the last bond issue from all parties and not making a secret deal, as before; thus, at least, shutting out the suspicion of private speculation at the expense of the public. Mr. Cleveland has said that "public office is a public trust," and in view of the fact of his having made use of this expression himself, it might have been well for him to have carried out the Biblical injunction which says "Avoid even the appearance of evil."

The gentleman who is the present Secretary of the Treasury has in the past been one of the most ardent advocates of silver. This is an extract from what he said in 1878 in expressing himself about the demonetization of silver, and I have quoted him before:

> According to my view of the subject, the conspiracy which seems to have been formed here and in Europe to destroy by legislation and otherwise from three-sevenths to one-half of the metallic money of the world is the most gigantic crime of this or any other age. The consummation of such a scheme would ultimately entail more misery upon the human race than all the wars, pestilences, and famines that ever occurred in the history of the world. The absolute and instantaneous destruction of half of the movable property of the world, including horses, ships, railroads, and all other appliances for carrying on commerce, while it would be felt more sensibly at the moment, would not produce anything like the distress and disorganization of society that must inevitably result from the permanent annihilation of half of the metallic money of the world.

These are extreme silver views. The author of them was a free-silver man "with a vengeance"; but, like Saul of old, when he was persecuting Christians wherever he could find them, "Yet breathing out threatenings and slaughter against the disciples" of gold monometallism, he journeyed, "and as he journeyed he came near" the great city; and suddenly there shined round about him a light from Wall street: And he fell to the earth, and heard a voice saying unto him, John G., John G., why persecutest thou me? And he said, Who art thou, Lord? and the answer came, I am Grover, King of those "whom thou persecutest: it is hard for thee to kick against the pricks." And he says: "What wilt thou have me to do?" And Grover said unto him: "Go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do." Go ye and get Hoke, Herbert, Morton & Co., and we will make for ourselves a golden calf. And so they have. And now they all worship together at the golden shrine. They were once on the right track, but the devil took them upon the high mount and showed them all his rich golden possessions, and said to them: All this will I give you, if you will fall down and worship me. And so they did. They, as well as many others, have been allured and enticed away from the people and the people's money to gold and those who believe in gold money.

And, Mr. Speaker, what caused this sudden and radical change? I will leave the answer for others to give, for it would be uncharitable to say they get gold for it. Saul was converted from wrong to right, but these people were converted from right to wrong. Oh, the power of gold!

The argument, if such it may be termed, of those who oppose this bill seems to me to be very weak, indeed. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. DINGLEY] has traveled all over the world in quest of argument against the bill and, really, like the first dove sent out from the ark, he had to come back without finding dry ground on which to plant his foot, and brought a "greenback" notwithstanding the fact that he rehashed all the old stock arguments of the gold bugs. He claims that if the mints are opened in the United States to free coinage of silver that we will be driven to silver monometallism. Now, the gentleman must know that we can never have monometallism of one metal unless the other is first demonetized, and vice versa.

Mr. GROSVENOR of Ohio asks in his speech, "Why do something for silver?" I would ask him, Why do so much for gold? Silver is the poor man's money, and gold is the money of the rich. It does seem to me that this Government is determined to continue to grind down the poor man between the upper and the nether millstone of want and usury until, in self-defense, he will be compelled to resort to some other means than an appeal to his representatives in Congress for relief. I hope, though, it will be given him without that necessity.

I have thought of the position of some of our Democratic friends who, like Carlisle, Cleveland, Smith, Morton, and company, have gone over to the worship of the golden calf, and would like to ask if they do not think they occupy very strange ground before the country? Gentlemen, why this change so suddenly? Those of you who are present now and hear what I have to say would afford me great pleasure, and this House too, no doubt, if you would favor us with some of the reasons for these sudden changes of front. True, you may say that the times and conditions have changed, hence your change; but in the face of conditions as they now exist, would it not be better to increase the means of living to the poor by giving back to them the money of the poor—silver?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota said in his speech the other day that the farmer had gotten a better price for crops under the single standard than he did before. Now, let us see. In 1873, the year silver was demonetized, cotton was bringing 19¼ and 20 cents; and after that crime was committed in that year it went down to less than 15 cents, and it continued to go down gradually till it went below 5 cents, and it has not been very much higher since, only reaching 8 or 9 cents occasionally. It is a fact that ever since silver was demonetized (1873) the prices of farm products have continued gradually to go down, following silver, which, by its demonetization, was reduced to a commodity, alongside of other commodities, itself gradually getting lower and lower. Now, if the demonetization of silver reduces the products of the farmers as silver goes down, then it is reason that the reverse must be true, that its remonetization will gradually put prices of these products up as silver goes up. Now, Mr. Speaker, if this be true, and we believe it is, then the statement of the gentleman from North Dakota, above referred to, is in error.

Now, the above applies especially to cotton, but not only is it the case with cotton, but with all the products of the farm, thus showing that this "crime," as Carlisle called it, falls most heavily upon the farmers, and yet men, and Democrats at that, will have the effrontery to still advocate the continuation of this "crime."

Mr. COLSON. If the gentleman will permit me, although he has refused to be interrupted, I would like to ask (for information) another question.

Mr. TALBERT. I will yield for only one question.

Mr. COLSON. You speak of the constantly falling prices of cotton and other farm products since 1873. Do you not think that the increased production caused this decrease in prices?

Mr. TALBERT. No, sir. Because with this increase of production came also the increase of population, which naturally caused an increase of business and an increase of the demand for these products. The cry of overproduction, which we hear so much about, is a mere farce. It will not do. As long as there are as many people in the United States as there are who are naked for want of even cotton goods, this overproduction howl is the merest nonsense.

Then, too, Mr. Speaker, we hear a great deal about "an honest dollar" (having reference to the gold dollar) and "the 50-cent dollar" (having reference to the silver dollar, etc.) and many other such fraudulent expressions. I claim that one dollar with the United States Government's stamp on it is just as good as another. For instance, four laboring men, A, B, C, and D, go to the merchant to buy potatoes, which are $2 per bushel; A, B, and C have each $1; A's silver, B's coppers, and C's greenback. But D has a dollar in gold. A, B, and C buy their potatoes, and each get one-half bushel, and up steps D and says: "Mr. Merchant, you must give me a whole bushel for my dollar." "Why?" asks the merchant. "Oh, don't you see, it's a pretty little gold dollar!" "That makes no difference," says the merchant; "it's only a dollar after all." So you see the silver dollar, the dollar of coppers, the greenback and the gold dollar all bought just the same; one was just as good as the other—the so-called 50-cent dollar was just as good as the gold dollar. "But," say the gold bugs, "that will do very well perhaps here at home among ourselves, but how about it when we have commercial and business dealings abroad with other countries? How about 'our credit' abroad?"

Mr. Thomas May Thorpe answers this as follows:

> The pretended anxiety for our credit with a little handful of foreign bondholders is as real as the philanthropy of those good women who let their own children go in rags that they may make red flannel mufflers for the heathen in tropical Congo.
>
> Reestablish our commercial prosperity and we have the best guaranty for one and all of our obligations, public and private, domestic and foreign. If that will not satisfy Europe, then let Europe go unsatisfied. If I treat my guests as well as I treat myself and my family, I do all that courtesy requires.
>
> Let us mind our own financial business and politely request Europe to do the same. Oh, for one hour of American feeling! That is only one of the many precious things that a "gold basis" forces us to throw into the bottomless pit of the forum.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that that must be the disposal our present Secretary of the Treasury has made of his American feelings and sentiments, as well as our Chief Magistrate; or else these European gold demands upon our Treasury would cease to be gratified. How long, oh, how long, gentlemen, will the vaults of our Treasury continue to be looted, robbed, and plundered of their gold reserve by the heeded demands of a few bloated bondholders? How long will our Secretary of the Treasury, in coalition with the highest official of the nation, continue to override the will and wishes of our people and openly and boldly violate the law of the land? I would that we had more Andrew Jacksons and Daniel Mannings. As someone has well said:

> If Carlisle would only obey the law as Manning did, and pay out silver at his option, and not the bankers', etc., there would ensue "a great calm" financially, as when the Master spoke the all-sufficient word upon the stormy Sea of Galilee.

While Secretary of the Treasury, during the time of a great demand on the Treasury for gold coin redemption, Mr. Manning, we are told, went to the city of New York, and calling the gold raiders together, said to them:

Gentlemen, the Treasury is willing to furnish gold for any legitimate demand, but if you attempt to draw upon the Treasury gold after to-day, as you are now doing, for hoarding or speculation, I shall adopt an effective remedy for the protection of the Government's reserve. We have a cash balance of $150,000,000, and not one of you doubts for a moment the purpose and ability of the Government to maintain specie payments. But if you continue to withdraw gold I shall at once order that you be paid 10 per cent in silver coin the first day; the second day you will be paid 20 per cent in silver; the third day, 30 per cent, and so on till one-half will be paid you in silver.

"But," exclaimed the astonished bankers, "this is in violation of the implied obligation that the Government will pay gold."

"Make no mistake about that," replied Mr. Manning. "The law says 'coin,' and the Treasury will exercise its undoubted prerogative."

That ended the gold raiding. The Government won its point just as soon as the Secretary of the Treasury showed that he had a backbone.

And it would win its point in the same way to-day. Manning's way was Jackson's way, when that great Democrat said, "I take the responsibility," and ordered the removal of the deposits from the United States Bank, telling the banking ring that if they wanted a panic they were at liberty to proceed with it.

Mr. Speaker, I only wish that our President and Secretary of the Treasury now had the courage and backbone of old Jackson and Manning, for our people have been robbed and plundered, imposed upon, and ground down by this as well as many other schemes and rascalities of those in power, acting in concert with the gold bugs, etc., till it has gotten to where it hurts. The people feel it, and are crying out for relief and help, but our officials and the money power answer back, "Bear it, it's the best."

It reminds me, gentlemen, of the farmer and his little boy who had a bull pup they were training to catch hogs. The farmer would get down on his all fours and the little boy would set the puppy after him. So one day the old fellow got down and capered around like a pig, and the little boy turned the pup loose and said, "Sic him, sic him, pup"; and the pup ran up to the old man and caught him by the ear, and began to bite the old fellow pretty hard, and it began to hurt, and he commenced to squall, "Take him off! Take him off! It hurts! It hurts! Take him off!" And the little boy, standing a little way off enjoying the fun, ran up, and patting the old man on the back, said, "Stand it, pappy! Stand it, pappy! Bear it if you can. I know it's hell on you, but," says he, "it's the very making of the dog."

So that is the answer that our national officials and the money power give the people when they cry out for relief from the present financial system of the country: "Stand it, stand it; bear it if you can. We know it's hell on you, but it's the very making of us."

But, Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of this House, I want to give you warning right here and right now that the people have stood this about as long as they propose to, and you must give them relief or else they will leave you at home and send men here to the next Congress who will do something for them, and in my opinion, under the present circumstances, the best way to start is to vote for the bill now before this House, and give the country back its money—give them free coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1, and that will at least be one step in the right direction.

As often said by others and by the press of the country, whatever may have been hoped by gold monometallists at the time of the first bond issue two years ago, it is now admitted that nothing of a permanent nature can be gained by the sale of bonds for gold. Borrowing gold can no longer be regarded in any other light than a costly makeshift and at best than a means of temporarily postponing suspension of gold payments. Such a state of affairs is eminently unsatisfactory. The necessity of borrowing gold is as annoying and unsatisfactory to gold theorists as the blind policy pursued by Mr. Cleveland that occasions it, is humiliating to the masses of our people.

Also, for the difficulties that confront the Treasury, gold monometallists have but one panacea, a contraction of the currency. Gold Democrats and gold Republicans alike have but one remedy to suggest. As much as the remedy asked for by Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Carlisle and the remedy proposed by Mr. DINGLEY and Mr. SHERMAN and other gold Republicans differ in form, in substance they are the same. The only difference between Messrs. Cleveland, Carlisle, and HILL, as representative of gold Democrats, and Mr. DINGLEY and Mr. REED and Mr. SHERMAN, as representative of gold Republicans, is that the former openly urge the funding of the greenbacks and Treasury notes, the creation of an interest-bearing debt of $500,000,000, and the contraction of the currency to the gold basis, while the latter propose such legislation as will attain the same end, but in a covert way.

Then again, the Dingley bond bill passed by the House and the resolution presented by Mr. SHERMAN to the Senate are not avowedly measures of contraction, though the inevitable effect of enacting into law either the Dingley bond bill or the proposition advocated by Senator SHERMAN would be virtually to contract the currency by hoarding greenbacks and the Treasury notes issued under the Sherman Act in the Treasury, but are so drawn as to hide the effect, if not the purpose, of such legislation from the people, and thus quiet opposition.

Like the recommendation urged by Mr. Cleveland, Mr. Carlisle, and other gold Democrats, the proposal of the gold Republicans, as set forth in the Dingley bond bill, contemplates the issue of bonds. Mr. Cleveland and Mr. Carlisle recommend the retirement of the greenbacks and the Treasury notes by directly, so far as possible, exchanging them for interest-bearing bonds. The proposal of the gold Republicans, on the other hand, is to sell bonds for gold, redeem the greenbacks and Treasury notes with this gold, and then virtually retire them by hoarding them in the Treasury.

Of course it is true, as also stated, in the face of an opposition in the party that they dare not ignore Mr. DINGLEY and the gold Republicans modified the bond bill by joining to the bill a declaratory clause to the effect that the greenbacks should not be canceled and retired, but when redeemed should be reissued and kept in circulation. But greenbacks, when so redeemed, can only be put again in circulation by being paid out in the usual course of business to meet the expenses of the Government, and if the revenue is equal to the expenditures of the Government—and on the great importance of raising such revenue Mr. DINGLEY and other gold Republicans laid much stress—there would be no possibility of paying out those notes and keeping them in circulation, but just to the extent they were redeemed with borrowed gold they would of necessity be hoarded in the Treasury. That such was the expectation of Mr. DINGLEY is apparent from the gist of his speech in support of his revenue measure, in which he laid great stress on the fact that if during the past two years and a half the revenue had been equal to the expenditures of the Government—whereas there was a deficit of $130,000,000—the drain on the gold reserve would not have reached such alarming proportions, for, as he said, there would have been greenbacks and Treasury notes in the Treasury to an amount of $130,000,000 which are now in circulation and in the hands of those who may present them for redemption.

Then it follows that the sale of bonds for gold by the Cleveland Administration has contracted the currency as it is. If there had been no deficit in the revenues, the currency would have been contracted to an amount equal to the quantity of gold received for the bonds, for, although the gold so received into the Treasury would no doubt have been paid out in redemption of greenbacks and Treasury notes, such notes would have been piled up in the Treasury in its place and thus withdrawn from circulation.

Look at this! And, too, we are asked to surrender the control over the measure of value to the banks, to place the producing classes at the mercy of speculating bank managers, and for what? Simply, if we can trust the assertions of the gold monometallists of a class that urged silver monometallism when they feared a depreciation of gold as the result of the discovery of gold in California and Australia, and now urge gold monometallism, whose first and foremost tenet is that the dearest money is the best money, and who are contractionists on general principles, because the Treasury has no means of protecting its gold reserve. They tell us the Bank of England can control and check any export of gold if need be, and stop at any time a drain on its specie reserve simply by raising the rate of discount. The United States Treasury, on the other hand, they tell us, has no real means of protecting its gold reserve. It does not discount commercial paper, therefore it can not raise the discount rate, and consequently it is powerless to check a drain on the gold reserve.

Thus it seems from these and similar statements that Secretary Carlisle is bent on withdrawing from circulation outstanding Treasury notes and legal tenders. And he is succeeding, too. Last year the currency of the country was contracted almost to the extent of $50,000,000, and the process still continues. But the contraction indicated by the statistics does not represent the whole operation. No gold and no greenbacks (both of them indicated as being in circulation) can be had for business purposes; and meantime the bank loans are being drawn in and diminished. Thus the sorely harassed American people more and more are denied the privilege of using the instruments with which they may conduct the business of making exchanges. Thus, while foolish theorists are insisting that we have too much currency, men who wish to collect debts or to meet their engagements or to carry forward enterprises which they have begun are unable to accomplish their purposes. Thus, while commerce is half paralyzed, workmen are idle, and the prices of the products of labor are 50 per cent below the real value, our rulers are borrowing hundreds of millions of dollars and heaping up a mountain of debt upon a despairing people in a vain effort to maintain the British gold system. Is that system worth all this sacrifice, all this distress and embarrassment? And the end is not yet. We can not go on borrowing forever. We can not keep the gold system permanently by agreeing to pay out more gold than we take in. One day or another collapse will come, and then the present suffering will appear like happiness in comparison with the misery that the people will then be called upon to endure.

Here is another fact stated and never denied. Last year the bankers who managed Mr. Cleveland's little operation in gold pocketed, it is said, about $10,000,000 in profits. Now other bankers are arranging to perform a similar feat, with a promise of equal or greater advantage to themselves. What persons pay these vast profits and the hundreds of millions of debts which are thus imposed upon the country? The wealth producers of the nation—the farmers, the laborers, the common people. What is the condition they find themselves in at a time when the professional manipulators of money are thus gorging themselves with spoils? Are the wealth producers prosperous? Are they by their industry turning out dollars as merrily and as bountifully as the financiers are turning them in? By no means. The farmers are the worst sufferers. They must now give 2 bushels of wheat or 2 pounds of cotton to pay the debt which, when it was contracted, could have been paid with 1 bushel of wheat or 1 pound of cotton. Everything like profit long ago disappeared; and while profits were vanishing the value of farm property has shrunken anywhere from 25 to 50 per cent. Never during the century were American farmers poorer or more despondent than they are to-day. As for the laborers, multitudes of them find themselves in midwinter without work or wages, while other multitudes are working only one-half the time. All of these men number millions, and all are watching sharply Mr. Cleveland's negotiations with the bankers, whose pockets bulge with the profits of last year. The men who create the wealth see it passing into the possession of the money lenders, while the producers toil practically without recompense.

Now, here is a pertinent question, Is this a condition of things that is likely to produce a feeling of contentment in the minds of the masses? What are socialism and anarchy made of but the jealousy and hatred excited by undue prosperity on the one hand and undue misery and suffering on the other? Is not a strong stimulus supplied to socialism when the men who produce get nothing, while nonproducers scoop in the whole product and grow fat? Are not anger and the impulse to violence even more likely to be excited when the discontented men know that the men who thus enrich themselves are the authors and defenders (directly or indirectly) of the destructive system which has been fastened upon us? While Mr. Cleveland and his followers have almost or quite wrecked the hopes of the masses of our people by their many nefarious schemes, the banking class here and in Europe has brought us into subjection to the British gold system in behalf of which these mountains of new debt are piled up. British gold monometallism has played havoc with the farm and with the public Treasury. With these destructive forces paralyzed, all the land would have blessing, and the financiers would win only fair returns for their services. With these forces in operation, the land has blighting and blasting, but the financiers gather their harvests by wagonloads. The system which permits these things can not endure. They would hardly be tolerated in Russia. If free Americans continue to tolerate them they will demonstrate that liberty has been intrusted to unworthy hands.

Now, as I have already said, the question is one of money, and the whole thing just resolves itself into this question: Shall we have a "gold standard," dictated by creditor England and the creditor classes of America in the interest of the creditor classes of both countries and ruinous to productive industry in both, or shall we have a return to the bimetallic standard guaranteed by the Constitution that was wrongfully changed by the act of 1873?

Then, in the language of the bimetallist, when the issue is thus presented the people will not be long deceived by abusive epithets and meaningless catch-phrases, but will see for themselves the true nature of the issue and that the toiling masses can have no prosperity under a system which is rapidly concentrating the entire wealth of the country into the hands of a pampered few. Nothing but ambiguous phrases and vague declarations have heretofore prevented the restoration of bimetallism in the United States. They have been essentially the weapons of the money power, by which the people have been hoodwinked and induced to put men in office not in sympathy with their desires. Upon such an issue as Mr. Carlisle now presents, namely, between the gold standard and bimetallism, Mr. Cleveland could no more have been elected President of the United States than he could have been made Czar of Russia, which position, however, I think, he would have been very much better suited to fill than the one he now has. We welcome the issue.

Now, Mr. Speaker, just a word in conclusion in defense of my State and my people in addition to what I said a few days ago. During this discussion some have seen fit to use the terms "tyrants," "anarchists," "communists," etc., in reference to my State and my people. I want to say that American history is sufficient vindication of South Carolina, which shows that the blood of her sons has moistened the soil of every battlefield for liberty from Lexington and Bunker Hill to Yorktown, and from Chapultepec to the City of Mexico. And it was the hardy sons of North and South Carolina who met and repulsed the bloody Tarleton at Kings Mountain, thus turning the tide in favor of American independence, then fast ebbing. Thus South Carolina has nothing in her past history of which to be ashamed, but much to be proud of, and to-day there is no place upon her soil for the foot of a tyrant, no atmosphere in which the anarchist can live and grow, and no congenial spirit with which the communist can move and associate, and her people stand ready to-day to meet the present issue like men, and there are too many Daniels there to worship idols, and, notwithstanding the decree of kings and princes, they will be found bowing three times a day with faces turned toward the Jerusalem of their old-time Democracy, worshiping the true and living God, the God of the whole people, and not the god of the chosen and select few, the "golden calf." [Applause.]

Mr. COLSON. Mr. Speaker, it has been stated upon this floor that this discussion is merely a dress parade, that the opinion of no one will be changed by it, and that it serves only to give the members of this House an opportunity to go on record for their constituents.

To this statement in its entirety I can not subscribe. I have been instructed by this debate, and I deprecate any effort made by the leaders on this side of the House to limit debate on so important a question as to preclude any member who desires to participate in the discussion from being heard. For this reason when, on yesterday, the gentleman from Maine moved that the discussion close this evening, I objected to the proposition and insisted that the discussion be further extended. The framers of the Constitution of our country provided, and I think wisely, that the members of this branch of the Congress should be elected every two years by a direct vote of the people. This was to insure closeness of touch between the people and at least one branch of the lawmaking power. This House, as now composed, consists of 357 members, a majority of whom never served in any preceding Congress. Certainly, sir, these new members, of whom I am one, coming as they do fresh from the people, know something at least of the sentiments and conditions prevailing among the people. They have felt the pulsation of the masses, they have heard the heart throbs of the people, and therefore ought to be heard upon this or any measure affecting the public interests.

The full attendance here this evening is evidence that the members of this committee feel an intense interest in the pending question, and if there is any relation between the interest shown and the solution of the question, the question will soon be solved. I am not one of those who are denominated throughout the country "gold bugs," neither am I of that class called "silver lunatics" or "silver cranks." I am not an extremist. I think it is not right for those who differ upon this question to call each other names. Such a course does not hasten the solution of the question or in any way throw light upon it. We, as representatives of the American people, ought to be honest and fair in the discussion of this question. We should be open and frank, and if in the discussion of this question we learn something to modify our views we should acknowledge that fact, and act accordingly. By this rule I, for one, propose to be guided. Whatever will bring the greatest good to the greatest number should be done.

> He's true to God who's true to man; wherever wrong is done,
> To the humblest and the weakest, 'neath the all-beholding sun,
> That wrong is also done to us; and they are slaves most base,
> Whose love of right is for themselves, and not for all their race.
> —James Russel Lowell.

Some time ago this House passed a bill and sent it to the Senate, and that body has returned it to us with every line eliminated, and has offered us as a substitute a measure which has no direct relation to it, providing for the free and unlimited coinage of silver at a ratio of 16 to 1. I can not support this Senate measure any more than I could support the first section of the bill we sent to the Senate, and for which this is proposed as a substitute. In my remarks in the House when that bill was under consideration I stated my reasons for opposing that section, and by those reasons I continue to stand. Could I believe that if we adopt the measure now under discussion silver and gold at the ratio provided would circulate concurrently in this country, I would not hesitate to give the measure my support.

Mr. TALBERT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. COLSON. Certainly.

Mr. TALBERT. If the two metals did circulate concurrently for seventy years up to 1873, is there any reason why they should not do so again if silver were given the same chance?

Mr. COLSON. If silver were given the same chance under similar conditions, I think it would come as near circulating concurrently with gold as it did in the period between 1792 and 1873, but I will say to the gentleman that between 1792, the date free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 15 to 1 was provided for, and 1873, the time when the gentleman says silver was demonetized, there were periods when only one of the metallic dollars was in actual circulation as money.

Mr. TALBERT. But they were both looked upon as money of redemption, and if the silver circulated a little more freely at one time, or the gold at another, that did not make any difference.

Mr. COLSON. I am coming to the discussion of that point. I will remark here, however, that from 1792 to 1873 we had legally and nominally a double standard. Sometimes at the ratio of 15 to 1, sometimes at a different ratio, but there were periods when, owing to the increase in the commercial value of the metal in one of the dollars above its face value, it ceased to circulate as money and was sold as a commodity, leaving only the cheaper dollar in circulation.

Mr. TALBERT. That was very natural.

Mr. COLSON. Certainly. Now, if you will eliminate the question of parity, if you will insure maintenance of parity, if you will make it possible for gold and silver to circulate concurrently, then I say to you I am in favor of both metals being used as primary or standard money at 16 to 1, or any reasonable ratio.

Mr. TALBERT. I agree with the gentleman that stability is possibly of more importance than the ratio, which seems to be the point that he is making.

Mr. COLSON. There is only one objection to the free and unlimited coinage of silver, and that is the difficulty of maintaining the parity. With that difficulty removed, there is no reason on earth why we should not have free and unlimited coinage of silver in this country. I challenge any man to advance one good and valid argument, except the difficulty of maintaining the parity, against free and unlimited coinage of both gold and silver, and if you will solve that question—if you will guarantee that the two metals will circulate concurrently—then I am willing and anxious to vote for the free and unlimited coinage of silver; and until that is done I very seriously doubt the wisdom of passing the pending measure. I agree with those who are clamoring for the free and unlimited coinage of silver that there is not enough money in this country. I agree with them that the amount of gold that we have is not sufficient to support the volume of currency that this country needs. I am opposed to monometallism, either gold monometallism or silver monometallism. I am a bimetallist, and I want to see the gold dollar and silver dollar go hand in hand—circulate side by side in this country. They say we are thrashing over old straw in the discussion of this question.

Well, now, Mr. Speaker, this question of parity has been a question of public interest for many years. It was a question right at the organization of our mint in 1792; it has continued to have its influence throughout our whole history, and is attracting more attention to-day than ever before. If by rethrashing this straw we can get one golden grain, we ought to rethrash it. I am willing to do it. If by any word I may utter, or anything I may do, I can relieve in the slightest degree the depression prevailing throughout the land, I shall feel repaid for the effort. If we can find the philosopher's stone whose touch will heal the nation, if we can discover the instrument with which to pluck the thorns from the agonizing crown that rests upon the people's brow, the consciousness of having done so will be ample reward.

By the act of April 2, 1792, the free and unlimited coinage of silver and gold at the ratio of 15 to 1 was provided for, but owing to the fact that the commercial ratio between silver and gold diverged from this legal ratio of 15 to 1, owing to the fact that gold became more valuable as compared to silver than 15 to 1, and therefore disappeared as money, ceasing to circulate as such, which resulted in a severe contraction of the currency, the Government, by the act of June 28, 1834, by reducing the amount of the gold in the gold coins, changed the legal ratio from 15 to 1 to 16 to 1, thereby hoping to keep gold in circulation. But by this act of June 28, 1834, establishing the legal ratio of 16 to 1, silver was undervalued, with the result that it disappeared from circulation as gold reappeared. Then, by the act of February 21, 1853, to prevent the undervalued silver coins from being gathered up and sold as bullion, the amount of silver in the silver half dollar, silver quarter and dime and half dime was reduced, and their legal-tender quality limited to $10.

The silver dollar, which was not changed by this act of February 21, 1853, still undervalued, disappeared almost entirely from circulation, and did not reappear to any extent until five years after the act of February 12, 1873, or until the passage of the act of February 28, 1878, authorizing the purchase and coinage of not less than 2,000,000 nor more than 4,000,000 silver dollars per month. It may be well for me to add in this connection that there were only 8,031,238 silver dollars coined by the Government from April 2, 1792, to February 12, 1873, and that there have been coined 419,332,777 silver dollars since February 12, 1873. It is but fair to state, however, that prior to the act of February 12, 1873, silver coins were regarded as money of ultimate redemption, and that it is not so regarded by the officials of the Government at this time.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the most important question before the House to-day, second in interest to none. There is another question to which it is related that has contributed to the depression prevailing throughout the land, and to which I must refer in the discussion of the causes that have brought about the present depressed condition of affairs. That is the tariff question, the merits of which I will not now undertake to discuss. It has, however, been thrust upon us in all its intensity by the present Democratic Administration. Until the election of Grover Cleveland President of the United States and the election of the Fifty-third Congress in November, 1892, the revenues of the Government were sufficient to meet its expenses, and it was not necessary to issue bonds of the Government, ostensibly in order to maintain the gold reserve in the Treasury, but really to meet a deficiency in the revenue.

Never before in the history of the Government has it been necessary in time of peace to increase the bonded debt of the Government. As soon as it was known that Grover Cleveland was elected President and that there was a Democratic Congress, just as soon as the business interests of the country realized that every branch of the Government would be placed under the control of the Democratic party, a season of distress came upon us, because it was known that the Democratic party would legislate upon the line of tariff reform. What has been the result? The Democratic party, installed into power and intoxicated by its own success, began to legislate, and the first thing it did was to wipe from the statute book the best tariff law we ever had in this country, the McKinley tariff law, which yielded ample revenue to meet the expenses of the Government and a comfortable surplus besides, and it enacted in lieu thereof another tariff measure, framed upon the line of tariff reform in most respects, with the result that the revenues of the Government fell off and were not sufficient by many millions per month to meet the ordinary expenses of the Government.

In this connection I should like to have the Clerk read the following table, showing the receipts and expenditures of the Government per month from September, 1894, to January, 1896, inclusive.

The Clerk read as follows:

A TARIFF FOR REVENUE ONLY.

The official record of the entire seventeen months of the Gorman tariff shows a deficiency of $74,164,296. The details are as follows:

Month.	Receipts.	Expenditures.	Deficit.
1894.
September	$22,621,228	$30,323,018	$7,701,789
October	19,139,240	32,713,039	13,573,800
November	19,411,403	28,477,188	9,065,785
December	21,866,136	27,135,460	5,269,324
1895.
January	27,804,399	34,523,447	6,719,047
February	22,888,057	25,696,035	2,807,978
March	25,470,575	25,716,957	246,382
April	24,247,836	32,990,676	8,742,839
May	25,272,078	28,558,213	3,286,136
June	25,615,474	21,683,029	3,932,445
July	29,069,697	38,548,063	9,478,366
August	28,952,696	32,588,184	3,635,488
September	27,549,678	24,320,481	3,229,196
October	27,901,748	34,503,425	6,601,677
November	25,986,503	27,199,283	1,212,780
December	26,288,937	25,814,317	474,620
1896.
January	29,237,670	32,696,830	3,459,159
Total	429,323,353	502,487,650	74,164,296

Mr. COLSON. We have here a deficiency in seventeen months under the Gorman tariff of $74,164,296. As a consequence of the insufficiency of revenue to meet the expenses of the Government a raid was made upon the gold held in the Treasury as a fund to guarantee the redemption of the greenbacks. That gold was taken to pay the ordinary expenses of the Government, which should have been met by revenues derived from customs duties and internal taxes. But for the tariff legislation of the Democratic party we would not have the intensely distressed condition which we have to-day to contend with. But it is here, and we must do the best we can to relieve the people.

Mr. Speaker, the Republican party will settle this question; the Republican party is opposed to gold monometallism; the Republican party is opposed to silver monometallism. It is in favor of bimetallism, and in this connection I should like to have the Clerk read from the platform of the Republican party adopted at Chicago in 1880.

The Clerk read as follows:

It has raised the value of our paper currency from 38 per cent to the par of gold; it has restored, upon a solid basis, payment in coin of all national obligations, and has given us a currency absolutely good and equal in every part of our extended country; it has lifted the credit of the nation from the point where 6 per cent bonds sold at 86 to that where 4 per cent bonds are eagerly sought at a premium.

Mr. COLSON. That, Mr. Speaker, was the declaration of the Republican party in its platform adopted at Chicago in 1880. It referred to the course of that party upon the financial question in this country from the inauguration of Lincoln to 1880. It had been necessary in time of war for the Government to issue what were called the greenbacks, which were merely its notes. Owing to the fact that the life of the nation hung in the balance, those greenbacks or notes of the Government did not, when issued, circulate at par with gold or silver. But after the war was over, when the life of the nation had been preserved, the confidence of the people in the ability of the Government to redeem its paper in specie began to grow, and as the years rolled on and the wise administration of the Government by the Republican party progressed, these greenbacks or notes of the Government continued to increase in value and to approach in value silver and gold.

In 1875 the Republican party passed the resumption act, providing that upon the 1st of January, 1879, the Government should redeem in specie any of these greenbacks presented at our Treasury. The Democratic party opposed this measure. It said that resumption could not take place; that the Government could not redeem the greenbacks in specie; that it could not resume specie payment. That party here in the Congress of the United States opposed to a man that measure providing for resumption. The 1st day of January, 1879, arrived, and the confidence of the people of this country in the ability of this Government to resume specie payments was so great that there was no rush at the doors of the Treasury of people clamoring for redemption of greenbacks in specie. Nobody wanted greenbacks redeemed in coin, because everyone felt satisfied that the Government could do it, and the greenbacks were preferable because less cumbersome. It was to this course of the Republican party, it was to this management of the Government finances, that the Republican party refers in its platform of 1880. I would like now to have the Clerk read from the Republican party platforms of 1884, 1888, and 1892.

The Clerk read as follows:

We have always recommended the best money known to the civilized world, and we urge that efforts should be made to unite all commercial nations in the establishment of an international standard which shall fix for all the relative value of gold and silver coinage.

The Republican party is in favor of the use of both gold and silver as money, and condemns the policy of the Democratic Administration in its efforts to demonetize silver.

The American people, from tradition and interest, favor bimetallism, and the Republican party demands the use of both gold and silver as standard money, with such restrictions and under such provisions to be determined by legislation, as will secure the maintenance of the parity of values of the two metals so that the purchasing and debt-paying power of the dollar, whether of silver, gold, or paper, shall be at all times equal. The interests of the producers of the country, its farmers and its workingmen, demand that every dollar, paper or coin, issued by the Government shall be as good as any other. We commend the wise and patriotic steps already taken by our Government to secure an international conference to adopt such measures as will insure a parity of value between gold and silver for use as money throughout the world.

Mr. COLSON. These, Mr. Speaker, are the declarations of the Republican party in its national conventions on this question, and I stand by them, that the Republican party favors bimetallism, provided always that every dollar of our currency is as good as every other dollar. I recognize the fact, sir, and agree with those who seek the passage of this bill, that gold as measured by agricultural products has appreciated in value. I believe that, and I concede it. I believe that it is more difficult to discharge a dollar of obligation now than it was in the past. I believe, on the other hand, that silver has depreciated, and I believe further that unfavorable legislation has contributed to this result. I believe that the legislation of the Governments of the world has contributed to enhance the value of gold and depreciate the value of silver, but I do not believe that it would be wise for this country alone to attempt to make silver and gold circulate concurrently at the ratio of 16 to 1.

If we can secure the cooperation of some other nations I believe that it can be done. I am therefore opposed to this Government alone attempting to restore silver to its former position. I am in favor of what is termed international bimetallism. I am in favor of seeing silver restored to its rightful position by the nations of the earth acting in conjunction, and, sir, if the other nations of the earth now using the single gold standard can by any form of legislation by this country be forced to cooperate with the Government of the United States in bringing about this desirable result I will favor such legislation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

[Mr. WANGER addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SNOVER. I ask unanimous consent that the recess be now taken.

There was no objection.

The House accordingly (at 9 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) took a recess, according to previous order, until 10 o'clock and 30 minutes a. m. Monday next.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Director of the Mint, relative to the amendment of the act of June 19, 1878, providing for the expenses of parting and refining bullion—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of preliminary examination of Wolf River, Tennessee—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of Jonathan Buzzard against The United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, replying to the House resolution of February 4, 1896, in regard to the new post-office building at Wilmington, Del.—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a communication from the United States assistant treasurer at Boston, asking for additional employees in his office—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. BARTLETT of New York, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 661) to amend section 2880 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, fixing time for vessels to unlade, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 295); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CORLISS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1413) for a relief vessel for the Fourth light-house district, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 296); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CORLISS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 1412) for a steam light vessel at Overfalls Shoal, New Jersey, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 297); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CORLISS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 836) to establish wind signal display stations at South Manitou Island, Lake Michigan, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 298); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. UPDEGRAFF, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 2290) to provide for the time and place of holding the terms of the United States circuit and district courts in the State of South Dakota, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 299); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

By Mr. COX, from the Committee on Claims: The bill (H. R. 539) for the relief of Frank J. Burrows, late postmaster at Williamsport, Pa. (Report No. 300.)

By Mr. FENTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill (H. R. 2984) to place Francis A. Field, late captain, Eleventh United States Infantry, on the retired list of the United States Army. (Report No. 301.)

By Mr. CURTIS of New York, from the Committee on Military Affairs: The bill (H. R. 3852) to amend the record of William H. De Freest. (Report No. 302.)

By Mr. KIRKPATRICK, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The bill (S. 249) granting a pension to Charles E. Jones. (Report No. 303.)

The bill (H. R. 4526) granting a pension to Jonathan Scott. (Report No. 304.)

By Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions:

The bill (H. R. 569) granting a pension to Sophia J. Hamilton, widow of Charles S. Hamilton, major-general of volunteers. (Report No. 305.)

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced, and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CHARLES W. STONE: A bill (H. R. 5732) to amend section 5459 of the Revised Statutes, prescribing the punishment for mutilating United States coins and for uttering or passing or attempting to utter or pass such mutilated coins—to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 5733) for the relief of certain State militia who did service in the Federal Army in the war of the rebellion—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EVANS: A bill (H. R. 5734) to repeal sections of the act of August 28, 1894, entitled "An act to reduce taxation, to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes"—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HULING: A bill (H. R. 5735) to provide for the holding the circuit and district courts of the United States at Welch, in the district of West Virginia—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. MAHANY: A bill (H. R. 5736) to authorize the Light-House Board to proceed with the construction of the light-house and fog signal on North Manitou Island, Lake Michigan—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. PERKINS: A bill (H. R. 5737) granting to the incorporated town of Onawa, in the State of Iowa, for public uses, a certain lake known as Blue Lake, situated near said town—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

By Mr. GROUT: A bill (H. R. 5738) to authorize extension of the lines of the Potomac Light and Power Company—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. HERMANN: A bill (H. R. 5739) extending relief to Indian citizens, and for other purposes—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. BABCOCK (by request): A bill (H. R. 5790) to permit the Pintsch Compressing Company to lay pipes in certain streets in the city of Washington—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. BURTON of Ohio: A joint resolution (H. Res. 110) for a survey and estimate of the cost of removing Starve Island Reef, in Lake Erie—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. BABCOCK: A resolution (House Res. No. 160) to authorize the Committee on the District of Columbia to employ a stenographer and typewriter—to the Committee on Accounts.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, committees were discharged from the consideration of the following bills; which were referred as follows:

The bill (H. R. 2410) to amend an act increasing the pension of Marcus D. Box—Committee on Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The bill (H. R. 5326) to grant a pension to Sarah A. Blazer—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Petition and affidavit of Edmund P. Tierney in support of his application for a pension by special act of Congress—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Petition of Meta Coleman and others asking increase of the pension of Mrs. O. J. Clark, of Louisville, Ky.—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Petition of Anna V. Ingerton, widow of William H. Ingerton, late lieutenant-colonel Thirteenth Tennessee Cavalry, praying for relief—Committee on Invalid Pensions discharged, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills of the following titles were presented and referred as follows:

By Mr. APSLEY: A bill (H. R. 5740) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a duplicate bond to Benjamin March, guardian of Ruth March—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. BAKER of New Hampshire: A bill (H. R. 5741) for the relief of Margaret Kennedy—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. BERRY: A bill (H. R. 5742) for the benefit of John W. Kirby, late sheriff of Gallatin County, Ky.—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. BURTON of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 5743) granting an increase of pension to Richard C. Tiner—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5744) to amend the muster rolls of Company B, Ninth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, so as to place thereon the name of William C. Armstrong—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CLARK of Missouri: A bill (H. R. 5745) for the relief of Sarah E. B. Smith—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CONNOLLY: A bill (H. R. 5746) for the relief of Benjamin F. Fox—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. CRISP: A bill (H. R. 5747) to pension Norman Statham—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS of Kansas: A bill (H. R. 5748) for the relief of Mrs. I. J. Russell—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5749) granting a pension to James C. Cunningham—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5750) granting a pension to Joseph Crow, of Eldorado, Kans.—to the Committee on Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5751) for the relief of Perry Cottingham—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. DINGLEY: A bill (H. R. 5752) to increase pension of Harrison Moulton—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ELLIOTT of South Carolina: A bill (H. R. 5753) for the relief of William M. Bird, James F. Redding, Henry F. Welch, and others—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. HARRISON: A bill (H. R. 5754) granting a pension to Lavinia H. Gachet, widow of James E. Gachet—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HERMANN: A bill (H. R. 5755) increasing the pension of Charles D. Miller, of Company D, Capt. W. H. Rodgers, Howell's Battalion Missouri Volunteers—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HUFF: A bill (H. R. 5756) to correct the military record of Samuel Steinman, of Scottdale, Pa.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HULICK: A bill (H. R. 5757) to remove the sentence of court-martial from the military record of Thomas J. Sutton—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5758) to remove the charge of desertion from the naval record of Horace G. Reed—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. KENDALL: A bill (H. R. 5759) for the relief of Evan Henry, of Clark County, Ky.—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5760) for relief of Andrew Howard, sr., of Magoffin County, Ky.—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5761) for the relief of Arch Huffman—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5762) removing the charge of desertion from the record of James F. Prewitt—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5763) for the relief of John M. Fidler—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KNOX: A bill (H. R. 5764) granting a pension to Elizabeth A. Marthon—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. LEWIS: A bill (H. R. 5765) to muster out of service James Canada—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5766) to remove charge of desertion against W. T. Akridge—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5767) to remove charge of desertion against James Braden—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5768) to remove charge of desertion against Benjamin A. Helm—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5769) to remove charge of desertion against John A. Bishop—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LINTON: A bill (H. R. 5770) to amend the record of Frederick Steuart, alias H. H. Sanborn—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5771) to amend the record of William Dumond—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5772) to grant pay for services, clothing, and commutation to James Pierson, alias James Pollock—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. McLACHLAN: A bill (H. R. 5773) for the relief of Albert E. Redstone—to the Committee on Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5774) to increase the pension of Emily A. Holder from $17 per month to $50 per month—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. PHILLIPS: A bill (H. R. 5775) for the relief of W. B. Horner—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 5776) granting a pension to Ezra G. Bill—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5777) granting a pension to Mowry A. Baker—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SORG: A bill (H. R. 5778) for the relief of Sylvester Haus, late of Company E, One hundred and fifty-fourth Regiment Ohio Infantry Volunteers—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SPENCER: A bill (H. R. 5779) granting a pension to Eda McLauren—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SPERRY: A bill (H. R. 5780) for the relief of Richard E. Hayden—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. STRONG: A bill (H. R. 5781) to increase the pension of Price Castle—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAWNEY: A bill (H. R. 5782) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Anna Wedel—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TAYLER: A bill (H. R. 5783) granting an honorable discharge to Jacob Longacre, late of Company F, One hundred and eighteenth Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WADSWORTH: A bill (H. R. 5784) authorizing the placing upon the retired list of the United States Army the name of William J. Lee, late confidential scout and guide to Gen. U. S. Grant—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WASHINGTON: A bill (H. R. 5785) for the relief of certain officers of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. WHEELER: A bill (H. R. 5786) for the relief of Kinney C. Miller, Scottsboro, Jackson County, Ala.—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5787) for the relief Henry A. F. Worth—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also (by request), a bill (H. R. 5788) for the relief of the estate of Augustus B. Pharr, deceased, late of McNairy County, Tenn.—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. THOMAS: A bill (H. R. 5789) for the relief of Isaac Coppock—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BARTHOLDT: Petition of the Hackmen and Undertakers' Union, No. 5220, in favor of the bill governing the manning of vessels for the Great Lakes—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, petition of the National Union of United Brewery Workmen of the United States, in favor of the bill governing the manning of vessels for the Great Lakes—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. BURTON of Missouri: Papers to accompany House bill No. 4360, for the relief of Jacob Scott—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. COBB of Missouri: Petition of the St. Louis Paint, Oil, and Drug Club, favoring the passage of House bill No. 2779, for the improvement of the channel of the Mississippi River—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DALZELL: Resolutions of Post No. 2, Department of Pennsylvania, Grand Army of the Republic, favoring the passage of bill to pension soldiers and sailors who were confined in Confederate prisons—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, protest of the A. D. Porter Company against House bill No. 4566, relating to postage on second-class matter—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. DINSMORE: Petition of J. W. Freeman and others, to remove the charge of desertion against Frank Herrington—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GROUT: Preamble and resolutions adopted by the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., for the protection of seaboard cities—to the Committee on Appropriations.

Also, resolutions by the citizens of Burlington and Winooski, Vt., for the relief of the suffering Armenians—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, testimony in the matter of granting a pension to John Thurston, of Island Pond, Vt.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, testimony in the matter of granting a pension to Mary Chamberlin, of Chelsea, Vt.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, resolutions adopted by the New York Mercantile Exchange, together with the New York Produce Exchange, of New York City, in favor of House bill No. 3010, regulating the manufacture and sale of filled cheese—to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. HULL: Papers to accompany House bill No. 5778—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers to accompany House bill No. 5779—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JENKINS: Memorials of C. A. Stanley and others, E. F. Geason and others, all of Ashland, Wis., and F. M. Wires and others, of the Tenth Congressional district of Wisconsin, asking for the further improvement of the harbor at Manitowoc, Wis.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

By Mr. KYLE: Petition of Dr. J. D. Cameron and others, of Holly Springs, Miss., praying payment of claims of book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South for property destroyed during the late war—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. LACEY: Memorial of city council of the city of Ottumwa, Iowa, asking payment for street paving in front of the Ottumwa post-office—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. LOUDENSLAGER: Petitions of Garbriel Decker and 92 others, of Wanague, N. J., and vicinity; Mark Orr and 16 others, of Dividing Creek, N. J.; George A. Githews and 28 others, of Salem, N. J., requesting the passage of the Stone immigration bill—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. MORSE: Petition of the First Baptist Church of Dorchester, Mass., against the appropriation of public money for the support of sectarian Indian schools—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. MURPHY of Arizona: Petition of 126 citizens of Bisbee, Ariz., remonstrating against appropriating money directly or indirectly for sectarian undertakings, and praying for the passage of joint resolution No. 11, to amend the Constitution of the United States—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. POOLE: Resolutions prepared by Right Rev. T. D. Huntington, bishop of the diocese of central New York; Rev. George B. Spalding, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church of Syracuse, N. Y., and Rev. Michael Clune, pastor of St. John's Roman Catholic Church of Syracuse, and adopted by the citizens of Syracuse at a mass meeting held February 2, 1896, protesting against the atrocities attending the existing religious persecutions in Armenia, and demanding on the part of Congress and the Executive a prompt and explicit expression to the Turkish Government of indignant remonstrance from the people of the United States—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. RICHARDSON (by request): Petition of Levi L. Bowers, James J. Haynes, and others, of Rutherford County, Tenn., in favor of a service pension to soldiers and sailors of the late war—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. ROBERTSON of Louisiana: Memorial and petition of the Daughters of the Revolution and war of 1812, of New Orleans, La., asking for an appropriation for the completion of the monument and beautifying the grounds of the battlefield of Chalmette, New Orleans, La.—to the Committee on the Library.

By Mr. TRELOAR: Papers to accompany bill for the relief of Catharine Bedell—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. WHEELER: Letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, to accompany House bill No. 5267, for the relief of Hattie J. Rogers—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 10, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The VICE-PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last, when, on motion of Mr. HANSBROUGH, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3009) granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 3728) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians, in Dakota, into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (H. R. 1464) to amend chapter 76, laws of 1893;

A bill (H. R. 2175) to extend the time for the completion of the incline railway on West Mountain, Hot Springs Reservation; and

A bill (H. R. 3812) to authorize the Arkansas and Choctaw Railway Company to construct and operate a railway through the Choctaw Nation, in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes.

INTRODUCTION OF REINDEER INTO ALASKA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the 5th instant, a report of Dr. Sheldon Jackson, upon the "Introduction of domestic reindeer into the District of Alaska for 1895"; which, with the accompanying report, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT presented a petition of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, of Germantown, Ky., praying for the enactment of legislation preventing further outrages upon the Christians in Armenia; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented sundry memorials of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New York, remonstrating against the sale of beer at Bedloes Island and at Fort Wadsworth, Staten Island, New York; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a memorial of the Dartmouth College Association of New York, remonstrating against acts of cruelty in Turkish Armenia, and urging the Government to send transport relief ships to relieve the suffering provinces; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HILL. I present a joint resolution of the legislature of New York, passed May 1, 1895, after Congress had adjourned. I ask that the joint resolution be read and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The joint resolution was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce, as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK:

In senate.

ALBANY, May 1, 1895.

By Mr. Higgins:

Whereas the canal system of the State of New York is maintained by the taxpayers of the said State at an annual cost of about $1,500,000 as a free waterway for the transportation to tidewater of merchandise and products, a large percentage of which originate in other States; and

Whereas the maintenance of said canal system is also of great benefit to other States in reducing to a minimum the rates charged by trunk lines of railroad for the transportation to the seaboard of freights originating at points without the State of New York; and

Whereas it is the policy of the Government of the United States to maintain and improve such waterways as are useful or necessary for the purposes of interstate commerce; and

Whereas the people of the State of New York, by the provisions of its constitution, have forbidden the sale or abandonment of any portion of the canal system of said State; and

Whereas by reason of the premises it is inequitable that the people of the State of New York should bear the entire burden of maintaining a waterway the principal benefits of which are enjoyed by other States: Now, therefore,

Resolved (if the assembly concur), That the representatives of the State of New York in the United States Senate and House of Representatives be, and they hereby are, requested to secure with all convenient speed the passage of an act directing the Treasurer of the United States to pay to the comptroller of the State of New York annually a sum equivalent to three-fourths of all sums expended or incurred by the State of New York in the maintenance of its said canal system during the year last preceding.

By order of the senate.

JOHN S. KENYON, Clerk.

In assembly.

MAY 13, 1895.

Concurred in without amendment.

By order of the assembly.

A. E. BAXTER, Clerk.

Mr. HILL presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New York, praying that an appropriation be made for the establishment of a light-ship off Fire Island; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CALL. I present a communication in the nature of a petition addressed to me by the Fort Brook Cooperative Association of Florida for presentation to the Congress. It relates to the title of what is known as the Fort Brook Reservation, in the immediate vicinity of the town of Tampa, which has been the subject of contention and controversy in the Interior Department for years. The petitioners are settlers upon this reservation of public land, and they ask that Congress may authorize a suit to be brought by the United States for the determination of their rights, which they claim have been improperly and unlawfully decided against them in the Interior Department.

I move that the petition be printed as a miscellaneous document, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CALL. I present resolutions in the nature of a petition addressed to Congress, signed by W. J. Borden, Hon. N. L. Clarke, Dr. Simmons, and other citizens of Sumter County, Fla., praying the Congress of the United States to enact some legislation in restraint of the abuse of the judicial power in punishing citizens of the United States for contempt of court.

I desire to state that these are agricultural people, farmers, and it only evidences the interest which the people of the United States take in all matters of public concern. They represent a numerous class of people, and are interested in the subject of obtaining some legislation which will prevent the oppression of American citizens by the abuse of the powers of the courts. They are not railway employees or members of labor societies, but are citizens of the United States, acting alone under patriotic impulses.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin presented a memorial of Shipmasters' Association, No. 6, of Milwaukee, Wis., remonstrating against the placing of bridge piers in the river at Detroit; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted at a meeting of citizens of Pewaukee, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation granting protection to American citizens in Turkey and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LINDSAY presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Methodist Episcopal Church of Lexington, Ky., praying for the enactment of legislation granting protection to American citizens in Turkey and extending sympathy to the suffering Armenians; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CULLOM presented a memorial of the Lake Seaman's Union of Illinois, remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 2670, to prohibit advances and regulate allotments of wages to seamen, and also against the passage of House bill No. 2761, to abolish the imprisonment of seamen in the common jails of the United States for desertion; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Ipava, Ill., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of sundry ex-prisoners of war of Pana, Ill., praying for the passage of House bill No. 306, granting pensions to soldiers and sailors confined in so-called Confederate prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PROCTOR presented a petition of the Vermont Merino Sheep Breeders' Association, praying for the speedy passage of House bill No. 2749, to temporarily increase revenue to meet the expenses of the Government and provide against a deficiency; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Hampshire, representing 2,700 members, signed by Miss C. R. Wendell, president, and Miss C. N. Brown, corresponding secretary, praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented the petition of S. D. Williams and sundry other citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 239, prohibiting the collection of special liquor taxes from persons other than those who are duly authorized by State laws to traffic in intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Massachusetts Horticultural Society, praying for the abolishment of the present method of seed distribution, and for the distribution only of valuable seeds and plants for experimental purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Bay State Agricultural Society at its annual meeting held in Boston, Mass., approving the action of the Secretary of Agriculture in abolishing the method of seed distribution; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Dartmouth College Association of New York, remonstrating against acts of cruelty in Turkish Armenia, and urging the Government to send transport relief ships to relieve the suffering provinces; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Western Massachusetts Union ex-Prisoners of War Association, praying for the passage of House bill No. 306, granting pensions to soldiers and sailors confined in so-called Confederate prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. PRITCHARD presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, N. C., praying that an appropriation of $1,000 be made for an examination and report as to the feasibility of a harbor of refuge at Cape Lookout, on the Atlantic coast, or at some other point south of or near to Cape Hatteras; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HOAR presented a memorial of the members of the Congregational Church, parish of Hatfield, Mass., remonstrating against the horrible atrocities committed in Turkey; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Western Massachusetts Union of ex-Prisoners of War, praying for the passage of House bill No. 306, granting a pension to soldiers and sailors confined in so-called Confederate prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BURROWS presented a memorial of 120 citizens of Adrian, Mich., remonstrating against the appropriation of public moneys for sectarian purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Dorrance, Mich., praying for the enactment of a Sunday rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. PASCO presented the petition of R. H. Barnett and 18 other citizens of Lake County, Fla., representing different religious denominations, praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of the book agents of the Methodist Episcopal Church South by compensating them for the use of their property by the United States without authority during the late war; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented a memorial, in the form of resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of Fernandina, Fla., remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 2673, to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels in the coasting trade; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. VEST presented a petition of the St. Louis (Mo.) Paint, Oil, and Drug Club, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the dredging of the Mississippi River from St. Louis to New Orleans by contract by practical river men; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. HALE presented a report of operations, by Col. John M. Wilson, Corps of Engineers, upon repairs and enlargement of the Government Printing Office and the erection of a fireproof building upon the site of the Government Printing Office stables under the Chief of Engineers during the month of January, 1896; which was ordered to be printed.

PENSION STATISTICS.

Mr. ALLEN. I hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions accompanied by a tabulation of the colonels, brevet brigadier-generals, and brigadier-generals of volunteers in the late war who have been pensioned by special act of Congress. I move that the letter and statement be published as a miscellaneous document for the use of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McMILLAN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 738) authorizing the establishment of a pier-head light at or near South Milwaukee, in the State of Wisconsin, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 996) to increase the pension of Capt. Isaac D. Toll, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 265) extending relief to Indian citizens, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 792) for the relief of Wells C. McCool, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BAKER introduced a bill (S. 2013) for the relief of James W. Snyder; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. VILAS introduced a bill (S. 2014) granting an increase of pension to Sarah A. Bull; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2015) to amend section 597 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2016) to amend "An act to establish circuit courts of appeals and to define and regulate in certain cases the jurisdiction of the courts of the United States, and for other purposes," passed March 3, 1891; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2017) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Navy to donate one condemned cannon to the Allen M. Harmon Post, Grand Army of the Republic, at Northville, Mich.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. LINDSAY introduced a bill (S. 2018) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of the estate of David Unsell, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2019) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James Harvey Dennis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 2020) to quiet the title of certain lands in the State of Mississippi, and for the relief of Eli Ayres or his legal representatives, etc.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CULLOM introduced a bill (S. 2021) to increase the pensions of veterans of the Mexican war; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2022) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska"; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. FRYE introduced a bill (S. 2023) to amend sections 4590 and 4597 of the Revised Statutes, relating to offenses committed by seamen employed on merchant vessels, and providing punishments for such offenses; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2024) to amend sections 4556, 4557, 4558, and 4559 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the inspection, equipment, and repair of merchant vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2025) to amend sections 4582, 4583, and 4600 of the United States Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2026) to amend sections 4520, 4522, 4526, 4530, 4564, 4566, 4568, 4572, and 4612 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to the employment, care, discharge, and payment of seamen employed on merchant vessels; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PRITCHARD (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2027) to amend an act entitled "An act to promote the safety of railroad employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their cars with automatic couplers and continuous brakes and their locomotives with driving-wheel brakes, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1893; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CHANDLER (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2028) for the relief of Joel M. Bryan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. HARRIS (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2029) directing the Quartermaster-General to settle with the McMinnville and Manchester Railroad Company, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PETTIGREW introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 73) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to foreclose the Government lien on the Union Pacific Railroad and the Kansas Pacific Railway; which was read twice by its title, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CAMERON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 74) relative to the termination of the war in Cuba; which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CAMERON. I ask that the joint resolution be read at length and that it lie on the table for the present.

The joint resolution was read the second time at length, and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whereas the President of the United States, in his last annual message to this body, says:

"Neither the warmth of our people's sympathy with the Cuban insurgents nor our loss and material damage consequent upon the futile endeavors thus far made to restore peace and order, nor any shock our humane sensibilities may have received from the cruelties which appear to especially characterize this sanguinary and fiercely conducted war, have in the least shaken the determination of the Government to honestly fulfill every international obligation, yet it is to be earnestly hoped, on every ground, that the devastation of armed conflict may speedily be stayed and order and quiet restored to the distracted island, bringing in their train the activity and thrift of peaceful pursuits."

And whereas he also declares that the present revolt is more active than the one which continued from 1868 to 1878; and as it appears there are no means of securing permanent peace to Cuba except by the recognition of its right to self-government, the good offices of the United States are earnestly recommended to the favorable consideration of the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. DAVIS submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. PETTIGREW submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. QUAY. I submit an amendment intended to be proposed by me to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, which I ask be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be referred to the Committee on Pensions and printed.

Mr. QUAY. Let it be referred without printing, as I understand the bill will be called up to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be referred without printing.

BONDS OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. BRICE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4052) validating certain bonds of the Territory of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

DUTY ON SUGARS.

Mr. LINDSAY. I offer an amendment to House bill 2749, which I ask may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received and printed.

Mr. VEST. Let it be read.

The amendment was read, and ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

Amend House bill No. 2749 by adding thereto the following:

"SEC. 5. That so much of section 182¼ of Schedule E of the act which became a law August 27, 1894, entitled 'An act to reduce taxation and to provide revenue for the Government, and for other purposes,' which provides as follows: 'And upon all sugars above No. 16, Dutch standard in color, and upon all sugars which have been discolored there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of one-eighth of 1 cent per pound in addition to the said duty of 40 per cent ad valorem,' be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the collection of said additional duty, from and after the passage of this act, is hereby discontinued."

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. DAVIS. I desire to give notice that on next Monday at the conclusion of the morning business I shall ask the leave of the Senate to submit a few observations respecting concurrent resolution No. 15, reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, relative to the assertion and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. THURSTON. Mr. President, I ask the consent of the Senate to make a brief personal explanation.

On Thursday last I introduced a bill providing for a pension to the freedmen. I stated at the time that I introduced it by request and it was so noted upon the bill, notwithstanding which fact I find myself credited by the press of the country with the authorship and advocacy of the measure. I am entitled to no such distinction.

The bill is a copy of a House bill introduced in the Fifty-first Congress by Hon. W. J. Connell, of the First Nebraska district. It was prepared by Col. W. R. Vaughan, a Virginian by birth, a soldier in the late Confederate army, a Democrat of the ultra Bourbon type, and my personal friend. Colonel Vaughan is a gentleman of education, of wide experience, and broad views. He has given the matter of this bill great consideration, and I introduced it at his personal request, upon the explicit understanding that I was not pledged to the support of the measure.

In justice, however, to myself I desire to state that I believe the bill has been framed with a just recognition of the great moral obligation which this Government assumed when it called a people from bondage, not only to the privileges, but also to the responsibilities and duties of freedom. As a measure based upon this principle it is entitled to careful examination, and I introduced it in order that it might be brought to the attention of Congress for its future consideration, deliberation, and action.

THE FINANCIAL CONDITION.

Mr. ALLEN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate of the amount of coin and currency, and all forms of notes and money of the United States in existence on January 1, 1896, and the amount held as reserves by national and State banks, private banks and bankers, loan and trust companies, and other financial institutions and concerns, and the total amount then in the Treasury, and the estimated population of the United States at that time.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 7th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 23) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to use a portion of the appropriation for new iron roof for foundry at navy-yard, Washington, D. C., in the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for other purposes," for repairs to the walls of said foundry.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 8th instant approved and signed the act (S. 1547) to extend the jurisdiction of the United States circuit court of appeals, eighth circuit, over certain suits now pending therein on appeal and writ of error from the United States court in the Indian Territory.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the following bills, having been presented to the President on the 28th of January, 1896, and not having been returned by him to the House of Congress in which they originated within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become laws without his approval:

An act (S. 1) granting a pension to Mrs. Eva Davis Cogswell, widow of Brig. Gen. William Cogswell;

An act (S. 138) granting an increase of pension to James H. Osgood; and

An act (S. 142) granting a pension to Annie M. Greene.

FOREIGN OCCUPATION OF ALASKAN TERRITORY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, on motion of Mr. MORGAN, referred, with the accompanying papers, to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of December 18, 1895, a report by the Secretary of State, accompanied by copies of correspondence touching the establishment, or attempted establishment, of post routes by Great Britain or the Dominion of Canada over or upon United States territory in Alaska; also as to the occupation or attempted occupation by any means of any portion of that territory by the military or civil authorities of Great Britain or of Canada.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 10, 1896.

THE REVENUE BILL AND SILVER COINAGE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] coming over from a previous day. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. QUAY on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill H. R. 2749, reported by the Committee on Finance with an amendment, be recommitted to that committee for further consideration.

Mr. GORMAN. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he will not agree to let the resolution go over, remaining on the Calendar, until to-morrow without prejudice.

Mr. QUAY. I understand there are some matters before the Senate that it is important to have disposed of to-day, and I will agree to that course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to call up Calendar resolution No. 32.

Mr. CALL. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. SMITH. Certainly.

THE WAR IN CUBA.

Mr. CALL. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the pending business, which I understand to be the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations relating to the war in Cuba and involving the question of belligerent rights and the recognition of the independence of the Cuban republic may be taken up for consideration and be made the regular order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. SMITH. I now call up Calendar resolution No. 32, which is on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. SEWELL January 16, 1896, as follows:

Resolved, That the Monroe doctrine, as originally propounded, was directed to the special prevention of the threatened action of the Allied Powers in reference to the revolted colonies of Spain and the occupation, by way of colonization, of any supposed derelict territory on this hemisphere.

2. That the question of resisting any acquisition of territory by conquest was limited, as stated by Mr. Webster, to cases in which, by reason of proximity, such acquisition would be dangerous to our safety and the integrity of our institutions.

3. That the true ground upon which the Monroe announcement was based and upon which any similar position has been taken rests for its justification upon what may be our interests, and our interests only; and that neither by the Monroe doctrine nor any other official declaration have we ever come under any pledge to any power or State on this continent that binds us to act merely for their protection against invasion or encroachment by any other power.

4. That when a case arises in which a European power proposes to acquire territory by invasion or conquest, it is then for us to determine whether our safety and the integrity of our institutions demand that we shall resist such action by armed force if necessary.

5. That the Executive has pressed the Monroe doctrine beyond what was contemplated at the time of its announcement, and that the resultant sequence of the positions thus taken seems to be a committal of this Government to a protectorate over Mexico and the Central and South American States; that this would be most unwise and dangerous, and would violate the sound and well-established policy that we should avoid all entangling alliances with foreign powers, whether they be European or American.

6. That this action was premature, looking to the history of the controversy, and inopportune in view of the business and financial condition of the country.

7. That neither Congress nor the country can be, or has been, committed by the action or position of the executive department, in reference to the Venezuelan boundary controversy, as to the course to be pursued when the time shall have arrived for a final determination. It will then be our province and our duty to adopt such a line of policy and to take such action as may be then demanded by our sense of duty to the country and by a due regard for its honor and dignity, the welfare and safety of our people, and the integrity of our institutions.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, it is not my intention at this time, in considering the resolutions introduced by my colleague, to attempt either a definition of what is known as the Monroe doctrine or to analyze the various arguments which have been made upon the question of national policy raised by the President's message. It seems to me that in the certain interest and the possible excitement attending the reception of that message and the prompt and decisive action thereon by Congress some of us have been drawn away from a true apprehension of the situation.

I may say at the outset that, for one, I am opposed to the adoption of the resolutions introduced by my colleague. I may also add that I am quite as strongly opposed to the adoption of the resolutions introduced by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. DAVIS] and reported in an amended form by the Committee on Foreign Relations. I also desire to supplement these two assertions with the remark that I have very little sympathy with the position assumed by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT].

My reasons for assuming this attitude may be summed up in a single sentence. There is no occasion for any action of any kind upon this subject by this body at this time. We have done all that either prudence can justify or patriotism demand. We have met the situation outlined to us by the President in such a manner as to show that there is no division of sentiment in the Government of the United States when any question of national honor is involved. So much we have done unanimously in both Houses, without regard to party lines or personal feelings, because to have faltered or delayed would have been a violation of our plain duty to the American people. By entering upon a discussion of what we have already done, and by reopening the question which we have already answered, we could only succeed in nullifying, or at least qualifying, the action we have already taken. A simple statement of the facts seems to me a sufficient and complete justification of this assertion.

On December 17 Congress received from the President a message outlining the position of this country as it related to the existing controversy between Great Britain and Venezuela. In that message the President pointed out, with his usual clearness of vision and characteristic vigor of expression, the bearing of that difficulty upon the welfare, integrity, and best interests of this nation. He insisted, rightfully, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the United States were concerned in a controversy which might result in the seizure of American territory by a European Government. He proved conclusively from official correspondence the obvious desire of Great Britain to enlarge, so far as may be within its power, the domain of British Guiana. He directed attention to the efforts which had been made to induce Great Britain to submit the question of a boundary line between its possessions and Venezuela to arbitration. He laid particular stress upon the fact that all such efforts had been in vain.

From these facts he deduced the logical and irresistible conclusion that it was the plain duty of the United States, in its own interest and for its own protection, to determine the rightful location of this divisional line. He therefore asked from Congress the right to name a commission which should be charged with the performance of this work. The response was prompt, unanimous, and even enthusiastic. On the very next day the House of Representatives, without a single dissenting vote, adopted a resolution embodying the President's suggestion, and on December 20, only three days after the reception of the message, the Senate unanimously concurred in the action of the House of Representatives. Since that time the Commissioners have been appointed and are now engaged in the performance of their duty. Both Houses have done all that the President and Secretary of State, charged with the responsibility of diplomatic negotiations with other powers, desired, and all that the people expected.

It is not only unnecessary, but unwise, to either qualify or intensify our action thus taken in response to both an executive and a public demand. This is the first and chief reason why I am opposed to the resolutions introduced by my colleague, as well as those recommended by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Consequently, as I said at the beginning, I do not consider that this is the time for analysis or discussion of either, although there seems to be ample reason for dissenting from some of the provisions of each. I may go even further and add that, so far as the resolutions submitted by my colleague are concerned, I can see very little justification for any one of the various propositions which he has seen fit to advance as a proper statement of our national policy. I especially dissent from his assertion that the mere determination of this boundary line for our own information "would be most unwise and dangerous, and would violate the sound and well-established policy that we should avoid all entangling alliances with foreign powers, whether they are European or American."

If there be any merit whatsoever in the Monroe doctrine, if there be any sound reason why we, for our protection, should uphold the principle of noninterference by European Governments with American Republics, it is absolutely essential that we should satisfy ourselves of rightful divisional lines, such as should exist between British possessions and the Republic of Venezuela. It is absurd to declare in one breath that a European power should not have the right of conquest by force of arms and concede in the next that it may, by the same brute force, extend its boundary line in such a way and to such extent as may seem to itself either just or desirable.

The Monroe doctrine does apply to the controversy between Great Britain and Venezuela quite as truly and quite as justly as if the flying squadron were now in a Venezuelan port demanding the submission of a people who have achieved their independence. To define the methods by which a foreign power may accomplish its purpose by evading technicalities is to nullify absolutely the American principle upon which we have taken our stand.

Nor can I agree with my colleague when he says "that this action was premature and inopportune in view of the business and financial condition of the country." Such a confession is only stultification.

It is not for me to criticise the course of my colleague, but if I had believed that this action was properly subject to these restrictions I certainly should not, as I did and as he did and as we all did, have set my seal of approval upon it. If every act of a President of the United States involving national honor or national disgrace can only be taken with propriety when the business and financial condition of the country is such as to warrant it, then great indeed must be the indignation of my colleague when he contemplates the conduct of George Washington, James Madison, and, above all, the many and most "inopportune" acts of Abraham Lincoln.

Is it not probable, also, that my colleague has overlooked one important fact when he asks this body to adopt a resolution to the effect "that neither Congress nor the country can be or has been committed by the action or position of the executive department in reference to the Venezuelan boundary controversy?"

Nobody supposes that the Executive alone could commit either Congress or the country, but the appointment of this Commission was not the single act of the President. It was authorized by the unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress, and if my colleague has any doubt of the approval of the country I would suggest to him, in all candor and sincerity, that he sound more deeply and carefully than he seems to have done the sentiment of that portion of the country bounded on the east by New York and on the west by Pennsylvania.

I have spoken this much, Mr. President, only for the purpose of emphasizing the dissent which, I believe in common with a great majority of the people of New Jersey, I feel concerning the attitude assumed by my colleague. I have not attempted analysis of his arguments, because I do not consider refutation necessary at this time; nor shall I make reply in any sense to the remarks submitted by the brilliant Senator from Colorado. I can not, however, refrain from saying that in his admiration of the courage and persistence which have always characterized the English race he may have overlooked or misjudged some of the causes which have in times past induced the exhibition of those admirable qualities.

The Senator pictures in glowing colors the bravery displayed by British soldiers in some of the wars waged by South American people to achieve their independence from Spain. I do not doubt that the picture, glowing as it was, is warranted by the facts, but, Mr. President, I have not yet heard and have never understood that the soldiers of Great Britain performed these feats of valor for the sole purpose of aiding struggling patriots. If there was not at the bottom of the assistance which England rendered a distinct, positive, and overpowering self-interest, then, indeed, her attitude in such affairs has been most generally misunderstood and most grossly misrepresented.

I do not doubt that she ardently desired the success of those men in their effort to wrest their independence from the Spanish monarchy, but if the European power so vitally concerned had been Great Britain instead of Spain, is it not within the range of probability that her soldiers would have fought with no less energy and determination than they did fight when certain American colonies, whose seat of Government to-day is not far from this place, were engaged in a like struggle for the liberty to which they were entitled?

Great Britain, Mr. President, is always willing to aid men who are endeavoring to achieve their independence from any power except herself. To weaken one's antagonist is to strengthen oneself, and no nation has ever more fully appreciated this fact than the one to whose greatness the glowing tribute of the Senator from Colorado was paid. It was to accomplish her own ends and to serve her own purposes that she lent her aid to the patriots of South America, and it was for the same reason precisely that she extended her sympathy to our Southern brethren in their mistaken struggle for what English statesmen designated as their "independence" from the Union. It may be true that "blood is thicker than water," and that people who speak the same tongue and respect the same customs should feel a bond of sympathy one for the other. Nor can any harm result from lauding the deeds of English sailors and English soldiers. But, sir, for one, I prefer to contemplate the achievements of Washington, of Greene, of Putnam, of Allen, of Jackson, of Paul Jones, and even of Lafayette, to those of Clive, Wellington, Nelson, and the others whose acts have made so deep an impression upon the mind and heart of the Senator from Colorado.

This country, sir, owes nothing to England. If ties of kindred have been broken, she was the aggressor. From the very beginning of the attempt of the noble men who achieved American independence to the present day the attitude of Great Britain toward this nation has been one first of contempt, then of hostility, then of submission to force of arms, and since that time of ever-increasing jealousy, until it became the part of wisdom and prudence to assume the condescending and patronizing attitude perfectly typified in the language of Lord Salisbury in his letter to our Secretary of State.

To assert, Mr. President, that we owe to such a power a debt of gratitude is to pervert the facts of history for the purposes of eloquence, and I, for one, can not refrain from expressing emphatic dissent from such a position.

I come now, Mr. President, to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Minnesota upon behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and I oppose the adoptions of these upon the broad ground that there is no occasion or necessity for such definition of the Monroe doctrine by this body at this time. I do not object to the strong American position outlined by these resolutions, neither do I see much to criticise in their language when applied simply and solely to the Venezuelan controversy. But I do insist that it is the height of folly to attempt to provide in this way for all cases trenching upon the principle represented by the Monroe doctrine which may arise in the future. However applicable and pertinent these resolutions may be to the instance now in our minds, it is by no means certain that they are either sufficiently broad or sufficiently specific to reach aggressions which may be made in the future.

The Monroe doctrine itself is a national principle to the simple effect that we can not and will not as a nation permit any European power to extend its territory or possessions upon this continent. Nothing can be simpler or plainer than this mere statement. Nothing can be more forceful. Nothing can be more practicable in enforcement; but the moment we undertake to say, in so many words, exactly what constitutes an infringement upon this principle we tie our own hands and open the door to an ocean of technicalities. The proper way and the only way to apply effectually the Monroe doctrine in dealing with foreign powers is to apply it to each individual case as that case may arise. One infringement upon the principle may be more harmful or offensive than another, and we should not debar ourselves from the privilege of the Mikado to "let the punishment fit the crime."

The only reason I have yet heard advanced for making a specific and official definition of the doctrine at this time is that foreign powers should not be enabled to say, as the premier of Great Britain did say in his communication to the Secretary of State, that the principle had never been officially promulgated. It is urged that we must serve notice upon the Governments of Europe that such a doctrine is in existence and will be maintained. It is insisted that we must not leave to them the privilege of excuse upon the ground that they had never heard of it. I am not prepared, Mr. President, to admit that this necessity has existed for a moment since President Monroe made his famous declaration, but even granting that this may have been so until very recently, it does seem to me very plain that such necessity does not exist to-day. The ringing message of the President of the United States, promptly supported by the unanimous vote of both Houses of Congress and by the unanimous sentiment of the country, is sufficient notice to every power in the civilized world that the Monroe doctrine is a fixed principle of this Government, to be maintained in all cases and at all hazards. No foreign minister now can plead ignorance. The fact of the existence of this doctrine needs no further demonstration, and any attempt at definition, intensification, or qualification only serves to weaken our position.

So much for the subject as it relates to the Governments of Europe. Now, consider for a moment the attitude of our own people. They upheld the President and Congress in emphasizing and applying this great national principle to the case in hand, but signs multiply that their common sense does not and will not approve of unnecessary and unwarranted action upon our part. We showed by our prompt cooperation our satisfaction with the position assumed by the President. We did all that he asked or desired, and turned the whole subject back, in accordance with his suggestion, into the proper diplomatic channels. The problem is now where it should be, in the hands of the President and Secretary of State. Every one of us knows and the people know that, in the interests of both patriotism and prudence, it could not be in a better place. If further responsibility should devolve upon us we will meet it as we met the situation which the President submitted for our consideration. But for the present the responsibility is not ours. It is his, and we have no right to interfere with his conduct of the affair until we become convinced and the people become convinced that his conduct is wrong.

I know that there exists in this Chamber an impression that the President's message has given rise to a patriotic fervor throughout the country which may be utilized to foster Presidential aspirations, but it has happened often in the past, and might easily happen in this instance, that action upon such a theory would have the effect of a boomerang. The patriotic sentiment of the United States is great and powerful, but it is not greater or more potent than the conservative common sense which characterizes our whole people. For one, I believe that they are satisfied. They have had enough. They want no more jingoism. They are sick and tired of the constant injection of party politics and personal ambition into our dealings with other nations. They are suffering from our inaction upon other matters of the most vital importance. Indeed, it is a fact, and we may as well admit it first as last, that the great majority of the people throughout the country are disgusted with Congress in general, and the Senate in particular. The most popular thing we could do to-day, and probably in the present condition of affairs the most beneficial thing we could do, would be to pass the necessary appropriation bills and go home. The mere fact that we are in session is a menace to the revival of business and the return of prosperity.

As a Democrat I might, for partisan reasons, rejoice in such a condition, while one branch of Congress contains an overwhelming Republican majority and the other is controlled by a combination of Republicans and Populists; but as a citizen, professing to possess some portion of the common sense characteristic of my countrymen, I deplore it.

Others may consider it a patriotic duty to remain here for the sole purpose of emphasizing devotion to the lost cause of silver and of listening to discussions of an unjust and unwise tariff revision, which every Senator knows can not be enacted into a law, but I for one am free to say that I see no necessity for such action and feel no call to such duty. Of all the resolutions that have been introduced, or may be introduced, I can think of but one for which I would cheerfully and gladly give my vote, and that is to adjourn. If circumstances permitted us to take this course I am confident the whole country would rise up and call us blessed; but since they do not, I suppose there is nothing to do but to remain here, subject to the dominion of a Republican-Populistic combination, and bear as best we can the just reprobation sure to be visited upon this body as a whole by the great majority of thinking American people.

PATENTS IN POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution submitted by the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. KYLE], coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. KYLE on the 7th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be directed to inform the Senate whether any person or persons in the employ of the Post-Office Department has applied for or has received any patent for an invention or improvement of existing invention made or received since his entry into the employ of the Post-Office Department touching any article used by such Department; and whether such employee has received any royalty in respect to the same.

Mr. KYLE. As the resolution merely calls for information from the Department, I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. HALE. Is it simply a resolution asking for information?

Mr. PLATT and Mr. KYLE. That is all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. As Senate joint resolution 43, in relation to the distribution of seeds, is the unfinished business at 2 o'clock, I am willing that the Senator in charge of that measure should bring it up now, as I understand the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] desires to go on with some remarks, and then I shall not have to be broken into at 2 o'clock. As soon as that is through, however, I will ask the Senate to resume the consideration of the urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. CHANDLER. Do we understand that the Senator will not ask the Senate to proceed with the urgent deficiency bill before 2 o'clock?

Mr. HALE. Not before 2 o'clock, and at that time if the measure in charge of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] is nearly out of the way I will yield, that it may be disposed of.

THE REVENUE BILL.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to give notice that on Wednesday I shall endeavor to call up the tariff bill.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS, ETC.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senate to take up the joint resolution in relation to the distribution of seeds.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a very few moments. I apologize for again addressing it at all upon this subject. Inadvertently I neglected when I addressed the Senate last week upon the pending joint resolution to call attention to a very remarkable table contained in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture. I think, as a matter of justice to the Secretary and to those who criticise his action in the administration of his office, and to the Senators who, I take it, propose to defend his action, that all the facts should be made public and attention called to them.

I do this the more readily because I see in yesterday's Washington paper an interview with the Secretary in which he invites impeachment by Congress, and intimates that if we should pass the joint resolution as amended the Chief Executive will exercise his veto power to destroy it. If that is to be apprehended, then the President should be apprised of all the facts as they can be brought out in debate.

The principal point of attack upon the gratuitous distribution of seed heretofore, and I take it the same charge will be made in the future, has been and will be that members of Congress use this legislation to popularize themselves at home. I might acquit myself of this charge by simply stating that I have never taken a large amount of interest in the gratuitous distribution of seed, but have contented myself with answering the demands made upon me by the people of Missouri in that regard. But, Mr. President, when the Secretary of Agriculture and his friends attack Congress and charge that this distribution is used for personal and selfish purposes, it is but simple retribution that the fact should be made known that the Secretary of Agriculture himself has used this legislation more largely and unhesitatingly than any member of either branch of Congress has ever endeavored to do.

Without further preface, I call the attention of the Senate to a table found in the Report of the Secretary of Agriculture on page 204. This table gives the allotment and distribution of seeds to members of Congress for the year 1894–95. It will be found by reference to the table that the State of Nebraska had allotted to it 131,856 papers of seed, and that there was distributed or given to members of Congress from that State by the Secretary of Agriculture 221,961 papers, being an excess of nearly 100,000 papers for his own State.

To show how unequally and unjustly this distribution was made, I call attention to the allotment to my own State, Missouri, which was 278,794 papers. The members of Congress from that State, it seems, received and distributed only 245,846. The State of Minnesota had allotted to it 148,338 papers, and yet the members of Congress from that State distributed only 133,148. The State of Louisiana had allotted to it 129,456 papers, and yet the members of Congress distributed only 124,111.

The State of Iowa had allotted to it 214,266 papers, but the members distributed only 203,219. In the great State of New York, where 534,052 papers were allotted, the delegation from that State distributed only 474,842. In the great State of Ohio there were allotted 380,586, and the members of Congress distributed 366,723 papers. In Pennsylvania, where there were allotted 528,724 papers, the members distributed only 488,468.

So these greedy politicians, passing a law to popularize themselves at home, have absolutely not availed themselves of the pro rata distribution of seed made to them under law, but have sent away less than the amount to which they were entitled, while the Secretary of Agriculture, using the power vested in him as an executive officer, exceeded the just allotment to his own State by nearly 100,000 papers of seed.

Mr. President, this is enough to make the star-eyed goddess of reform hang her head and blush for shame. But that is not all. Upon page 203 of the report will be found a table giving the allotment of seed actually made by the Secretary of Agriculture from July 1, 1894, to June 30, 1895—one year. I call the attention of the Senate to the table, because it shows distinctly and emphatically the manner in which the Secretary of Agriculture used this appropriation for his own purposes.

The table shows that the whole number of seeds distributed in that year aggregated 9,528,653 packages. Nebraska received 1,133,754 packages, or nearly one-ninth of the whole amount throughout the United States—1,133,754 packages went to the Secretary's own State. The population of Nebraska by the census of 1890 was 1,058,910. Illinois received during the same time 391,230 packages, with a population of 3,826,351. Iowa received during the same time 221,681 packages, with a population of 1,911,896. Missouri received during the same time 267,042 packages, with a population of 2,679,184. When we come to Nebraska, according to this report, the Secretary allotted to Congressmen for distribution 221,961 packages, an excess of the just allotment to that State, as I have shown, of nearly 100,000.

Under the report as shown there is said to have been allotted to agricultural associations and miscellaneous applicants in Nebraska 895,241 packages. These 895,241 packages were sent to Nebraska by the Secretary of Agriculture himself, outside of the number allotted to the members of Congress from that State. To show that this is absolutely true I call attention to the amount given to agricultural associations and miscellaneous applicants in Illinois, which is 4,420 packages, outside of the number allowed to the delegation. In Iowa there were 3,217 packages only, in addition to the number allowed to the Senators and Members of the other House. In Missouri there were 5,637 packages in addition to the number allowed to the delegation, making for the three great agricultural States of Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri an aggregate of 13,274 packages sent to miscellaneous applicants, as against 895,241 packages sent by the Secretary to miscellaneous applicants in the State of Nebraska.

Nebraska, as I have said, received 1,133,754 packages in that year, with a population of 1,058,910, or one package to every man, woman, and child in the Commonwealth. Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri, with an aggregate population of 8,417,411, received during the same time 879,953 packages, showing that Nebraska received 253,801 packages more than Illinois, Iowa, and Missouri combined.

But, Mr. President, this is not all. The great State of Texas received during the same time 276,098 packages of seed, Mississippi 207,779, Arkansas 152,759, Louisiana 134,307, Alabama 247,236, and Tennessee 318,069, making an aggregate in those six Southern agricultural States of 1,336,248 papers, as against 1,133,754 to the State of Nebraska alone.

The population of Texas in 1890 was 2,235,523, Mississippi 1,289,600, Arkansas 1,128,179, Louisiana 1,118,587, Alabama 1,513,017, Tennessee 1,767,518, making an aggregate population of 9,052,424, as against 1,058,910 in the State of Nebraska.

Now, Mr. President, if this law has been prostituted for personal purposes, who has gone further than the Secretary of Agriculture in that direction? Under what authority did he take 1,133,000 papers of seeds and send them to his State, violating the allotment, violating every principle of justice and right which should govern an officer of this Government in the discharge of his high functions?

Sir, I have denounced that action, and if I had no other reason it would be found in the table which I have read here to-day. If a Cabinet officer of this country in the distribution of seeds can strike down the spirit of equality and justice which is the basis of our republican institutions, then the example set to the people at large must at last result in an utter disregard of all the basic doctrines upon which the Government of the United States has been founded.

Mr. GEORGE. I see that certain amendments to the joint resolution have been reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and if they are adopted they will remove in a great measure my objections to the measure. I desire to inquire whether the Senate has ever acted upon those amendments; and if not, I ask the consent of the Senator from North Dakota to have a vote on those amendments now.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has drafted a substitute for the whole measure which he desires to offer, and which will make the adoption of the amendments unnecessary.

Mr. GEORGE. I should like to have that substitute offered at this time.

Mr. VEST. I submit a substitute for the original joint resolution and the amendments reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase and distribute valuable seeds for the year 1896, as has been done in preceding years; and as the public exigency requires that the valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants, to be purchased, may be ready for distribution at the earliest possible date, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to procure them by open purchase or contract at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold: Provided, That the said Secretary shall not, in said purchase, pay more than a reasonable and fair price for such commodities or for any of them.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed as a substitute by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

Mr. BATE. I desire to be heard for a little while on this measure. I have been out of the Chamber. I did not know that the joint resolution would come up until 2 o'clock, at which time it is the regular order.

Mr. FAULKNER. It was taken up by unanimous consent in the morning hour.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. BATE. Mr. President, the substitute that is now offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] is pretty much of the same character as the joint resolution which was brought in by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] in that they both go to the same extent, and I think it does not materially change the attitude of the question before the Senate.

We have had considerable discussion upon this matter, and although it seems a simple thing and a small amount involved, only $130,000 having been appropriated for the purpose of purchasing seed, yet the law which regulates that is a qualified statute and limits the character and kind of seeds that are to be purchased. Heretofore the same law has been in existence, and it has been carried out, as it is said by those who seem to be prosecuting, if not persecuting, the Secretary of Agriculture for what they seem pleased to say is a dereliction of his duty, and the language of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. HANSBROUGH] was strong in the beginning in accusation of him. He even charged that it was not only premeditated and deliberate, but, I believe, he used the word "malicious"—that he had premeditatedly and maliciously disobeyed the law which appertains to the Department of which he is chief.

Mr. President, however much I may differ with the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to some of his peculiar ideas of a political character, as also in regard to some of his economic ideas touching his Department, yet I do not think it is just and fair that he should be accused here in the manner in which he has without vindication. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of this body, and I heard his testimony before that committee touching this matter, and I have also read the Secretary's report. I have likewise read the statute under which he acts, and I do not hesitate to say that I believe the Secretary of Agriculture has carried out the law as it is written, to the very fullest extent, and that he has not deviated a hair's breadth from the true spirit and intent and letter of the law which he stands here charged with having violated by failing to execute it. I believe that any Senator who will look at it reasonably and dispassionately, and read the language which is used therein, and observe its connection by which it is to be governed, will see under the facts presented that the Secretary of Agriculture has most tenaciously adhered to the very letter of that law. Yet he is to be held up to ridicule and even abused here in the Senate, in speeches that are sarcastic and inflammatory, because he dared in discharge of his official duty to follow the letter of the law.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the Senator from Tennessee yield to a question?

Mr. BATE. I will.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the Senator please tell the Senate why it is that the Secretary of Agriculture did not place the same construction upon this language in the two preceding years, when he did execute the law, that he places upon it now, when he does not execute the law?

Mr. BATE. I think I can give a very satisfactory reason why he has not done so. When he came to look at the position in which he was placed when first appointed chief of that Department he found a certain condition of things, and most naturally he purposed following the precedents, as any other reasonable and practical man would. He found the precedents as to the purchase and distribution of seeds all one way. You must remember that this Department is quite a new institution and has been in existence for only a few years. He had but two predecessors as Secretaries of Agriculture, one for only a few months and the other for four years immediately preceding his term, which commenced three years ago. It had not been in existence long enough for the practice in the distribution of seed to have grown into a kind of common law, and therefore the Department must be governed strictly by statutory provision.

Finding in the Department such precedents, he followed, of course, as any newly appointed Secretary would, right along in the wake of those who had preceded him. I will say to the Senator from Louisiana that he desired to make a fair test of it. He did so the first year, and pursued the same course the second year. At the end of the first year, however, as you will see by the report, there was a better showing from the seeds and plants that had come from abroad, and better specimens to change from one place to another in our own country, than were presented in the second year. In the second year he began to see that there were frauds practiced upon the Government; that the seeds that were brought there were those of former years; and old seeds were sought to be dumped upon the Government at such prices as those who had them to sell saw fit to ask. That opened his eyes in this regard, and he began to look into it, and believed a change necessary. He did it with extreme caution and in a manner in which no one here who wants to do what is right would disapprove.

Senators may object to him and not like him personally or indorse his political views. I do not agree with him myself, for that matter. I differ with him in some of his views as much as any other Senator here, the Senator from Missouri not excepted. Yet, Mr. President, I propose to do him justice. He is entitled to that, not only because he is the head of a Department, but because he is a man of high intelligence, of virtue, of integrity, and honesty, for no one has dared to call in question his honesty or integrity notwithstanding the onslaught that has been made upon him. We may dislike him for certain sentiments, and he may have gone outside and have published things perhaps that he ought not to have published; he may have pursued that line of policy, objectionable to some, which seems to be a part of the present Administration as well as of former Administrations, that their Cabinet officers shall go forth in the country and enlighten the people on the policy of the Administration. This Cabinet officer does not stand alone as to that, although he has been made a subject of severe and sarcastic criticism for it.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the Senator yield to me again?

Mr. BATE. Certainly.

Mr. BLANCHARD. I understand the Senator, then, to answer the question which I have propounded to him by stating that because the Secretary of Agriculture had found that there had been some abuses growing out of the distribution of seeds in the last two years, therefore the present year he refuses to execute the law because of those abuses. I wish to say to the Senator from Tennessee that the Secretary of Agriculture himself has in a recent interview given a different reason. I saw an interview a day or two ago with that gentleman in which it is stated that he said it took him two years to find out that that section of the Revised Statutes existed.

Mr. BATE. I did not see that, and there must be a mistake about it, for the reason that he discusses in his report the Revised Statutes very fully and claims to understand them. Very naturally, when he had to take hold of the question and act upon it, his attention was called to it; it was his duty then to examine it thoroughly, and he did so. Not only that, but, in further reply to the question which was put to me by the Senator from Louisiana, I say that when imposition was practiced upon the Department in this way he saw at once that it was running riot and going far beyond the intention and spirit of the law, and being satisfied of that, it was his duty to draw these sellers of seed back to the legal line, and that he sought to do.

Did he go at it in a proper manner, Mr. President? What was the first thing he did when he came to examine this statute in the face of these impositions and extravagances that were being practiced upon the Government? He went to the proper officer, the Attorney-General, whose duty it is to give him information and to construe a statute that he has to execute. That duty of the Attorney-General applies to this Secretary as it does to the Secretary of the Treasury and all other officers of the Government. Indeed, that is what the Attorney-General is for. He is the legal adviser of those who belong to the Administration with him. But does the Secretary go at it hastily? Does he show any ill temper in regard to it? Does he show that he has a prejudice against the distribution of seeds? No, sir; but he very properly puts his application to him in writing. It is here, and has been read heretofore by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE]. I say he puts it in writing, not frivolously nor peevishly, but deliberately and sensibly, and has it sent to the Attorney-General, asking for his construction of section 527 of the Revised Statutes, which, in conjunction with section 3709, is the basis of the law under which he then and now operates in the purchase of seeds, etc.

Section 527 has to be construed, and what is the construction that is given to it by the Attorney-General? Let us see if this Secretary ought to be "hung and quartered," abused, and denounced because he has seen fit, as it has been charged, to violate this statute while holding his high and responsible place. It has been said by grave Senators that he ought to be constrained to carry out this Congressional act as heretofore, and that he "deliberately, premeditatedly, and maliciously" violated the law. Now, let us see what this man has done in regard to that matter. This section 527 will show what the law is that guides him. And as it is the initial point of this question, so far as his action is concerned, I will read it:

> The purchase and distribution of seed by the Department of Agriculture shall be confined to such seeds as are rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another, and the purchase or propagation and distribution of trees, plants, shrubs, vines, and cuttings shall be confined to such as are adapted to general cultivation and to promote the general interest of horticulture and agriculture throughout the United States.

In connection with this I will say that every annual appropriation for the purchase, propagation, and distribution of valuable seed since the said section 527 was in force contains the words "as required by law," showing that every purchase must conform to the terms used in it, and it requires that the seed so purchased shall be "rare and uncommon to the country, or such as can be made more profitable by frequent changes from one part of our country to another."

The Attorney-General, as I said, was appealed to, and what was his reply to the question as to the construction of this statute? I will read his reply:

The reply of the Attorney-General informed the Secretary of Agriculture that (1) "the seeds purchasable under the act of March 2, 1895, are limited to those described in section 527 of the Revised Statutes, there being no reasonable ground for claiming that the act of March 2, 1895, operates, or was intended to operate, as a repeal of the earlier statute"; (2) that "if not obligatory upon the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seeds, trees, etc., conformably to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes, it is certainly competent for him to make the purchases conformably to said statute, the right to reject any and all bids being reserved," etc.

The question that presents itself to the Senate is, has he done that? He has exercised the right, it is true, but has he conformed to section 527 of the Revised Statutes? I think there can be nothing clearer. He went to the Attorney-General for advice and he got that which I have read. He then advertises, under section 3709, and so particular was he in his advertisement that he followed the very language of the law, and does not give his construction nor that of anyone, but leaves it to the seed men themselves to act upon the language of the law in furnishing the kind and quality of seed required.

Does he send forth the advertisement in time? Look to the testimony that we had before the Agricultural Committee and it will be seen that he advertised in the month of April and it ran until the 1st of July. Did he make a limited advertisement? No, sir; it was a most extended one, and in those papers that were usual for such advertisements, and it appeared all over the country. Not only that, but he issued a prospectus and sent it to every man of note engaged in the seed business in the United States, and there are 152 of them who make a specialty of it, and the proof shows that he sent one to each of those and that he advertised in all proper places.

Is there any fault to be found with him in his proceeding under this section of the law? I can see none yet. Then, what was the next step he took? There were some responses made to the advertisement. They came to him as the chief officer at the head of that Department. What did he do next? He appointed a board of investigation to examine the quality, kind, and character of these seeds, to see if they came up to the statute requirement. This board examined the seeds thoroughly, and strange to say, notwithstanding all the advertisements, there were only about $1,485 worth of seeds presented, and why? It shows, to my mind, and to that of any other unprejudiced man who will look at it fairly, that heretofore they had been just dumping their old seeds of every character and kind, old and new, good and bad, upon this Department in the absence of rigid investigation of them.

The Secretary of Agriculture had found this out, and he had put forth in the advertisement that they must present their seeds in accordance with the statute, and he quoted the statute, and when they came to giving a specific description, as required, and putting on record the character and kind of seeds as rare and uncommon, or seeds which it would be better to exchange from one locality of the country to another, these seed men did not care to do it. Therefore, you see, their game was blocked. I say to the Senator from Louisiana that their game was blocked to such extent as to forbid their bringing any more seed under the conditions of the law and under the requirement of the advertisement made by the chief of this Department. As is shown by the report I hold in my hand, only $1,485 worth of seed was offered. The Secretary intended to carry out the law as far as he could with rugged honesty and rigid economy. Here was the amount of money appropriated by Congress, and he wanted to dispose of it in good faith even to the small extent offered.

He appointed three men, according to law, and they examined these seed. What did those men say in their report after examining these seed? I will presently read four or five lines of their report to show. But pray, who are these men? That I will also presently show. I will not go over the character of seeds, or grasses, or plants, or anything that were sent here to be purchased by this officer, because that has been done fully by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE] in his speech opening this debate, in which he gave a vein of rich and grotesque humor that threw it into ridicule, especially the flower seed and grasses. As it was so impressed upon everyone who heard him, I shall not repeat or even allude to the ridiculous kind and amount of seed offered; but I wish to state how much of this $1,485 worth of seed, which was all that came under this advertisement, would be to each Congressman. I quote from the report:

This would under the law have been less than 10 pounds of field and farm seed to each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress if every pound offered had been bought.

Having received no bids that came up to the requirements of the statutes and offered anything worthy of consideration, the board rejected them all and submitted the following report:

Here is their report:

The undersigned board, appointed by you on July 1, 1895, to open and examine bids for seeds to be furnished this Department for distribution according to law during the fiscal year ending July 1, 1896, have the honor to report that we have opened and examined the bids received, and find that the same do not meet the requirements of the advertisement as printed, and therefore respectfully recommend that all bids be rejected.

What, then, was left to this officer but to follow the advice that was given by this board, a proper board, appointed from his own Department, and who were experienced seed men and experts in the business? I ask what was left the Secretary to do but that which he did? Nothing; and in acting as he did he has followed the letter and intention of the law. We have heard intimations by Senators that this board was composed of his "underlings." Who are they? This report is signed by Enos S. Harnden, F. L. Evans, and J. B. Bennett.

Who is Mr. Evans? I understand he is a gentleman who has been in, first the Bureau and then the Department of Agriculture, from his boyhood, and is a part and parcel of the machinery of that concern, against whom there has never been uttered a word of complaint, and he is kept there on account of his ability as an expert. Who is Mr. Bennett? He is a man brought there from Wisconsin by Secretary Rusk, a man of Secretary Rusk's own party, a Republican. The present Secretary of Agriculture found him there and kept him. Who is Mr. Harnden? A professional seed man, brought from the State of Illinois, and his salary was dependent upon the purchase and distribution of seeds. Yet that man, and I applaud him as a man of virtue and honor, when he found the condition of things, although knowing that his occupation, like Othello's, would be gone, provided the Department did not make any purchases of seed—yet he decides at once, along with the others, that it would be improper under the circumstances to purchase these seeds, or any such, and therefore he is out of his job, and to-day, for aught I know, is hunting employment.

That is the character of men by whom this report was written. They made a just decision, and I say it is a feather in their cap that they so decided the question and decided it on the facts they had before them. They investigated the seed and they found that many of them were old, and, furthermore, that the price was unreasonable, and they so stated in their report to the Secretary; and he refused to make the purchase. That is the history of this case.

In this connection, the Senator from North Dakota, who most persistently, vigilantly, and ably represents in part that State, wanted to know why there was not a readvertisement when only about $1,485 worth of seeds were received, which, under the statute, were not "rare and uncommon." He claimed to have found an antiquated statute authorizing it; but when produced it soon fell a victim to the legal mind of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], who first analyzed and then buried it, and it has not since been referred to. Therefore I assert there is no authority for a readvertisement. Not only so, but it would have been too late to readvertise, and if done would have been without any effect whatever. But the money was not expended, and it hurts the feelings of some executive officers to have public money in their hands with the privilege of spending it and not do it. The Secretary of Agriculture, however, is an exception to that rule. He takes care of public money when in his official hands; and, as his official reports show, has not expended the amount appropriated to his Department, but covered it into the Treasury.

As the Secretary is being so severely tried, you will pardon me for saying something in regard to his economy, for I want to see justice done him and that he has the benefit of truth and the law, however much I may differ with him in some of his opinions.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] most facetiously, most eloquently, and sarcastically, and mercilessly, if I may say so, criticised the Secretary of Agriculture for having extravagantly purchased flower seed and all that. I think the Senator is mistaken in regard to the quantity of money that was given for the purpose to which he referred, and I believe it ought to be corrected; and I have no doubt he will admit the correction when he learns the facts. The Senator said, in his speech delivered on the 5th instant, to be found on page 1508 of the RECORD:

But let us look further at the question of economy. He overlooked other appropriations made for his own Department, but struck out the $130,000 appropriation for the farmers. I find, from the report of the Secretary of expenditures made in the Agricultural Department for the year 1895, that $23,567.90 was expended upon the conservatories and grounds of the Agricultural Department.

That is correct, but then the Senator goes on to say:

For 1897, etc.

I do not understand why 1897 is referred to. It applies to the future, however, and I suppose it is not necessary to refer to that. I do not care to do so. The Senator continues:

Will some Senator tell me what human being is fed by this expenditure? Will some Senator point out to me what table of any poor man has been made more comfortable by reason of this expenditure of $105,000? Where does this tax money of the people go under the immediate eye of the Secretary of Agriculture?

The Senator says $105,000 was expended for these purposes "under the immediate eye of the Secretary of Agriculture." Then he proceeds to say:

It goes to the purchase of orchids, lilies of the valley, giant palms, and exotics that grace the banquets and receptions of the President and Cabinet officers in this city.

Mr. President, I have made inquiry into this; I have looked into the reports, and I have examined the law as to who has charge of these matters, and it may surprise the Senate when I state the fact that not a green sprig or an evergreen, not a rosebud bursting with its imprisoned sweets, not a full-blown flower laden with fragrance, nor any other floral product of the Agricultural Department since under its present chief, if ever, has gone from the Agricultural Department to the White House or to the tables of any of the Cabinet ministers. I challenge the contradiction of this statement, though I have no doubt the Senator believed it when he said it.

Mr. VEST. Does the Senator mean to tell me that the propagating garden and the Botanic Garden do not furnish the flowers for the receptions and banquets of the President and the Cabinet officers?

Mr. BATE. I do; and I will show the Senator, if he will wait a moment, how he has made the mistake.

Mr. VEST. I want the Senator to understand distinctly what I said, as is shown in the RECORD. My criticism of the Secretary of Agriculture was that, while he was suggesting reforms, he failed to see the extravagance which was being perpetrated in every direction in his immediate vicinity. Whether he controlled these palms and flowers or not was not the point of my criticism at all; but when he started out as a reformer and boasted that he saved $1,350,000 in his administration of the Agricultural Department, I simply expressed my surprise that he could not see this profligate expenditure of money, as every intelligent man, I think, will believe it to be.

Mr. BATE. Is it the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to see how much money is expended in the Treasury Department, or in the Post-Office Department, or the other branches of the Government? He would be amenable to the very accusations made against him by the Senator from Missouri, and likewise the Senator from Louisiana, if he should go into the other Departments than his own in order to attempt to bring about reforms. I speak of his Department, and it was of that the Senator was speaking. What has the Secretary of Agriculture to do with the Botanic Garden at the base of Capitol Hill, which is visible to all as they pass and see the flowers and the greenhouses that decorate it? He has no more to do with it than has the Senator from Missouri, for the law places it in other hands. What has the Secretary of Agriculture to do with the propagating garden, which we find in its extent and its beauty laden with evergreens and flowers, down near the building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing? What has he to do with the flowers grown in any other part of the city, in the parks, and other places, as to how they are cultivated, or as to the manner of using them? Nothing whatever; no more than you, sir [Mr. PASCO in the chair], or I have; yet he is held up here as a man who, if he wishes to make reforms, ought to interfere in other Departments to bring about a reformation.

I repeat that the Secretary of Agriculture has never himself, nor has anyone under him, ever sent a flower or a sprig to the White House from his Department; and there was no occasion for doing so. Who has charge of such? Colonel Wilson is known to have charge of the public grounds of the District. He controls the Botanic Garden and the flowers that grow there, and he can distribute them at will. He has charge of the other floral garden beyond the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and he has charge of the parks and of the greenhouses that grow the roses and pansies, and peonies and violets, and orchids, but not the dog fennel, as the Senator stated. These grow in other places than around the Department of Agriculture, which is under the immediate supervision and direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, and Colonel Wilson is the man who has them in charge.

Look at the greenhouse, if you please, at the west end of the White House, its extent, and the variety of its plants and flowers; from this and all these Colonel Wilson has been enabled to gather all the flowers he wants to make beautiful displays whenever the occasion requires it at the White House or at any Secretary's table when he chooses to do so; and he holds himself amenable to the country for it, and I have never yet heard him criticised. He is a man of refined taste and performs these duties appropriately and gracefully.

What becomes, then, of this flourish of trumpets made by the Senator from Missouri in that very attractive, sarcastic, and, if I may say so, bitter criticism which he has visited upon the Secretary of Agriculture, like piling hot coals of fire upon his head? What the Senator said about carrying the roses in bloom and blossom to spread their fragrance at the White House under the brilliancy of chandeliers, when the wine is red, was poetry which came from the prurient fancy of my friend, and not from the facts of the case, or the law governing it.

The Secretary of Agriculture seeks to economize. I beg to submit to the Senate one or two facts upon the question of economy. While I disapprove of many things the Secretary of Agriculture has done, while I disagree with him upon some of the leading issues of the day, especially upon the financial issue, as broadly and as widely as does the Senator from Missouri, yet there is not a man who stands upon the truth of history and the record as made in the official reports who will say that Secretary Morton has been extravagant. He has been economical, it has been said, even to stinginess, and he protects the interests of the Government which have been given in trust to him in a safe, judicious, and honest manner. On this point I wish to read from the report of the Secretary of Agriculture. He says:

ACCOUNTS AND DISBURSEMENTS.

Chief F. L. Evans has submitted a summary of the work of this division for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, together with a statement of appropriations, disbursements, and unexpended balances of the United States Bureau and Department of Agriculture from the fiscal year 1839 to and including the fiscal year 1895. His report is entirely satisfactory and could only be evolved from a service of great perfection over which he has with scrupulous economy and vigilance most efficiently presided.

The appropriation for the maintenance of this Department for the year 1895 was $104,476.94 less than the appropriation for 1894, and yet it was $183,420 more than the amount estimated for by the Department.

For the fiscal year ended June 30, 1893, there was covered back into the Treasury of the United States from the appropriation for this Department $185,497.64. Subsequently the sum of (in round numbers) $625,000 for the fiscal year 1894 was returned to the Treasury, and for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, there is an unexpended balance amounting to about $500,000.

RECAPITULATION.

Five million one hundred and two thousand five hundred and twenty-three dollars and six cents was appropriated to the United States Department of Agriculture during the two fiscal years 1894 and 1895; and out of that sum $1,126,268.74 has been saved to cover back into the Treasury.

Then add to that saved sum the $185,497.64 returned to the Treasury out of the 1893 appropriation and we find that, with an unimpaired and extended and disciplined service in this Department, the aggregate sum of $1,311,766.38 is available for return to the Treasury since March 4, 1893.

The Secretary of Agriculture only got $29,500 out of $105,000, as I have said, and $23,000 of that goes for what? I turn over to that appropriation in the proper place and I find the only appropriation made for the Department of Agriculture from which such things could be purchased or cultivated is that made for the gardens and grounds of the Department, amounting in 1895 to $29,500. This includes all the expenses of maintaining the entire reservation, amounting to some 20 or 30 acres, I believe, upon which the Department of Agriculture buildings stand, and all expenses of maintaining roadways and walks, maintenance of greenhouses and seed testing; employment of gardeners, laborers, carpenters, painters, plumbers, and other mechanics; expenses of wagons, carts, horses and their feed, lawn mowers, sprinklers, etc.; lumber and hardware, glass, paints, stone, gravel, and other material required for repairs; blacksmithing, horseshoeing, repairs to implements and machinery; seeds, plants, and bulbs for propagating purposes; freight and express charges, and many other items needed in maintaining the buildings and grounds of the Department. All these are found in the act making the appropriation. Of this sum appropriated for 1895 the amount of $23,303.51 was actually expended. So the Secretary only had $29,500 to go upon, and not $105,000. The agricultural appropriation bill which has just come to us in print from the other end of the Capitol this morning has been laid on our tables, and I find it makes the same appropriation for 1896–97 as for 1895–96.

Now, let us see if I can not show something upon the question of economy which may exceedingly interest some Senators. Mr. Rusk, the former Commissioner of Agriculture, was not extravagant, but he was an honest, faithful, and just officer, so far as the records show and as I believe, and therefore I commend instead of criticising him; but let us look under his economical administration at what he spent upon the very things we have been speaking of and what has been spent by the present incumbent of the Department of Agriculture. I have here a table on this subject, which is as follows:

Purchase and distribution of valuable seeds for the following fiscal years.

Fiscal year.	Amount appropriated.	Amount disbursed.	Amount unexpended.
1889	$104,200.00	$104,168.73	$31.27
1890	104,200.00	104,174.55	25.45
1891	105,400.00	105,090.94	309.06
1892	105,400.00	104,920.35	479.65
	419,200.00	418,354.57	845.43
1893	135,400.00	134,908.27	491.73
1894	135,400.00	119,664.90	15,735.10
1895	165,400.00	120,445.15	44,954.85
	436,200.00	375,018.32	61,181.68

Now, Mr. President, during the three years 1890, 1891, and 1892, when Mr. Rusk had charge of the Department of Agriculture, there was disbursed $314,185.84, with which amount 17,551,848 packages of seeds were bought, which would be an average cost of 1.8 cents per package. Let us contrast that with the three years 1893, 1894, and 1895, when the Department has been in charge of the present Secretary. During that time there was disbursed $375,018.32, with which amount the present incumbent purchased 26,788,914 packages of seeds. This would be an average cost of 1.4 cents per package. In other words, the seeds purchased during the present administration cost about four-tenths of a cent less per package than those purchased during the previous administration. What does that amount to? It represents a saving, on 26,788,914 packages to be bought, of $107,155.65.

I want to say to the Senator from Missouri, to the Senator from Louisiana, and also to the Senator from North Dakota, who seem to have been criticising the Secretary of Agriculture for not spending this $130,000 for the expenses connected with the seed transaction, that he has saved in three years in purchasing seeds $107,155.65 in contrast with the amount of seeds that were purchased by his predecessor.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator from Tennessee inform us how many of those seeds Secretary Rusk sent to his own State?

Mr. BATE. I do not know, but I understand before I came into the Chamber the Senator was discussing that matter.

Mr. VEST. And I gave the figures from a table I had before me.

Mr. BATE. I suppose if there were any seeds left over, after giving the prescribed quota, the Secretary would most naturally send them to his own State or to those Western States where it is said they were more needed than in the Eastern and Southern States.

Mr. VEST. As the Senator did not hear me, I want to say to him that the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Morton, shows that out of the whole allotment for the entire Union he sent within a fraction of one-ninth to his own State—1,133,754 packages of seed to Nebraska.

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether there was not in the last year, or the year before, a special condition of most distressing drought in Nebraska, and was not Congress appealed to at one time to come to its relief?

Mr. BATE. Yes, sir.

Mr. VEST. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. BATE. I have not concluded, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. VEST. I am astonished that a constitutional lawyer like the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] should invoke in behalf of the Secretary of Agriculture what the President of the United States has declared to be an unconstitutional appropriation. A good many of us here will remember very distinctly when $10,000 was appropriated to Texas on account of a drought in western Texas, and we remember the veto of the President, in which he declared that the Constitution had been trampled under foot and that he never would put his signature to any such bill; and there was not even a defense of that bill made on the floor of the Senate. It was killed effectually by that veto. Does the Senator pretend that the Secretary of Agriculture had the right to use the functions of his office to send seeds to Nebraska because there was a drought there?

Mr. BATE. I contend that he had the discretionary power, and if he thought the necessity was greater there than elsewhere he should have sent seeds there.

Mr. VEST. In other words, the Secretary of Agriculture can violate the spirit of the Constitution when Congress can not violate either its letter or its spirit?

Mr. BATE. Mr. President——

Mr. GRAY. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to answer the question of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BATE. In a moment. I should like to know if the Senator from Missouri does not think that under this very act if the Secretary of Agriculture buys seeds which are not rare and uncommon seeds and to be used for experimental purposes, and sends them out to his constituents and mine, is it not straining the timbers of the Constitution? What is the difference in principle between that, I ask, and the granting of a bounty? Perhaps no man has been so eloquent and no man has uttered such tirades of criticism upon bounties as the Senator from Missouri, but, Mr. President, it is all right when it is done in one instance, though it appears to be all wrong in another.

How came this language in the statute, "Rare and uncommon seeds"? It was more to avoid the constitutional objection in procuring and distributing that class of seeds which would be for the general good of the whole country than it was to allow any opportunity to obtain seed that were as good in one place in the country as in another, and which the Government should not take hold of, and therefore they are in the provisions of the statutes.

I have already noticed the extravagant distribution and the practice going on in many instances in connection with seeds, but will again briefly refer to it. The argument against the purchase and distribution of seeds by the Government was—I do not make it, but it was made—at the time this system was being inaugurated, that Congress had no more right to buy common seeds in the country, send them off, and distribute them to the people out of the common fund, than they have to buy a rake or a hoe with which to cultivate those seeds in a garden, or to buy a calico dress for a farmer's wife, or a pair of shoes or a hat for his poor boy? I submit, Mr. President, is it not straining the constitutional timbers? What does the Senator from Missouri say to that?

Our people, notwithstanding, have decided otherwise; precedents have been established, and we have been following those precedents until abuses have grown up; and not only that, but it has now culminated in the abuse of a man's character who tries to economize by enforcing the law. The Secretary of Agriculture is a man pronounced in his opinions, and, having the courage of his convictions, he has taken the pains to analyze the law, and to do what he thought right under the law and facts when he finds what the law is. To this extent he has offended, and for which an attempt has been made to bring in every prejudice known to the catalogue against Cabinet officers, and even what has been done by certain auditors and other officials, in order to prejudice the Secretary of Agriculture, who is put, by argument and inference of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD], on a par with the conduct of Mr. Bowler, who has been so severely criticised. All this is done simply because this man has had the courage of his convictions, and has had the nerve to come up and say that, notwithstanding I have for years distributed seeds, and notwithstanding it has been the course of my predecessor to do the same thing, I will test this matter and I will advertise in the terms of the law, under advice of the Attorney-General, and see what character of seeds I can secure, and will conform to the law strictly. He did advertise, with result already shown, and I will not repeat it.

Senators will see from what I have said in regard to the present Secretary of Agriculture and the economy which he has practiced that he deserves the commendation instead of the condemnation of this Senate.

Mr. President, there is one other point relating to this matter to which I desire to refer. If I know the Senate, it wants to be practical in its legislation. Is it practical at this time to enforce the purchase and distribution of seed for this season? I think not. Are we, on the 10th day of February, 1896, to pass a resolution calling for the expenditure of $130,000, the same amount as has been heretofore expended to purchase seeds and to distribute them throughout this country? It requires a considerable length of time to do this. They can not be distributed from here in less than from seventy to one hundred days, and it would require the same force that has been used heretofore by the Secretaries of Agriculture during that time before they could possibly get ready to do what is necessary in order to properly distribute these seeds. The seeds have to be bought, they have to be cleaned, sorted, packed, addressed, and then they have to be distributed, so that you see much time is required. How many packages would they have to send out? Twenty-six million and odd packages have been distributed in this country under the supervision of Secretary Morton in three years, which will give some idea of the number.

Now, the practical question presents itself to the Senate, Shall they direct—that is the language of the resolution—the Secretary of Agriculture at this day, when it is too late to accomplish anything practical, to make this expenditure and distribution?

I believe, Mr. President, in doing anything and everything we properly can do for the farming communities, for the agriculturists of this country. I have lived among them all my life, and I count among them many of my chief constituents and warmest friends, and I want to see them have all they are entitled to; but in my part of the country there could not one of them get a seed until after it was too late to plant this year. Before these seeds could reach them they would have planted their gardens, and their vegetables would have been cultivated, and in many instances would even be upon their tables for use, before the seeds from the Department could get to them.

I heard the testimony of the Secretary of Agriculture under the cross-examination of the Senator from North Dakota and others, and I heard the statement made that the force in the Department could not be increased, for the reason that they did not have the necessary room to put the same force heretofore employed back there at work immediately after the passage of this joint resolution.

This joint resolution could not pass the House of Representatives for perhaps eight or ten days, and, my word for it, to say the least, it would be near the first day of March before it could become a law and the Secretary be authorized to make the purchase. What would be the result? He would have to buy the seeds wherever he could get them, and have to take them at the price at which they would be offered. It would then require, at the least, sixty days to get them ready for distribution, and that would bring us to the first day of May, at which time, south of latitude 38, if not 40, we have nearly all kinds of vegetables on the table for use.

Upon the question of latitude, I will quote the act in relation thereto. It reads:

That the seeds allotted to the Senators and Representatives for distribution in the districts embraced within the twenty-fifth and thirty-second parallels of latitude shall be ready for delivery on the 10th day of January.

That was a month ago, Mr. President. It is now the 10th day of February, and it would take more than two months to get them ready before they could possibly be distributed. Therefore it is a farce to urge that it should be now done. You might as well take $130,000 and throw it into the sea. It may be that people living in the extreme North may get some packages of these seeds that may be useful, and I suppose in North Dakota and in some others of the extreme northern portions of the country the seeds might be used, but in the Middle States and in the southern tier of Gulf States their gardens will have been grown before these seeds can be distributed. The State of Tennessee, which I, in part, represent, could not get a single package of early vegetables in time for use this season. The distribution, if it could be had at all, would be partial and unjust.

It is charged that this economical Secretary, who has saved the country this $314.185 in the purchase of seeds, did not readvertise for proposals. He ought not to have done so, and he has kept the expenditure down. If, however, Congress wants any change made in the law and wants to continue the practice in the future, it has but to say so, and it can be provided for in the coming Agricultural appropriation bill, but as for this year it is a thing of the past, and to use this money in the way that has been suggested would be but throwing it away.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. President, I do not intend to prolong this already protracted discussion of the conduct of the Secretary of Agriculture in regard to the distribution of seeds. I think it has already occupied more time than the importance or the magnitude of the subject justifies. But I am led to rise by the question propounded to me by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] during the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE].

I asked a question somewhat for information, somewhat for suggestion of the Senator from Tennessee, as to whether the overallotment of seeds to the State of Nebraska, of which the Senator from Missouri seems to have complained, might not have been due to the exceptional condition of the agricultural interests of that State last year or the year before—I forget which it was—which were suffering from a most distressing drought, one which appealed to the whole country for relief, and for which, if I am not mistaken, some appeal was made to Congress for special relief.

Mr. VEST. If the Senator will permit me, notwithstanding so much time has been taken in this matter, I think all the facts ought to be known. There was no drought in Nebraska last year. This distribution of seeds was for the season of 1895-96.

Mr. GRAY. I do not think I am mistaken.

Mr. VEST. It happens to be within my personal knowledge that Nebraska never raised such a crop—and the Senators on this floor from that State will corroborate my statement—as she did last year. If the Senator will permit, it is all a baseless assumption that the Secretary of Agriculture sent these seeds out in 1894-95 for the culture of 1895.

Mr. GRAY. Notwithstanding the assertion of the Senator from Missouri, I think he will find that he is mistaken, and that this overallotment of seeds of which he complains, if there was an overallotment—I do not know anything about the facts—occurred when there was this peculiar and distressiug condition of things in that State. Certainly there was a drought last year or the year before, and we all recollect the appeals that came up to us from those arid plains and the pictures of distress which were drawn to us in this body and in the public prints of the country in regard to it.

All I want to say now in regard to it is that since my attention has been drawn to this matter by the debate in the Senate I have examined the law pursuant to which this distribution of seeds has been made. Attention has been called to it by a most thorough and exhaustive speech by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE], and it is not required, after having read that speech—I had not the pleasure of hearing it—that I should say a single word to supplement its force and its conclusions. But true it is there is not a Senator in this body who can take the Revised Statutes and show that under the law as the Secretary found it, and under the interpretation that was given it by the Attorney-General, he had any right to continue this indiscriminate distribution of the ordinary agricultural and horticultural seed that had theretofore been going on.

It is well enough to accuse the Secretary of inconsistency in having pursued the plan that his predecessors had pursued for years before; but the question is whether, when his attention was drawn to it, he should continue to violate the law or whether, as an obedient servant in a democratic country, he should say that no Cabinet officer, however high, was above the law, and, whatever the consequences might be, he was bound to conform his action to its plain provisions.

So when the law says that the Secretary of Agriculture must confine the distribution to seeds that are uncommon and rare, there is no power of dispensation in the President of the United States or in any department of this Government which can condone a violation of a provision and prohibition as plain as the words that I have just recited contain.

Mr. President, if there is any responsibility for the failure to distribute seeds—and I am not one who congratulates myself that the farmers and small gardeners of the country are not receiving seeds—let it rest where it belongs in common fairness, in common justice to the Secretary of Agriculture, and let Congress assume the responsibility of altering the law and making it what the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] would have it, and what other Senators on this floor would have it—a general distribution of all the ordinary and common garden seeds of the country to the farmers and horticulturists of the different States.

Without detaining the Senate any longer I wish to call the attention of the country to the fact that if there is any responsibility anywhere for the failure of those seeds to go through the mail, as they have heretofore gone, to the farmers and gardeners of the country, it belongs to Congress and not to the Secretary of Agriculture, who has obeyed, as he was bound to obey, the plain letter of the law.

Mr. GEORGE. The Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] has offered a substitute for the joint resolution as it comes from the Committee on Agriculture. I believe the rule is that when a substitute is offered to a measure the friends of the measure have a right to perfect it before a vote on the substitute is taken. Is not that the rule?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PASCO in the chair). Amendments to the text of the joint resolution will first be considered.

Mr. GEORGE. Then I ask that the vote be taken on the amendments reported by the Committee on Agriculture, and when those amendments are disposed of it will be in order to take up the substitute proposed by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the order of the Senate.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand that the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri is to take the place of the entire joint resolution, including the amendments of the committee. I ask the Chair whether, under those circumstances, it is not proper to submit the question upon the substitute?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The friends of the measure have a right to perfect the original joint resolution before a vote is taken on the substitute; and that will be the order. The first amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 4 of the joint resolution, before the word "directed," insert the words "authorized and," and after the word "directed" strike out "to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing, publication, and distribution of farmers' bulletins," and insert in lieu thereof "to purchase and distribute valuable seeds for the year 1896, as has been done in preceding years"; so as to read:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase and distribute valuable seeds for the year 1896, as has been done in preceding years.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the joint resolution add the following proviso:

Provided, That the said Secretary shall not, in said purchase, pay more than a reasonable and fair price for such commodities or for any of them: And provided further, That he shall not be required to expend all the appropriation available for said purchase, but only so much thereof as, considering the time when distribution can be made, may profitably be expended to promote the objects of this joint resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I have an amendment which I desire to offer. I will read it in the hearing of the Senate instead of sending it to the desk. Add at the end of the joint resolution the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That so much of the seeds, bulbs, plants, vines, cuttings, and trees which has heretofore been required to be distributed among Senators and Representatives shall be divided among the States in the proportion of the representation of each in the electoral college—

That makes it exactly as it is now, Senators and Representatives both being counted—

but giving to each Territory a share equal to the allotment for one member of said college—

That makes the law exactly as it is now, so far as the share of each State is concerned, the difference being that instead of going to members of Congress it will go to the agricultural colleges—and shall then be transmitted to the several agricultural experiment stations for distribution among the people of their respective States or Territories.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read from the desk.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the joint resolution the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That so much of the seeds, bulbs, plants, vines, cuttings, and trees which has heretofore been required to be distributed among Senators and Representatives shall be divided among the States in the proportion of the representation of each in the electoral college, but giving to each Territory a share equal to the allotment for one member of said college, and shall then be transmitted to the several agricultural experiment stations for distribution among the people of their respective States or Territories.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I desire to make a few remarks on this subject. The speech made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] this morning developed a fact that I did not know before and makes the adoption of my amendment, I think, absolutely necessary. The Senator called the attention of the Senate to the fact that large portions of the seed allotted to members of Congress were not taken by them and distributed among the people of the States. He pointed out several States in which that had occurred, and he was kind enough to give me the table in which he had marked some eight or ten States in which the members of Congress had failed to discharge the duty imposed on them by law to distribute the seeds.

I have looked over the table further than the Senator had marked, and I find that there are twenty-two States, just about one-half the States in the American Union, the Senators and Representatives of which failed to take and distribute among their constituents the allotment made to them under the law. So we find this state of affairs to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, that the method of distribution of seeds among the people of the United States now provided by law is ineffectual. Some of the members of Congress, a large number of them, do not discharge their duties in that respect. I will call over some of the States in which there is a deficit in addition to those mentioned by the Senator from Missouri.

I find that in the State of Kentucky there was a failure to distribute some thousands of packages of seed. In the State of Virginia there was a similar failure. In the State of California there was a similar failure. In Iowa there was a similar failure. So in Louisiana; and I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] who makes a great onslaught on the Secretary of Agriculture for not distributing the seed to the fact that the members of Congress of that State did not distribute among their constituents the seed which the Secretary of Agriculture gave them.

There is the State of Missouri, so ably represented by the Senator who makes this onslaught on the Secretary of Agriculture. Its delegation also failed, by 33,000 papers, to distribute the seed which had been allotted to that State by the Secretary under the law of Congress.

Then there is also the State of Illinois, in which there was a deficit. So in Indiana, so in Maine, so in Maryland, so in Massachusetts, where about 70,000 packages were not distributed; so in Michigan, about 50,000; so in New York, about 120,000; so in Ohio, about 70,000; so in Pennsylvania, about 50,000, and so in Rhode Island and Vermont. I think this failure on the part of Representatives and Senators to distribute seed among the people of the United States, as required by law, is a very good reason why we should require the distribution to be made by some other means.

Right here, while I think of it, I desire to call the attention of the Senate, and especially of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], to the fact that his criticism about the inequality in the distribution of the number of packages of seed is the necessary result of the law upon that subject. It has been a remarkable thing in this whole debate that Senators have assumed that there was default on the part of the Secretary of Agriculture, and have condemned him, without at all referring to the law under which he is obliged to act.

Now, the Secretary of Agriculture would have been guilty of a gross violation of law if he had distributed those seeds by the number of packages, giving to each State so many packages. The law says he shall not distribute them in that way. I will read the law for the benefit of the Senator from Missouri, whose criticism is so severe upon the subject, and for the benefit of the Senate. It provides—

That the Secretary—

The Secretary of Agriculture—

shall not distribute to any Senator, Representative, or Delegate seeds entirely unfit for the climate and locality he represents, but shall distribute the same so that each member may have seeds of equal value, as near as may be.

So the distribution is to be made according to the value of the seed and not according to the number of packages. As I have shown to the Senate in the first remarks that I made upon the subject, some seeds cost $30, $40, or $60 a pound, and others, like corn or cotton seed, cost $1 or $1.50 a bushel. According to the idea of the Senator from Missouri, the Secretary of Agriculture in distributing the seeds must send to each State the exact number of seeds according to its representation in Congress without reference at all to the value of the seed which is distributed, when the law says that he shall distribute the seeds according to value and not according to the number of packages. So that does away with that point.

I have only one or two other remarks that I care to make upon this subject. It is a matter of some importance, I admit, but it was so clearly demonstrated by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BATE] that if we pass the proposed law now it will be of no effect or value whatever that I hardly think I ought to go much further in that direction. We are too late. We are ordering a thing to be done out of time, out of season, when with the regular rules or the regular necessities of the Agricultural Department in getting these seeds and distributing them it will be impossible to make the distribution so that the seeds may be effectual to the people who receive them.

I call the attention of the Senate especially to the emphasis placed upon the law, as found in section 527, by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY]. Only certain kinds of seed are authorized to be purchased. That purchase is not for the purpose of giving a bounty to every man who receives seed. It is a purchase for the purpose, and the sole purpose, of introducing new and uncommon seeds among the people, so that by actual experiment it may be ascertained whether or not the seeds so distributed are of any value. If you divest the law of that feature—and I desire to call the Senator's attention to this point—you would make the purchase of seed simply an eleemosynary institution for the benefit of such people as members of Congress may see proper to give the seed to. We have established the experimental stations, and we give each one of them $15,000 a year out of the National Treasury for the express purpose of testing various kinds of seeds in their respective localities, in order to determine upon what seeds the money of the Government is to be expended.

I happen to be a trustee of the Agricultural College of Mississippi, and I know something about the modus operandi of those experimental stations. They not only experiment with seeds on the grounds which have been allotted to them by the college, but they send seeds, plants, vines, and everything mentioned in this statute to persons in the State who apply for them and tell them they desire to make experiments on that subject. So I think it is quite evident now to every Senator that if we are to be governed by the purpose for which the law was enacted the best method of carrying out that purpose is to give the seed for distribution to the agricultural stations in each State.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. GEORGE].

Mr. MORGAN. If a vote is to be taken of course I will not interpose, but I want to ask the Senate to go into executive session for a very few minutes.

Mr. VEST. Let us take a vote on the pending amendment.

Mr. FAULKNER. Let us vote.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand there is a substitute lying on the table for the entire joint resolution, which I ask the Senate to vote on. I think it will take but a minute.

Mr. GEORGE. I hope the substitute will not be adopted. There is a very important difference between it and the joint resolution as now amended; and I desire to call attention to that difference.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE CRAIN.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. WILLIAM H. CRAIN, late a member of the House from the State of Texas, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate resolutions from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 10, 1896.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. W. H. CRAIN, late a Representative from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members of the House be appointed by the Speaker, to act with such Senators as may be selected, to attend the funeral of the deceased; that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House shall take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased at his home, and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to his memory the House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, I offer for adoption the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Texas will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. W. H. CRAIN, late a Representative from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the adoption of the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. MILLS].

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate, under the second resolution, Mr. MILLS, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. KYLE.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 11, 1896, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 10, 1896.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Artillery arm.

Second Lieut. John Thomas Martin, Fourth Artillery, to be first lieutenant, February 1, 1896, vice Johnson, Fifth Artillery, retired from active service.

Infantry arm.

First Lieut. Charles Dodge, Twenty-fourth Infantry, to be captain, December 4, 1895, vice Wessells, Twenty-fourth Infantry, resigned.

First Lieut. William Abram Mann, Seventeenth Infantry, to be captain, January 1, 1896, vice Greene, Seventeenth Infantry, retired from active service.

First Lieut. Millard Fillmore Waltz, Twelfth Infantry, to be captain, January 9, 1896, vice Viven, Twelfth Infantry, deceased.

Second Lieut. William Robert Dashiell, Eighth Infantry, to be first lieutenant, December 4, 1895, vice Dodge, Twenty-fourth Infantry, promoted.

Second Lieut. Eli Alva Helmick, Second Infantry, to be first lieutenant, December 21, 1895, vice Littell, Tenth Infantry, appointed assistant quartermaster, who resigns his regimental commission.

Second Lieut. Charles Grant French, Twenty-fifth Infantry, to be first lieutenant, December 31, 1895, vice Pague, Fifteenth Infantry, dismissed.

Second Lieut. Robert Weldon Rose, Fifth Infantry, to be first lieutenant, January 1, 1896, vice Mann, Seventeenth Infantry, promoted.

Second Lieut. William Clarence Bennett, Sixth Infantry, to be first lieutenant, January 9, 1896, vice Waltz, Twelfth Infantry, promoted.

To be captain by brevet.

Second Lieut. Robert Goldthwaite Carter, Fourth Cavalry, brevet first lieutenant, United States Army (now first lieutenant, retired), for gallant service in action against hostile Kickapoo, Lipan, and Mescalero Apache Indians, at Remolina, Mexico, May 18, 1873.

Cavalry arm.

Candidate Corpl. Alvord Van Patten Anderson, Troop B, Sixth Cavalry, to be second lieutenant, February 5, 1896, vice Howze, Sixth Cavalry, promoted.

AMBASSADOR EXTRAORDINARY AND PLENIPOTENTIARY.

Edwin F. Uhl, of Michigan, to be ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States to Germany, to fill a vacancy.

MISSOURI RIVER COMMISSION.

Maj. William Henry Heuer, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to be a member of the Missouri River Commission, vice Col. William R. King, relieved.

(This nomination is made to correct error in former nomination of Major Heuer, which was confirmed by the Senate January 14, 1896, and in which his name appears as Huer.)

POSTMASTERS.

Samuel B. Wheeler, to be postmaster at Westport, in the county of Fairfield and State of Connecticut, in the place of Joseph G. Hyatt, whose commission expired December 17, 1895.

James W. French, to be postmaster at Harlan, in the county of Shelby and State of Iowa, in the place of Joseph H. Reynolds, whose commission expires February 16, 1896.

William C. O'Leary, to be postmaster at Hancock, in the county of Houghton and State of Michigan, in the place of M. R. Redmond, deceased.

William R. Odor, to be postmaster at Canton, in the county of Lewis and State of Missouri, in the place of Lauriston H. Condit, whose commission expired December 23, 1895.

F. M. Ranck, to be postmaster at Westerville, in the county of Franklin and State of Ohio, in the place of Samuel E. Fouts, whose commission expires February 16, 1896.

Thomas P. McAndrews, to be postmaster at White Haven, in the county of Luzerne and State of Pennsylvania, in the place of George Sackett, whose commission expired January 6, 1896.

CONFIRMATION.

Executive nomination confirmed by the Senate February 10, 1896.

AMBASSADOR.

Edwin F. Uhl, of Michigan, to be ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary of the United States to Germany.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 8, 1896.

The recess having expired, the House (at 10.30 o'clock a. m., Monday, February 10) resumed its session.

COIN REDEMPTION FUND.

The House, according to order, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 2904) to maintain and protect the coin redemption fund, and to authorize the issue of certificates of indebtedness to meet temporary deficiencies of revenue.

[Mr. HAINER of Nebraska addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. McDEARMON addressed the House. See Appendix.]

[Mr. CALDERHEAD addressed the House. See Appendix.]

Mr. SKINNER. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have had so much difficulty in obtaining recognition. I do not, however, attribute this to any purpose of the Speaker to restrain those entertaining the views that I do, but to existing conditions and the desire of so many to address the House in so short a compass of time. I must confess embarrassment at having to speak so near a seat draped in the habiliments of mourning. My whole heart goes out to that queenly empire of the South, "Texas," at the loss of one of her great and bright statesmen. My surroundings are only symbolical of the country that is in gloom and despair from the frozen borders of Canada to the sunland boundary of Mexico, from the morning to the evening ocean, and it is for this entire country and all conditions that I desire to speak, and I am not speaking simply for home consumption, but to convert and convince, for my people are united in favor of free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1 as it was fixed by our fathers and remained until 1873; under which our great forests were felled and turned into producing plains; under which the frail bark canoe was exchanged for the floating palace and the cry of the buffalo succeeded by the iron horse; under which our great cities were builded, our magnificent harbors developed, our wonderful commerce extended; under which Louisiana was purchased from the Spaniards, and Texas, that queenly empire (to which I have referred) which will always protect our southern border, was annexed from Mexico; under which our country has passed successfully through three great wars, including the late civil war, and under which prosperity abounded everywhere until 1873. When the noble six hundred made their famous charge at Balaklava, with unblanched cheeks and steady nerves, their's was to do and die, when like heroes they rode into the very jaws of death. As they saw their comrades falling before them, like autumn leaves in Vallombrosa or like ripening grain before the remorseless reaper, there went up a whisper along that line that some one had blundered; some one had blundered.

As I look out upon this sunset continent which was dedicated to God and liberty and whose civil government had its birth upon and within the territory I have the distinction of representing, out of which has been evolved a nation of marvelous civilization, of patent and latent forces capable of a wonderful future if not restrained and destroyed by the influence of British finances, a country every page of whose history is marked by the valorous deeds and patriotic action of its plain, common people; a country naturally rich in the harvest of its wares, the harvest of its forests, and the harvest of its fields, the harvest of its mines, the harvest of its genius, brains, enterprise, and self-sacrificing patriotism; when I realize that its activities are paralyzed, its future eclipsed, its brains, genius, and enterprise restrained; when I see its commerce trammeled, its transportation over land and sea in the hands of receivers, its manufacturing demoralized, its business sensitive and restive, its Government bankrupt; as I see the plowman homeward wend his weary way after his day's work is done, as he gathers his loving family around his frugal fireside and contemplates that, though he may work from early dawn to dewy eve and exercise rigid economy, nothing remains to provide for the mortgage on the old homestead, to educate his children, or set aside for sickness or old age—as I look upon this sad but realistic picture, and as I hear these croakings of despair as they well up from the million of homes throughout the country, there comes not only a whisper, but the focalized wrongs of the people as certain and significant as the clap of thunder preceding a storm, that someone or some political party or some men in power and influence have blundered. I had rather put it that way than to criminate or recriminate any man or party. I do not believe in the policy of crimination or recrimination in conducting a debate or in outlining a party policy. But where and to whom to charge this blunder we may honestly differ according to our respective environments. We can all agree upon this pivotal point and fact, that a fatal mistake and blunder was made when this Government, with all its resources and commercial influence, consented to the demonetization of silver in 1873, as all now realize and admit that the effect of this legislation was to halve the price of all farm products and farming lands and double the burden of debt, Government expenses and taxes.

The result of this blunder has caused more wrongs and injustice to the human family than all the ravages of war, famine, and pestilence for the past two centuries. Its effect was first felt by the farming classes, covering 2,000,000 of the 4,000,000 farms with mortgages that can not be paid except under foreclosure, which has and is rapidly taking place; and under the red flag of the auctioneer homestead after homestead is passing into the hands of domestic and foreign land syndicates, which are creating a monopoly in the soil of the country.

The second class to feel the effect of this blunder—this legislation—was the laborers and wage earners of the country, and now fully 5,000,000 are practically or entirely unemployed. Their conditions have been manifested in strikes, riots, commonweal armies, and protective labor organizations.

The third class to come under its blighting influence are the tradesmen and manufacturers, the evidences of which are clearly visible to the most casual observer.

In asking recognition of the Chair and attention from members to comment upon these conditions, I am not ashamed to be classified as a Populist and to emphasize the fact that I support the Senate substitute as a distinct Populistic measure, one that the country would not have had presented in this shape except for the presence of the Populist balance of power in the Senate. It can not otherwise be intelligently and consistently considered, since both the Democratic and the Republican parties are committed by practice and policy to the single gold standard, and the Populist alone of the political organizations extant stands openly, boldly, and declaratively for the free coinage of silver at the ratio of 16 to 1. Their national platform so declares; their every State platform so declares; their every vote in both branches of Congress have been given as they have declared, and I now avow that it is the policy of the Populist to stand by this principle and to present the issue to the people from time to time until the truth of their course shall be ratified and sanctioned by a majority of the votes of the country, and thereby vouchsafe prosperity and happiness, not only to the American people, but to the entire human race. We feel under obligations to the silver Democrats and to the silver Republicans for their aid and valuable assistance in presenting in such a masterly manner to the public this issue in which is involved the civilization and safety of the entire human race. But you are all experienced statesmen, honorable, wise, and patriotic, and I have no purpose or inclination to impugn your motives or discredit your patriotism, and I can fully sympathize with your desires and hopes to have your respective parties enlist in this just quarrel of the plain, producing people against the gold trust and corporate monopoly. God grant that you may succeed, and long live the party, whatever its name is or may be, that will bravely take up and fight out to the finish this cause of the people.

But it is as clear as crystal, as clear as a mathematical proposition can be demonstrated, that both the Democratic and the Republican party will name a gold-standard candidate for the Presidency upon a declarative gold platform. After your parties take this action what is to become of your silver professions? Will you surrender these upon the advice of your party and witness the continued ruin and depression of your country, or will you act the part of patriots and place country above party and remain steadfast and true to the cause of silver, even if you have to serve in the livery of Populism? Our doors stand ajar; they will remain so for the reception of all men of all parties that have a desire of promoting the best interests of our common country and its depressed and suffering population. We need your leadership; we need your influence; we need your votes. We are indifferent as to your former political associations so your resolute purpose is to serve silver and country in the most practical manner. So, after your respective conventions have repudiated you and your silver convictions, as they are certain to do, then we invite you to St. Louis, that we may by conference adjust our differences and in a practical way devise such action as will be certain to secure a silver President and a silver Congress in 1896.

I want to assure you that the representative Populists that you will meet at St. Louis will be worthy of your consideration and association. I beg that you understand that they are not anarchists; they carry with them noble purposes and patriotic hearts, and not as you may suspicion, dynamite, ready to attack some weak point in our social condition. They are not socialists, believing that the drones should live upon the active bees; they only want a fair and equitable proportion of their own production that they may be enabled to meet their obligations and supply themselves and families with more comforts. In the cities they may live in humble tenements, even in garrets and in cellars. In the South and West they may live in humble farm homes and be compelled to follow the plow and carry the hoe, yet they are as true, noble, and brave men as ever followed Lee and Jackson or battled under Grant and McClellan to save the flag and preserve the Union. They have been brought into political existence by the conditions and exigencies of the decade, and they have a common grievance to redress. Some of them in their anxiety and impatience for relief may be indiscreet, but they believe in obtaining this relief not through the force or example of riots, strikes, commonweal armies, or by marching on Washington with rifles. They realize that in this hour of light, in this day of civilization, reform can not be accomplished either by the torch or bullet; that their only hope is through, by, and under the law as it should be declared at the ballot.

Soon after our independence from Great Britain was declared, our people had been so accustomed to a king there went inquiry through the colonies, "Who shall we make king?" It was a patriot and a patriotic thought that suggested that we will gather all the people together into one field and we will then altogether build a great tall statue; we will dedicate this to our whole country and name it "The Law," and we will make this our king. The Populists desire the continued reign of this king, and all the reforms accomplished by, under, and through this king, the law; and personally I have but little consideration for anyone or any party that would encourage the thought that they could or should be accomplished in any other manner.

We want the free American people to be unshackled from all sectional and partisan prejudices and passions and to exercise their franchises in the interest of this great American people and continent. This can be easily accomplished if free-silver leaders on this floor will only remain true to the cause and practice what they preach on the hustings and in Congress. But it can not be accomplished if they simply talk free silver on the hustings and in Congress and then vote gold-standard tickets. I entertain no shadow of a doubt that if the issue could be presented fairly, without party, race, and sectional prejudices or embarrassments, a decisive majority, both of the popular vote and the electoral college, would be recorded in favor of free silver at 16 to 1; the prosperity of the American people and the perpetuation of American institutions. Congress need not be deceived. The American people are intelligent, they are fairly well educated on this subject, theirs is the education obtained by hard and bitter experience and not that theoretical education that is so repeatedly exemplified on this floor. The farmer understands, what the theorist admits, that the free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 will practically double the price of all staple farm products. They understand this as clearly as it was demonstrated yesterday by the able, eloquent, and very practical speech of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TOWNE] through convincing words and still more convincing charts, explained by a master of the subject. The farmer understands that doubling the price of his products enables him to pay and meet his obligations, and brings him some of the comforts of life, the means to educate his children, and a surplus to lay aside for sickness and old age.

Under these increased prices his farm will be made more beautiful and more productive. These conditions bring more work for the farm laborer and better wages, and necessarily more comfort and happiness to the farm laborers of the land, whose present deplorable conditions cry aloud for relief. The merchants immediately feel the benefit of better prices for farm products; they secure better sales, prompt payment of accounts, and more satisfactory profits. The manufacturer realizes at once, with prosperous merchants and farmers, a decided increased demand for the output of his mills; this necessarily means more constant work for his employees, with better wages and better profits to the capital invested. These results bring confidence to the capital and contentment and happiness to the employees. The prosperous farmer, merchant, and manufacturer increases the bulk of transportation, and producer and laborer have never been known to complain at passenger or freight rates when they were receiving an equitable share of the net result of their own production.

To summarize: If I should divide the country into sections and you admit that free coinage of silver at 16 to 1 doubles the purchasing power of the cotton crop of the South, that under free coinage we will receive in the aggregate three hundred million legal-tender dollars more than we do receive for this crop, it is idle to say that the farmers, merchants, manufacturers, and laborers of the South are practically unanimous for that policy that is certain to secure this result.

If I for a moment contemplate the great West, the granary of the world, and you assure me of a fact that I am convinced is true, that the price of her corn, wheat, and pork are doubled in price, then I need not be told that her laborers, her farmers are, and her merchants and manufacturers, if they study their own conditions, should be, in favor of this measure.

If I again contemplate the great North and East, with their invested capital, great cities, great industries, wealth, and influence, while I am not in a position to suggest to them a wise policy, at the same time I will be pardoned when I remind them that they are surrounded by discontented farmers, by miserable wage earners whose condition demands their consideration; I would also remind them that they are absolutely dependent upon the farmer and the laborers of the country, and their life is necessarily short unless they can vouchsafe prosperity unto those upon whom they are primarily and ultimately dependent.

If you wish, divide the country into cities and farms. In that instance the cities must realize their absolute dependence upon the country. To illustrate, you can throw an impassable wall around every city in this country, and within the short space of time as ninety days bats and owls would frequent and live in marble halls where once reigned human life in the revelry of wine, pleasure, and summary happiness. Your accumulated wealth might be in the shape of marble blocks, in Government bonds, or in the much-coveted metal, gold. All these would be powerless to support and maintain human life if you had no access to the country for food and raiment, while the country would and could live, be happy and prosperous, without the assistance of the cities. I only mention this to illustrate the interest that the cities should feel in the welfare and prosperity of the surrounding country.

If I am called upon to consider the country as a whole, the conclusion is irresistible that the greater purchasing power we can give to our balance of trade the larger that balance will be in our favor, and by the increase of this our solvency, aggregate wealth, and greatness will be recorded by the nations of the world. There is one class, and one class alone, that is benefited by the single gold standard; that class is the creditor class. I ask members to pause before it is too late and recall that there are other classes in the country that are entitled to their legislative consideration. There are the laboring classes, the farming classes, the manufacturing classes, the great middle classes, the property classes, each and all are entitled to your watchful care and consideration, and I protest against sacrificing them all to the merciless creditors. I believe in dealing with them fairly and repaying them exactly under the same conditions in which their debts were contracted, no more and no less, but I do protest against paying them under a standard that requires to pay twice as many hours of labor, twice as many bushels of wheat, corn, pork, and twice as many pounds of cotton and tobacco as it would have taken to pay the debt when it was created, for finally these constitute the hard-earned coin of the people in which they must redeem their obligations.

Edmund Burke, the great English jurist and statesman, said, when commenting upon conditions very much like those that confront us:

> It is to the property of the citizen and not to the demands of the creditor of the State that the original faith of society is pledged. The claim of the citizen is prior in time, paramount in title, superior in equity.

Congress should be ever ready to lend a listening ear to the plaintive wail that descends from the garret, ascends from the cellar in overcrowded cities, and is heard from remote fields of the country, and try to learn the cause of their common suffering. These constitute the grand army of producers of the necessities to maintain and sustain human life, and to model, shape, and fashion them to meet and suit the touch, the eye, the desire, the comforts and pleasure of man and society. Under present conditions this army of producers can only retain such a measure of their own productions that hardly afford them a miserable existence without the comforts necessary to make life endurable, while the traders upon and manipulators of their productions acquire such a proportion as results in their increasing colossal fortunes, that threaten still further encroachments upon the rights of the producers.

Some say I am an alarmist, or rather a calamity howler, and they call attention to the prosperity of the country as evidenced by the domestic subscription to the recent call for bonds. This only illustrates the deplorable condition of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures of the country at large and all of its enterprises that the money of the country can only be called out for Government investments at 3 per cent. This is done because they can find no better investment, as the business interest and enterprise of the people are at a discount, while the taxing power, the last resort of plutocracy and despotism, stands at a premium.

This debate has developed two admissions. One is that free silver at 16 to 1 will practically double prices. The other is that this result is desirable, and that free coinage at 16 to 1 should be adopted if it could be done by international agreement.

The cowards of finance say that we are too weak and not able commercially to accomplish this, which they admit would be to the advantage of every interest in this country and to the entire human race. Had our patriotic ancestors doubted or halted at Pitt, Mecklenburg, or Philadelphia, we would have remained dependencies of England, and yet I say to you that this condition would have been preferable to the condition we occupy to-day in having to submit to such prices as they may name for our muscle, products, and land.

In the evolution of economic thought, in the science of political progress, the time is at hand when the tares should be pulled from the wheat, the sheep divided from the goats, when we should know "under which king, Bezonian," will you serve, which flag will ye follow, the British or the American? Shall we regard you in the future alien or friend?

One course is admittedly independent and American and for the best interest of the entire American people. Then, why hesitate? Why doubt? When shall we grow stronger? Will it be to-morrow or the next day or when the next breeze that sweeps from the East shall bring to our ears the resoundings of clanking chains? I care not what course others may take, as for me, "give me liberty or give me death."

Gentlemen may say, let us have peace; but there can be no peace; there must be war, eternal war, until the wrongs of 1873 and 1893 are righted in the interest of God and humanity.

I have read in Roman history that the march of an entire army was stayed by the presence of a huge serpent, whose very presence poisoned the atmosphere.

Regulus, the Roman commander, halted his columns and dispatched a detachment to destroy this serpent in order that his army might be saved and permitted to proceed on its march.

There is admittedly immediately in our presence the single gold standard, the monopoly of money, and all those words mean in measuring value, and exchanging products and labor, and facilitating trading and commerce. Its presence ever in action, devouring like a blighting breath, poisons the very atmosphere by which we are surrounded, paralyzing every industry, enterprise, and hope of the people. We need a detachment, verily a mighty army of patriots, to destroy this serpent, that the people may be released from their slavery to the gold dollar and this great nation permitted to proceed in its march of progress, invention, and enterprise and fulfill its legitimate mission to work out a marvelous future.

Mr. Speaker, just a few moments in conclusion. It is very evident that you will defeat the Senate substitute, and your purpose is to adhere to the House bond bill to maintain the coin redemption fund. This you have denominated an emergency measure to meet the deficiency in the Treasury. I desire to call attention to the fact that I have introduced a measure (H. R. 4141) for the reduction of all official salaries 33⅓ per cent; that will in a practical manner meet the deficiency. At present it seems the expenses exceed the revenues. The practical way to meet this is to reduce expenses. My bill meets this exigency. In round figures there is expended for Government salaries three hundred millions. A reduction of 33⅓ per cent is a net saving of $100,000,000 per annum, and will bring our expenses within income. This is decidedly more effective and practical than the sale of bonds, which only increases our debt and burden.

By the introduction of this measure I do not desire to pose as a demagogue or a very economical man. The fact is, I do not believe in low or short prices for anything. I am rather a high-price man, believing in reasonable salaries, in high prices for labor and products. Out of this condition, in my opinion, flows more general prosperity, contentment, and happiness. But I do wish to serve notice on the official classes that if the single standard is to continue and remain the policy of this Government, bringing low prices for land, products, and labor, then there is no practical reason why the official classes shall not accept for their services the same scale of prices. If the wheat, corn, cotton, and tobacco growers are compelled to accept gold prices for these staples and the labor necessary to produce them, then the official classes, who are their servants, should be content with the same scale of prices. "A word to the wise is sufficient." The people who employ and have to pay official salaries are thinking and moving along this line.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, to-day I desire to raise my voice in behalf of the toilers of America against those men and measures which are robbing the many and bestowing the booty upon a favored few.

Knowing that I will be subjected to ridicule, vituperation, and anathema by those who are under the hypnotic influence of the favored few, I yet deem it my duty to exercise the right of an American citizen and speak for the great masses of the common people who to-day groan beneath a weary load of poverty and oppression, and yet whose appeals for relief are answered by silent contempt and covert sneers.

Sir, I have heard much on this floor about the interests of the bankers, the manufacturers, the business men, but scarcely one word in behalf of the laboring men of this country; not a single measure for the relief those who make it possible for the bankers, the manufacturers, and the business men to prosper and grow rich; no one to speak for those who toil in the fields, the mines, the mills; for those who produce all the wealth, and who must ultimately pay every cent of the bonded indebtedness which is now being saddled upon the American people.

I appeal to-day for justice for those who sow that others may reap, for those who toil in poverty, hunger, and rags that the American plutocracy may revel in wealth and luxury beyond the dreams of avarice. For my utterances to-day no party is responsible. I have consulted only my conscience and my God. If these approve my course the whole world may frown. I want to go on record, Mr. Speaker, as protesting in the name of the common people of the United States against the bartering away of their liberties to a few greedy, grasping gold gamblers. In their names, and the names of their children, and in behalf of generations yet unborn, I protest against this. I denounce those men who would make of our children hewers of wood and drawers of water as traitors to the American people.

What can I say of the man who sits in the Presidential chair? What words in the English language are strong enough to be used in dealing with the "lone fisherman of the White House," the Izaak Walton of modern Democracy, the man who in his political angling catches only suckers and mulletheads, and in his gunning expedition makes ducks and drakes of his own party, the base pretender who claims to wear the mantle of Andrew Jackson? He has accomplished only two great feats; one was to destroy the Democratic party, and this can be more readily forgiven, perhaps, than anything else he could have done, and the other is the unpardonable crime of wrecking his country financially, placing the Treasury at the mercy of Wall street gamblers, and fastening on the people a bonded indebtedness, principal and interest, of $497,000,000.

Mr. Speaker, I have often gazed enraptured upon this magnificent Capitol; I have admired its beauty, its splendor, when it was bathed in the golden rays of the setting sun; I have seen thousands of visitors look with awe and reverence upon this historic structure. But hardly one, amid all the countless thousands who have come here to learn of our national greatness, ever stopped to think of the vast granite bowlders way down in the earth, where the sun never shines, upon which this splendid pile rests. These foundation stones may not appeal to the æsthetic tastes; they may be crude and rough; but they have been tested. They are true and tried and faultless and flawless. They uphold and support all this greatness and beauty. If ever by any process they should be destroyed, then all the beauty, the symmetry, the splendor above would plunge to utter chaos and ruin.

We have also erected another structure, Mr. Speaker, and it, too, has its foundations, its bed rocks, and its chief corner stones. I refer to this great Republic of ours. How we admire it! How we praise it! How proudly we point to the Stars and Stripes! With what pleasure we discuss our magnificent cities, our railroads. How we delight to listen to the whistle of the locomotive, the whir of machinery, the music of the spindles. But ah! Mr. Speaker, what about the foundation stones? Is this structure founded upon a rock or upon the shifting sands? If the foundation fails our Republic will be destroyed.

The trouble with us is that we have forgotten the foundation; we have been decorating and adorning the superstructure; we have been legislating, if you please, to build up and strengthen the few, who sit in splendor upon the dome of this structure, at the expense of those below, the toilers of the country. We have made their burdens so great that they can not longer bear them, and already the foundation is failing, and I see grievous fissures in the edifice. I shall attempt briefly to show that the evils of our financial system are such as to destroy the farmers and the laborers, and that you can not destroy these without at the same time destroying the manufacturers, the railroads, the merchants, lawyers, and doctors, any more than you could dig away the foundation stones of this Capitol without causing it to collapse, and that the same forces now at work to destroy the farmers will also destroy the other classes already mentioned.

There are four propositions which I desire to lay down, and which I may call "cardinal principles." The first is from Professor Walker, "That prices will fall or rise as the volume of money be increased or diminished is a law that is as unalterable as any law of nature." The second is from Abraham Lincoln, "If a government should contract a debt, with a certain amount of money in circulation, and then contract the volume of money before the debt was paid, it would be the most heinous crime a government could commit against the people." The third is from Mr. Garfield, "Whoever controls the volume of money in any country is absolute master of all industry and commerce." And the last is from Daniel Webster, "Liberty can not long endure in any country where the tendency of legislation is to concentrate wealth in the hands of a few." Ah! Mr. Speaker, how strange these utterances seem in the light of recent financial legislation!

At the close of the war we had almost $60 per capita circulating medium and, as a result, no private indebtedness, no millionaires, no tramps; now we have in actual circulation less than $10 per capita and, as a result, we owe $40,000,000,000 and have 4,000 millionaires and 4,000,000 tramps.

At the close of the war our national debt was $2,827,868,959. On this we have paid a sum which staggers the human mind, which palls the imagination; a sum which can hardly be expressed by arithmetic—the prodigious, the incomprehensible, sum of more than $2,635,000,000—and yet, Mr. Speaker, I assert the solemn truth to-day, when I say that it will take more cotton, more wheat, more flour, more pork, and wool to pay our national debt than it would have taken at the close of the war. In 1866 it would have required to pay the national debt: Of wheat, 1,486,842,105 bushels; of flour, 262,790,697 barrels; of cotton, 5,885,416,666 pounds; of pork, 99,576,313 barrels; of wool, 5,330,188,679 pounds.

At the close of the year 1895 it would have required: Of wheat, 2,133,620,689 bushels; of flour, 358,571,428 barrels; of cotton, 14,558,823,529 pounds; of pork, 150,915,853 barrels; of wool, 5,755,813,953 pounds. In other words, it will take more wheat, by 646,778,584 bushels; more flour, by 90,780,731 barrels; more cotton, by 8,673,406,863 pounds; more pork, by 51,339,540 barrels; more wool, by 425,625,274 pounds.

We have heard a great deal about the reduction of the national debt; but it is all a lie and a fraud. It may have been nominally reduced, but when measured by the price of these five staple commodities it has been increased.

It seems that there has been some devilish machinations of our finances. We have done that which Mr. Lincoln said would be the most heinous crime a government could commit against the people. We contracted a debt with a certain amount of money in circulation, and then commenced to contract the money volume before the debt was paid, until to-day the dollar has a purchasing power three times as great as it had thirty years ago. Do you wonder that the farmer has been growing poorer each year, and that well-nigh all the farms are under mortgage?

Under the benign influence of the gold standard we find that the taxable value of real estate declined from 1893 to 1894 in the South and West $500,000,000. We also find that there has been a steady decline in the prices of farm products, and I allege that this is also properly attributable to the same cause, namely, the contraction of a currency. Our great financiers tell us that it is overproduction, but, Mr. Speaker, we have an overproduction of only two things in this country; one is political knaves to advocate such a doctrine, and the other an overproduction of fools to believe it.

To prove that I am right, let us take the corn crop for 1889, and we find that it was 2,112,892,000 bushels, and the average export price was 47.4 cents per bushel. In 1891 the corn crop was 2,060,154,000 bushels, and the average export price was 57.4 cents per bushel; while in 1894 the corn crop was only 1,212,770,052 bushels, or a little more than half the crop of 1891, yet the price was only 46.7 cents per bushel. In 1891 we raised 611,780,000 bushels of wheat, and the average export price was 93 cents per bushel; but in 1894 we raised only 460,267,416 bushels, yet the export price fell to 67 cents.

But, sir, we are told that we do not export enough of our commodities and that we import too much. That is another fabrication of the financial quacks. In 1894 we exported the largest per cent of our wheat production we have ever exported, and the largest per cent of our corn since 1880, and the largest per cent of our cotton since 1878. In 1894 we consumed 3.41 bushels of wheat per capita, the smallest per capita of wheat consumption ever recorded in this country. The wheat consumption in 1881 was 6.09; in 1883, 6.64; in 1885, 6.67, and in 1890, 6.09. Our consumption of corn per capita in 1894 was 22.76 bushels, the smallest since 1882.

A great deal has been said about the decrease in our exports for 1895 over those of 1894, the Republicans attributing it to the workings of the Wilson tariff law, while Mr. Carlisle says the cause is the improved crop conditions in other countries for the year 1895 over the preceding year, which accounts largely for the diminished exports of domestic produce in 1895. Are these great financiers blind, or would they intentionally deceive and mislead the people? The value of our exports in 1894 was $869,204,937, while in 1895 the value was $793,392,399 (that is, for the fiscal years ending, respectively, June 30, 1894, and June 30, 1895), a falling off in value of $75,000,000. But the decrease was not in the quantity of our exports of domestic produce, for there was an increase in quantity but a decrease in price, owing to the ruinous depreciation in the gold value of all property.

The total value of our ten principal agricultural exports—cotton, wheat, flour, corn, bacon and hams, lard, pork, beef, tobacco, and cheese—was $510,012,686 in 1894 and $452,719,941 in 1895, a decrease in the value of these exports of $57,292,745, or 11.2 per cent; but this decrease was not due to diminished exports, but solely to the fall in prices. If we had obtained for the quantity of all ten commodities exported in 1895 the average export price of 1894, the value of these exports would have been $552,486,345 instead of $452,719,941, and instead of a falling off in exports of $57,292,745 there would have been an increase of $42,473,659. In other words, because of the lower prices ruling in 1895 than in 1894 we received $99,766,404 less on our exports of these ten commodities than we otherwise would have done. The quantity of these ten agricultural products exported increased 8½ per cent, while the total value decreased 11.2 per cent.

Let us take the fall in prices of cotton, wheat, and wool (three of the principal farm products) for a period of twenty-five years, commencing with 1870. We will divide these twenty-five years into five periods of five years each, and will take the average price for the first period, that is, for the five years covering the periods from 1870 to 1875, and we find that for the twenty years from 1875 to 1895 the farmers lost, by reason of a decline in price of cotton, $5,179,000,000, and for the same period and from the same cause they lost in the value of their wheat $2,589,000,000 and in the value of their wool $950,000,000. Divided into periods, we find the loss in the second period (that is, from 1875 to 1880) to have been on the three combined products $208,000,000 per year, $374,000,000 a year for the third period, $501,000,000 a year for the fourth period, and $660,000,000 a year for the fifth period.

Here we have a total loss to the farmers in twenty years of the stupendous sum of $8,817,000,000, or more than $1,500 for each farmer in the United States.

Sir, the people's homes are under mortgage, and, with constantly falling prices, they are helpless, hopeless. Unless something is done to avert the calamity they will soon be reduced to serfdom.

It is the old story we learned in history when schoolboys.

We know how Rome had her $2,000,000,000 in brass and copper money, and with this large circulating medium she was queen of the world. Then the damnable system of contraction began, and was continued until there was only $200,000,000 in circulation, and Rome fell. Near the close of the last century England was engaged in a bloody struggle with France. Her exchequer was empty. Her army, unpaid, was mutinous. In her dire extremity she issued a large volume of irredeemable paper money, and a war commenced amid a combination of circumstances gloomy and calamitous terminated in a blaze of glory, and England became mistress of the seas and planted her standard all around the globe. During this most wonderful era of prosperity over 3,000,000 acres of unimproved land were brought under cultivation, and the landowners of the nation increased over 160,000 in number. But here the cupidity of Shylock began to show itself, and England commenced to contract the volume of her currency. Now want and famine stalked abroad in the land, and the number of landowners was reduced to 30,000 by 1861, and to-day half the kingdom is owned by a dozen men.

We, too, have had a like experience. At the close of the war Shylock appeared on the scene, grasping, greedy, hungry, demanding his pound of flesh. We began to destroy the money and contract the volume. The consequences I have already portrayed as they affect the farmers. Let us see how it has been with the business men. In 1866 there were only 500 business failures, in 1867 the number rose to 2,386. In 1868 there was withdrawn from circulation and destroyed $473,000,000, and there were 2,608 failures.

In 1869 there was taken from circulation and destroyed $500,000,000, and the result was 2,799 failures; and so it went on year after year, the people's money being destroyed and failures increasing, until, in 1893, the number rose to 16,650. In 1894 there were 12,721 failures, with $149,595,434 liabilities, while in 1895 there were 13,013 failures, with liabilities of $158,842,445, an increase in the number of failures of 292 and in liabilities of $9,247,011.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, this work of death and devastation is now going higher up! The farmers have suffered in silence, or, if there have been groans, tears, and remonstrances, they have been unheeded. Now the merchants and manufacturers begin to cry aloud. In 1894 the total liabilities of manufacturers who failed was $67,363,775, while in 1895 the liabilities were $73,920,073, an increase of $6,556,298.

Even the railroads are beginning to feel the blighting curse, their gross earnings having decreased from 1893 to 1894 the sum of $142,331,275. Well may there be consternation among the manufacturers, for another foe now confronts them—the almost pauper labor of Japan and China. Add to the difference in cost of production the difference in exchange, by reason of these countries being on a silver basis, and there is a monster, Mr. Speaker, which will swallow up into his capacious maw not only the farmers and laborers of this country, but also the manufacturers of the East, and when New England has been devastated and laid waste, her wheels rusting, her mills falling to decay, and her cities depopulated, he will lick his chops and cry for more, more.

One other symptom, and the most alarming one, and then I will have finished. And here, let me say that the road over which we are traveling is so broad, the way so clear, and has been so often traveled before that a wayfaring man, though a fool, can not be mistaken as to whither we are tending. I refer to the rapid concentration of the wealth of the country in the hands of a few. One per cent of the population owns one-half of our wealth, while 250,000 persons own more than 80 per cent of it. Within thirty years 50,000 persons will own, substantially, the United States of America. The world has never before witnessed such a rapid concentration of wealth in a few hands as we have seen in this country in the last twenty-five years.

Daniel Webster well said that liberty can not long endure where these conditions are found to exist. Such is the testimony of the wisest of mankind through all the ages. Such is the lesson of history emphasized in the downfall of Egypt when 2 per cent of its people owned 97 per cent of its wealth; of Persia when 1 per cent owned all the land; of Babylon when 2 per cent owned all the wealth; of Greece and Rome when 1,800 persons owned the then known world.

It was startlingly emphasized in the sack of Constantinople, in the decay of Spain's magnificent Empire, and in the lurid fires of the French Revolution.

Will history repeat itself?

How will you remedy this concentration? How can you reconcile a nation of paupers to toil in the shadow of splendor and magnificence to support the idle, worthless few? How are you going to answer these questions, which are being put vehemently, wildly, fiercely? They must be answered. They demand an answer in thunder tones, and woe be to this nation if it does not answer them.

The Sphinx destroyed every one who could not or would not answer her question. History has done the same with every nation which did not answer these questions.

I have tried to state fairly and impartially the conditions in this country and to show the causes which have produced them, and I tell you to-day, gentlemen, that you may pile on the protection mountain high to build up the manufacturing interests, but unless you also increase the volume of money, so the farmers and laborers can buy the manufactured products, you are doing a useless and silly thing. I am in favor of protection, but it is cruel, shameful, and outrageous to protect the goods of the manufacturer, so that he can maintain good prices, and then deprive the farmer of fair prices by depriving him of a sufficiently large circulating medium, so that his wheat, his corn, his cotton, wool, and other products must be sold for half price.

Do gentlemen suppose that the farmers can be thus cruelly wronged and robbed and the other classes continue to prosper? I tell you nay. I tell you that the trail of the serpent is over all classes, and if this wicked programme be kept up the final act in the terrible drama will be the utter collapse and overthrow of this structure which we have erected. If you destroy the foundation, as you have been doing for years with fiendish persistence, the whole structure will dissolve like the baseless fabric of a beautiful dream.

Give us more money by the free coinage of silver, issue a billion dollars of full legal-tender, irredeemable Treasury notes, destroy the national banks, pay off the bonded indebtedness, and then you will have the most prosperous nation the world ever saw.

The crisis is upon us, and we must meet it. We must act, and by our acts decide for the weal or woe of this nation.

Mr. Speaker—

> There is a tide in the affairs of men,
> Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;
> Omitted, all the voyage of their life
> Is bound in shallows and in miseries.

That tide has come in the history of this country. The tide of protest, of popular indignation against the unlawful encroachments of the money power. The murmurs have grown to curses, mingled with the prayers of starving women and wails of helpless children. The masses of the country are like a great, troubled, restless, heaving ocean. The tide rises higher, the breakers roar, the thunders of popular clamor are almost deafening. Do you not hear? Ah! can you not see? Wake up from your long sleep and stay the swiftly onrushing tide by just and wholesome laws ere it be too late.

Mr. WOODMAN said:

Mr. SPEAKER: When a man becomes wedded to an idea his usefulness as a statesman is gone. He is then a "specialist," with his whole mind, his whole energy, his whole ability directed in one channel, to the exclusion of other interests which are equally deserving of his attention.

If his specialty happens to be a popular one, and if he has studied it closely enough to be well posted, his praises are rung from one end of the Republic to the other and the newspapers speak of him as a great man. If his position, however tenable it may be, chances to be an unpopular one, he is denounced as a demagogue, generally by those who lack the intelligence and the specific information to comprehend his ideas.

Several things are noticeable, Mr. Speaker, in the discussion which has been going on on this subject for some days. One is reminded of the distinguished statesman who, some years ago, confidently expressed the fact that he knew all about finance, having devoted three hours of the previous evening to a careful examination of the entire subject.

The "silver question," so called, according to my understanding, is at present simply a renewal of the old greenback idea—that of stamping something with the United States coat of arms and calling it money. Early in the war I shipped from San Francisco to Liverpool at a salary of $50 a month. Arriving, I received my pay and went up into Great Howard street to buy exchange. My salary was paid in greenbacks carrying the signature of that great statesman, Salmon P. Chase, and I was obliged to exchange $3 of them for $1 of gold. That trifling experience satisfied me of the futility of attempting to legislate nothing into money, and, while silver is not "nothing," it is equivalent, in the present sense, to half of it.

On the other hand, there are many facts to be taken into consideration. It will not do to forget that great banking syndicates have their clutches on the throats of the American people by virtue of the fact that their influence—hypnotic or otherwise—is sufficiently strong to enable them to largely control the action of the Executive. The Treasury Department insists on paying out gold on demand, and yet takes no steps to replenish the supply of the precious metal thus diminished. While it pays its obligations in gold, it receives its dues in any kind of money at the pleasure of the payer.

On the 1st day of February, according to the Treasurer's statement, there was in the Treasury of the United States about $50,000,000 in gold, $22,000,000 of silver, and $72,000,000 in United States notes—about $144,000,000 in all, not counting bank notes, fractional coin, etc.

One-half of this is paper currency. Of the coin, two-sevenths, in round numbers, is silver and five-sevenths is gold. If the Administration is committed to gold, why does it not require that a relative proportion of gold be paid to it in the duties on imports and in the amounts received by the payments on articles subject to revenue, and thus provide an equilibrium on which receipts and disbursements, which should be made in like proportions, may be based?

In other words, why should the Treasury of the United States be made the plaything of money changers? Why should a few European countries, while apparently keeping their currency at par (though through their secret agents paying a premium for it, in order to enlarge their store), continually force this country into repeated issues of interest-bearing obligations? The impression has been created over the civilized world that this country is bankrupt as to its cash, but on account of its wonderful resources its credit is good; that it has been driven to the sharks, the same as an English lordling with entailed expectations, but short of cash, to obtain the means to keep up his establishment.

Apropos, a story. When Napoleon was planning his great Russian campaign, studying maps, and plats, and forces, and channels of supplies, late into the night, he observed that his private secretary was busy and evidently worried over some private matters and papers. Finally the secretary fell asleep, and the Emperor, glancing over his shoulder as he sat with his head on his desk, slumbering, saw that the papers were duns from money brokers. Napoleon shook him by the shoulders and awoke him, saying, "You have been among the English," and the secretary confessed that, driven to desperation by his private troubles, he had patronized the money lenders, and that their usurious and other exactions and their importunities for payment had nearly driven him crazy. Napoleon replied that he would at once raise his salary till he could be rid of the English money lenders, pay his debts, and then warned him that if he ever borrowed money again to secure it from gentlemen.

Mr. Speaker, that is the situation. We have borrowed money from the English till they are impressed with the idea that they run the finances of this country. Under this Administration they have evidently been doing so. But it only means that we are short of money. Raise enough revenue to pay them off, put intelligence instead of modiocrity in charge of the finances of this great Republic, make our income greater than our outgo, and we will have no difficulty with our gold reserve. The free coinage of silver has little to do with the matter. American silver might be coined; the greenbacks and Treasury notes might be retired. If done in equal amounts, no harm would be done and no contraction of currency result. If the Government should buy silver, coin it, and call in the five hundred millions of greenbacks and Treasury notes complained of by the President—pay for them in silver—no special evil would result except from the fact that the people would pay for the money one and a half times its value. They would pay its full value to get it, and pay one-half its value in addition in their contribution to the revenues which would enable the Treasury Department to secure it.

Money is a most remarkable thing. Were we an isolated nation, having no relations with foreign countries, the greenbacks or Treasury notes would be the proper medium of exchange. But we are not. Our immense imports and exports compel a recognition of the fact that our medium of exchange must be the same as that of the commercial nations of the civilized world. Gold is the only metal which has succeeded in maintaining that position. It may not be just, it may not be right, in theory, but we are dealing with facts, not theories, and this is the fact.

It is the duty of Congress to legislate not for a few capitalists, not for a few mine owners, but with an eye single to the best good of the greatest number of the people of the country.

The Speaker having resumed the chair,

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly (at 11 o'clock and 58 minutes a. m.) adjourned until 12 o'clock m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 10, 1896.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. The Chaplain, Rev. H. M. COUDEN, offered the following prayer:

Give ear, O God, we beseech Thee, and hear our prayer. As thus in the midst of routine duties we pause, help us to consecrate our lives anew to Thee, that the work of this day may be acceptable in Thy sight.

We hear with profound sorrow of the death of one member of this House. Our hearts, our sympathies, go out to those who mourn his loss; and we pray Thee that Thou wilt comfort them as Thou alone can do. Help us all to be ready when the summons may come to us. In Christ's name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DINGLEY. Mr. Speaker, in view of the sad event which has been brought to my notice since I came into the Hall, and also in view of the desire of some members to have a little further time for general debate on House bill 2904 than has already been ordered by the House, and in view of the further fact that to-day, under the rules, would belong to the Committee on the District of Columbia for District business, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow from the reading of the Journal until 5 o'clock, if such time may be desired by the Committee on the District of Columbia, be devoted to the consideration of business reported by that committee; that from 5 o'clock to-morrow afternoon during the remainder of the legislative day of Tuesday and also during the legislative day of Wednesday general debate on House bill 2904 continue in Committee of the Whole, to close at the termination of the legislative day of Wednesday; that on Thursday at noon the House in Committee of the Whole proceed to consider for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule the bill with the Senate substitute; and that at 4 o'clock on Thursday afternoon the House in Committee of the Whole proceed to vote on the question of recommending concurrence or nonconcurrence, without intervening motion and without further debate, and that the bill as it may have been disposed of by the Committee of the Whole be reported to the House.

Mr. HARTMAN. Does that cut off amendments?

Mr. DINGLEY. This proposition allows from Thursday noon until 4 o'clock on that day for offering and voting upon such amendments as may be in order.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman from Maine, if I understood him correctly, used a term which he did not intend to use. He spoke of the Committee of the Whole voting on Thursday next upon the question of concurrence.

Mr. DINGLEY. I meant that in Committee of the Whole we should proceed to dispose of the bill.

Mr. CRISP. And I presume if the District Committee should get through with their business to-morrow before 5 o'clock we should at once go on with this bill.

Mr. DINGLEY. Yes, sir; that is my understanding.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asks unanimous consent that to-morrow from the reading of the Journal until 5 o'clock, or so much of that time as may be necessary, be devoted to business from the Committee on the District of Columbia; that the rest of the legislative day be devoted to general debate upon House bill No. 2904, known as the bond bill; that the general debate continue until the close of the session on Wednesday——

Mr. DINGLEY. The legislative day of Wednesday.

The SPEAKER. Until the close of the legislative day of Wednesday; that Thursday, from 12 o'clock until 4 o'clock, be devoted to debate and amendment under the five-minute rule, the final vote to be taken at 4 o'clock.

Mr. DINGLEY. On the question of concurrence or nonconcurrence.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WILLIS. I do not want to interpose formal objection if this proposition expresses the mind of the House; but it occurs to me that the reporting of the bill to the House had better be postponed until Saturday, the debate continuing until 4 o'clock of that day.

Many MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. DINGLEY. I suggest to the gentleman that Saturday is a bad day for taking the vote, so many members are then away.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition as stated? The Chair hears none.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution (S. R. 72) directing the Public Printer to supply the Senate and House libraries each with 20 additional copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

DEATH OF HON. W. H. CRAIN.

Mr. SAYERS. Mr. Speaker, it becomes my sad duty to announce to the House the death of one of its members, WILLIAM H. CRAIN, a Representative from Texas. I shall not detain the House further at this time than to say that I shall ask the House at some future day to pause in its deliberations in order to pay tribute to the memory of the deceased. For the present I shall content myself with asking the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. W. H. CRAIN, late a Representative from the State of Texas.

Resolved, That a committee of nine members of the House be appointed by the Speaker, to act with such Senators as may be selected, to attend the funeral of the deceased; that the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House shall take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased at his home, and that the necessary expenses attending the execution of this order shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That as a mark of respect to his memory the House do now adjourn.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. SAYERS. I ask the adoption of the resolutions just read.

The resolutions were adopted; and the Speaker announced the appointment of the following-named members as the committee on the part of the House, under the resolution:

Mr. PENDLETON, Mr. CROWLEY, Mr. KYLE, Mr. MCDEARMON, Mr. MILES, Mr. MILNES, Mr. LEONARD, Mr. EDDY, and Mr. MURPHY of Illinois.

And then, in accordance with the resolutions, the House (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination and survey of Oconto Harbor, Wis.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting certain recommendations and communications relating to the purchase of certain land adjacent to the military reservation of Key West Barracks, Fla.—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Hon. S. Wike, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting report of the Supervising Inspector-General and report of Board of Supervising Inspectors, in response to House resolution of January 21, 1896, relating to the safety of the public in ocean travel—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Commissioner of Fish and Fisheries, replying to the House resolution of February 4 relating to the efficiency of employees—to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BILLS, MEMORIALS, AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. PHILLIPS (by request): A bill: (H. R. 5815) to provide for the better manning and equipment of vessels on the Northwestern Lakes—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. BURTON of Ohio: A bill (H. R. 5816) providing for gas buoys on the Great Lakes—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. MERCER: A bill (H. R. 5817) to provide for the observance of the 4th day of July as a national holiday—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. BABCOCK: A resolution (House Res. No. 162) authorizing the Doorkeeper to employ 15 additional folders—to the Committee on Accounts.

PRIVATE BILLS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills of the following titles were presented and referred as follows:

By Mr. BERRY: A bill (H. R. 5791) for the benefit of James W. Hall, of Grant County, Ky.—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 5792) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Julia A. Jameson—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EVANS: A bill (H. R. 5793) granting a pension to Mary L. Tweddle—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. FLYNN (by request): A bill (H. R. 5794) to pay Joel L. Baugh for services rendered to the Old Settler Cherokee Indians—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. HULICK: A bill (H. R. 5795) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Jacob Segondollar—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LEIGHTY: A bill (H. R. 5796) for the relief of Eli Rinehart, of Angola, Steuben County, Ind.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5797) to pension Ellen D. Merrell, of Fort Wayne, Ind.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5798) granting a pension to Mary M. Hyer, of Allen County, Ind.—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5799) to correct the military record of William Frederick—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MILLER of West Virginia: A bill (H. R. 5800) to pension Elizabeth Short—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5801) to pension John Parsons—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5802) to pension Michael M. Peters—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. MILNES: A bill (H. R. 5803) to quiet the title of certain lands in the State of Mississippi, and for the relief of Eli Ayres or his legal representatives, etc.—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5804) for the relief of Henry S. Hunter—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. MCCALL of Tennessee: A bill (H. R. 5805) to pension Eliza Ann Bridges—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NOONAN: A bill (H. R. 5806) for the relief of Adams & Wickes—to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. OVERSTREET: A bill (H. R. 5807) to pension Solomon F. Hines—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. OWENS: A bill (H. R. 5808) for the relief of Leo L. Johnson—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. REYBURN: A bill (H. R. 5809) to correct the military record of John L. Keys—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5810) to place the name of Sarah G. Almy, widow of Rear-Admiral John J. Almy, upon the pension roll—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. TRACEY: A bill (H. R. 5811) to correct the service record of James Marley—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5812) to increase the pension of Richard Marsh—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 5813) granting a pension to Abner Welch—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, the following petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

By Mr. BLACK of New York: Petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Claverack, Hudson, Philmont, West Sand Lake, Wynantskill, and the counties of Columbia and Rensselaer, State of New York, in relation to the sale of intoxicants at Bedloes Island and Fort Wadsworth—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Claverack, Hudson, Philmont, West Sand Lake, Wynantskill, and the counties of Columbia and Rensselaer, N. Y., to forbid the sale of intoxicants at Ellis Island, N. Y.—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. BULL (by request): Petition of S. A. Steward, for an investigation of the courts of Oklahoma Territory—to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. CRUMP: Resolution passed at a mass meeting of citizens of West Bay City, Mich., praying that the Government use upon the Christian powers of Europe all possible influence to end the Turkish atrocities—to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, resolution of the Shipmasters' Association of Bay City, Mich., objecting to the passage of House bill No. 4331—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. FLETCHER: Petition of F. H. Smith and 32 others, together with W. H. C. Henry and 72 others, of Minneapolis, Minn., urging the passage of the Stone bill restricting immigration—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. FLYNN: Petition of 1,000 inhabitants of Oklahoma Territory, urging the passage of the free-home bill—to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Also, petition of 500 taxpayers in Lincoln County, Okla., praying for the passage of the St. Louis and Oklahoma City Railroad bill—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. GRISWOLD: Petition of R. A. Stratton, W. H. Abbott, A. M. Shartle, and others, of Conneaut Lake and Stony Point, Pa., urging a change in the immigration laws, and approving the Stone immigration bill—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. HAINER of Nebraska: Petition of Daniel Dyer and many other citizens of Hebron, Nebr., praying for a service pension to honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors of at least $8 per month—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. HOOKER: Petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Belfast, Fredonia, Little Valley, and Napoli, N. Y., asking for the prohibition of the sale of beer at Bedloes Island and Fort Wadsworth, on Staten Island, New York—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Belfast, Fredonia, Little Valley, and Napoli, N. Y., asking that the sale of beer and spirituous liquors at Ellis Island be forbidden—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. HULING: Petition of various citizens of Kanawha County, W. Va., protesting against the appropriation of the public money for the use of religious sects—to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. JOHNSON of California: Petition of 247 citizens of California, requesting the passage of House bill No. 2626, for the protection of agricultural staples by an export bounty—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. KIEFER: Petition of Thomas B. Maloney and others, of St. Paul, Minn., favoring the restriction of immigration—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. LAYTON: Resolution of the American Medical Association, urging Congress to inaugurate such legislation as will confer upon the officers of the Medical Corps of the Navy the same status, pay, and emoluments as are now accorded to the medical officers of the Army—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

Also, resolution of the Paint, Oil, and Varnish Club of New York City, asking for the passage of a general, practicable bankrupt law—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. LEFEVER: Petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Unionvale, N. Y., against the sale of beer at Ellis Island—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Unionvale, N. Y., against the sale of beer at Bedloes Island and Fort Wadsworth—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. LEIGHTY: Petition of ex-soldiers and citizens of Albion, Ind., urging the passage of the service-pension bill granting $8 per month to every honorably discharged Union soldier—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. McCALL of Massachusetts: Resolutions of the First Baptist Church of Winchester, Mass., against the continuance of the appropriations for sectarian Indian schools—to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. OTJEN: Protest of the Shipmasters' Association, No. 6, of Milwaukee, Wis., against bridging the Detroit River—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. REYBURN: Petition of Harry H. Moore and others, of Philadelphia, Pa., favoring the restriction of immigration—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. RUSSELL of Connecticut: Resolutions of North Stonington (Conn.) Grange, in favor of legislation to regulate the manufacture and sale of "filled cheese"—to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. SHERMAN: Petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Camden and Norway, N. Y., in relation to the sale of intoxicants at Ellis Island—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

Also, petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of Camden and Norway, N. Y., against the sale of intoxicants at Bedloes Island and Fort Wadsworth—to the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic.

By Mr. SOUTHARD: Petition of the Toledo (Ohio) Post-Office Clerks' Association, in behalf of House bill No. 3273—to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. STAHLE: Resolutions of Post No. 2, Grand Army of the Republic, of Philadelphia, Pa., in favor of the passage of House bill No. 306, for the relief of Union soldiers confined in rebel prisons during the late war—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, resolutions of Shinar Commandery, No. 143, Knights of Malta, of Delta, Pa., denouncing the outrages in Armenia, favoring belligerent rights for Cuba, and favoring the passage of the Stone immigration bill—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

By Mr. THOMAS: Petition of Bishop E. Curtis, Calvin Griffin, William Hall, and 30 other citizens of Cass County, Mich., asking for the passage of a bill granting a pension of $8 per month to every man who served not less than ninety days in the Army or Navy during the war of the rebellion and was honorably discharged, and that the widows of said soldiers shall be pensioned at $12 per month—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of H. E. Squier, M. O. Rowland, B. F. Heckert, T. M. Harvey, and 150 other citizens of Van Buren County, Mich., asking for the passage of House bill No. 1111, for the relief of William E. Keene—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. TRACEY: Papers to accompany a bill to correct the service record of James Marley—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Also, papers to accompany a bill to increase the pension of Richard Marsh—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers to accompany a bill granting a pension to Abner Welch—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of ex-soldiers and sailors residing at Ash Grove, Mo., for service pension—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, papers concerning the Soldiers' Home at Leavenworth, Kans.—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WARNER: Petition of ex soldiers and sailors of the Union Army and Navy during the war of the rebellion, now residing in Piatt County, Ill.; also members of McPherson Post, No. 79, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Illinois, favoring the passage of a law granting a pension of $8 per month to every man who served not less than ninety days in the Army or Navy of the United States during the war of the rebellion and was honorably discharged, and a pension of not less than $12 per month to the widows of such as have died—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, petition of citizens of McLean County, Ill., urging that an act designed to secure a better grade of immigration, introduced by Hon. WILLIAM A. STONE, be passed—to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 11, 1896.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, of the 10th instant, submitting an estimate of deficiency in the appropriation for printing and binding for the Navy Department, to be executed under the direction of the Public Printer, for the current fiscal year, $25,000, and requesting that it be included in the urgent deficiency appropriation bill; which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior in response to a resolution of January 23, 1896, calling for information as to the ways in which the existing laws are violated, the extent of such violations, the defects, if any, in the existing laws which enable such violations to occur, and suggesting such changes in the laws now in force as will enable the United States to regulate or prohibit the importation, manufacture, or sale of intoxicating liquors in the Territory of Alaska, transmitting the report of the governor of Alaska for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1895, upon the subject; which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWELL presented the petition of Mrs. Browne, president, and Mrs. M. R. Ellis, secretary, of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of New Jersey; a petition of the officers of the Central Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Camden, N. J., and a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Ocean Grove, N. J., praying for the passage of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Manufacturers' Club of Philadelphia, Pa., praying that liberal appropriations be made for the protection of the seacoast cities of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Coast Defenses.

He also presented the petition of Mark Orr and 16 other citizens of Dividing Creek, N. J., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. DAVIS presented a petition, in the form of resolutions adopted by Appomattox Post, No. 72, Department of Minnesota, Grand Army of the Republic, of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the passage of House bill No. 306, granting pensions to soldiers and sailors confined in so-called Confederate prisons; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of Minneapolis, Minn., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. GORMAN presented a petition of the president and faculty of the Maryland Agricultural and Mechanical College, praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 735, to reorganize and increase the efficiency of the personnel of the Navy, etc.; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Committee on Philanthropic Labor of the Baltimore (Md.) Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, representing 3,000 persons, praying for the enactment of legislation to abrogate all United States liquor licenses in States, counties, and districts having prohibitory laws against the sale of intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Committee on Philanthropic Labor of the Baltimore (Md.) Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to any Indian who is holding his land in severalty; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Philanthropic Committee of the Baltimore (Md.) Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, and a petition of the Ministerial Union of Baltimore, Md., praying for the enactment of legislation raising the age of consent in the District of Columbia and the Territories from 16 to 18 years, and for the enactment of improved Territorial divorce laws; which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Ministerial Union of Baltimore, Md., praying for the establishment of a labor commission and for the substitution of voluntary arbitration for railway strikes; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Ministerial Union of Baltimore, Md., praying for the enactment of a Sunday-rest law for the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Baltimore, Woodsboro, Leeds, and Childs, all in the State of Maryland, praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. VOORHEES presented a petition of the Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor of the First Christian Church of Marion, Ind., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 239, to prohibit the collection of special liquor taxes from persons other than those who are duly authorized by State laws to traffic in intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Select Committee on Woman Suffrage.

He also presented a petition of sundry watchmen in the Government Departments, ex-soldiers of the late war, praying for the passage of the bill proposing to advance the salaries of Government watchmen; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TELLER presented a petition of sundry ex-soldiers and ex-sailors of the Union Army and Navy, of New Castle, Colo., praying for the enactment of the service-pension law; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GORDON presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Savannah, Ga., praying that an appropriation be made for the continuance of the improvement of the harbor at that city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Savannah Cotton Exchange, of Savannah, Ga., praying for the establishment of a harbor of refuge at some point between the Southern and North Atlantic ports; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of F. M. Lupton, of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the passage of House bill No. 4566, to amend the postal laws relating to second-class mail matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. QUAY presented petitions of A. W. Ward and 39 other citizens of Silver Brook, Pa.; of J. S. Edwards and 87 other citizens of Osceola, Pa., and of T. F. Ayres and 42 other citizens of New Tripoli, Pa., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented the petition of A. W. Ward and 39 other citizens of Silver Brook, Pa., and a petition of sundry citizens of Everett, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting appropriations for institutions under ecclesiastical control; which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McMILLAN presented the petition of Mrs. Maria Galbraith and sundry other citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 239, to prohibit the collection of United States taxes on liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MITCHELL of Oregon presented a petition of sundry citizens of Portland, Oreg., and a petition of sundry citizens of Marion, Oreg., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. SQUIRE presented a petition of sundry citizens of Columbia City, Wash., praying for the passage of the so-called Stone immigration bill; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Dryad, Wash., remonstrating against the appropriation of moneys for sectarian purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

He also presented a petition of the Commercial Club of Vancouver, Wash., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the Columbia River between the city of Vancouver and the mouth of the Willamette River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Seattle, Wash., praying for the passage of Senate bill No. 1242, to improve the merchant-marine engineer service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of King County, Wash., praying that an appropriation be made for the improvement of the Dwamish, White, and Black rivers, in that county; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. PASCO presented the petition of Mrs. S. H. Webb, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Florida, praying that a Sunday-rest law be enacted by Congress for the District of Columbia equal to the most efficient State law on the subject; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PEFFER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 686) to increase the pension of Francis M. Durham, reported adversely thereon, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. MITCHELL of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1323) granting a pension to Maria Somerlat, widow of Valentine Somerlat, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ROACH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1189) granting a pension to Eliza Sandford, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. SHOUP, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1621) granting a pension to Josephine I. Offley, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. BAKER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1128) granting a pension to Isabella Morrow, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WETMORE, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1232) to license billiard tables, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 700) for the relief of John E. Welch, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 3698) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Jane Dulany, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 162) regulating proof of death in certain pension cases, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1924) granting a pension to Carrie L. Yeaton, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1044) granting a pension to Mary Newman, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also (for Mr. BRICE), from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 702) granting a pension to Caroline Stockton Brown, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yesterday an amendment proposed to be offered to the urgent deficiency appropriation bill was submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] and referred to the Committee on Pensions. The Committee on Pensions instruct me to report it back favorably, with a recommendation that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, without printing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be so ordered.

Mr. PALMER. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 552) granting accrued pension to the surviving children of Shubal York, surgeon of Fifty-fourth Illinois Volunteers, a bill which was introduced by my colleague [Mr. CULLOM]—I am not sure that he is present—directed me to report the bill back and recommend its indefinite postponement. I ask the permission of the Senate to make a brief statement.

The bill proposes to give a pension to the two surviving children of Dr. Shubal York, surgeon of the Fifty-fourth Illinois Volunteers, who on the 28th day of March, 1864, was killed in a political riot at Charleston, Ill. An application was made by Mrs. Elizabeth York for a pension, which was refused by the Pension Bureau upon the ground that her husband, although at home on veteran furlough, was not killed in the line of his duty. In April, 1866, an act was passed by Congress giving to Mrs. York a pension of $25 a month and an additional $2 per month for each of her children. That act was approved April 17, 1866. Mrs. York drew that pension until June 5, 1877, the date of her death.

This bill proposes to allow a pension to the two surviving children of Mrs. York, who are now over 30 years of age, for the short period intervening between the 28th of March, 1864, the date of the death of their father, and the date of the passage of the act in favor of the mother, the 17th day of April, 1866. The Committee on Pensions direct me to report the bill back adversely upon the ground that these parties have no claim, and it would be but the mere payment of arrears of pensions. I will state that the bill is accompanied by a written report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be indefinitely postponed, in the absence of objection.

Mr. PALMER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 724) granting an increase of pension to Helen M. Mallery, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 684) granting an increase of pension to Marion McKibben, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CARTER, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1743) to establish an additional land office in the State of Montana, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HAWLEY. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2008) granting a pension to Fanny Moale Gibbon, to report it without amendment. I ask leave to file later a report in this case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Leave will be granted.

Mr. HAWLEY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1784) granting an increase of pension to Josephine Foote Fairfax, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PETTIGREW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 264) providing for the location and purchase of public lands for reservoir sites, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. PLATT, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1380) for the relief of Hyland C. Kirk and others, assignees of Addison C. Fletcher, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MANTLE, from the Select Committee on National Banks, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1804) to authorize the First National Bank of Sprague, Wash., to change its location and name, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

OLD POST-OFFICE BUILDING IN CHARLESTON, S. C.

Mr. VEST. I am instructed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1117) to grant to the city of Charleston, S. C., the old post-office lot and building for the use of the commercial bodies of the city, to report it with an amendment in the form of a substitute.

Mr. TILLMAN. The bill has a favorable report, and I should like to have the unanimous consent of the Senate to put it on its passage.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill and then the substitute reported by the committee.

The Secretary read the bill.

The amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the city of Charleston, S. C., is hereby given the right to occupy, use, and control the real estate in the said city purchased by the United States from said city on February 14, 1818, for the sum of $60,000, the building thereon being known as "The Exchange," and for a more exact description of which real estate reference is made to the deed of conveyance from the city of Charleston to the United States executed on the date aforesaid, and now of record: Provided, That the said property shall be used by said city for municipal purposes and by the public commercial bodies of said city, and if such use shall at any time be discontinued and abandoned, the control and occupation of said property shall be resumed by the United States, and all of the rights hereby granted to the city of Charleston shall cease and be terminated: Provided also, That said property shall be kept in good condition and repair by said city of Charleston during its occupancy thereof, natural and unavoidable decay excepted, and if at any time the United States shall determine to resume control and occupation of said property, the city of Charleston shall, after receiving 60 days' written notice to that effect, relinquish the rights herein granted, and deliver possession of said premises to the proper officials of the United States: Provided also, That the city of Charleston shall during its occupation and control of said premises pay all taxes or other charges thereon, and the United States shall in no event be held responsible in any way for any expense connected with said premises.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERMAN. What is the amount to be paid?

Mr. PLATT. Nothing is to be paid.

Mr. VEST. It was purchased by the United States in 1818 from the city of Charleston for $60,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the city of Charleston refund that sum?

Mr. VEST. The city of Charleston gets nothing except the temporary use of this building. It remains the property of the United States. They simply want to use it for the meeting of the commercial bodies and for municipal purposes.

Mr. SHERMAN. What is it used for now?

Mr. VEST. It has been used for a post-office, but was injured by the earthquake, and is not occupied at all.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I will state——

Mr. QUAY. If the Senator from Ohio will permit me, as chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, I will state that this is an old landmark in the city of Charleston, and that if sold it would be torn down and destroyed. I think it is more as a matter of sentiment than for any other reason that the people of Charleston desire its preservation. The bill merely places the building in the custody of the city of Charleston, as I understand it, until such time as the Government of the United States may desire to resume its occupancy.

Mr. PLATT. As the bill was read I did not hear any provision for the Government to resume its occupancy.

Mr. QUAY. I do not remember the wording of the bill, but that is my understanding.

Mr. VEST. I could not hear what the Senator from Connecticut said.

Mr. PLATT. I say I did not hear any provision read for the Government to resume its occupancy.

Mr. VEST. Yes, there is a provision, direct and emphatic.

Mr. QUAY. That was the understanding of the committee.

Mr. VEST. It provides that if at any time the Government of the United States desires to resume the control it is to give sixty days' notice in writing.

Mr. PLATT. Upon an examination of the amendment I see that is the case.

Mr. VEST. The bill is exceedingly well guarded in every respect.

Mr. HOAR. I think if this building could be presented to the city of Charleston as a memorial or token of the heroism of the people of that city at the time of the earthquake it would be a very excellent thing to do. I think the conduct of that city in the face of that terrible calamity was one of the most gratifying and brilliant examples in all American history.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to grant to the city of Charleston, S. C., the use of certain real estate in said city on which is situated the building known as 'The Exchange.'"

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. PEFFER introduced a bill (S. 2030) to provide for Government control of freight railways; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 2031) to authorize the laying of subways in the streets, roads, avenues, and alleys of the District of Columbia, to provide for placing the present overhead wires therein, and to amend the charters of the Washington Gas Light Company and the Georgetown Gas Light Company; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CLARK introduced a bill (S. 2032) to grant right of way over the public domain for pipe lines; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 2033) granting a pension to Mary M. Hemmenway; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DAVIS introduced a bill (S. 2034) to provide for the distribution of the official edition of the United States circuit courts of appeal reports; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2035) granting a pension to Julia D. Richardson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2036) granting a pension to John Benjamin; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CANNON introduced a bill (S. 2037) to provide times and places for holding terms of United States courts in Utah; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also (by request) introduced a bill (S. 2038) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to pay from the 35 per cent assigned by the Old Settler or Western Cherokees, for certain legal services rendered to them; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. PUGH introduced a bill (S. 2039) to authorize the private use of water power of the Coosa River, in the State of Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2040) giving power to impose oaths and punish contempts and resistance to United States officers; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LINDSAY introduced a bill (S. 2041) for the relief of the estate of Harry I. Todd, deceased, late keeper of the Kentucky penitentiary; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 2042) for the relief of David A. McKnight; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 2043) for the relief of the executrix of the estate of James J. Newell, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. SEWELL introduced a bill (S. 2044) for a light-vessel off Fire Island, New York; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2045) granting a pension to Harriet R. Matlack; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 2046) to prohibit the issuance of bonds or other interest-bearing obligations of the Government by the Secretary of the Treasury, or other officer of the Government, without the authority of Congress; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN introduced a bill (S. 2047) extending the time within which the University of Utah shall occupy lands heretofore granted to it; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2048) to confer additional jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims for property of residents of the United States destroyed by Indians; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Depredations.

Mr. FAULKNER introduced a bill (S. 2049) for the relief of Thomas Stack; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committtee on Naval Affairs.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2050) granting an increase of pension to John S. Hall; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2051) for the relief of E. C. Trimble; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHOUP introduced a bill (S. 2052) to correct an act entitled "An act to pension George Hunter"; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HILL introduced a bill (S. 2053) to provide better facilities for the Federal courts in New York City; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. GORMAN introduced a bill (S. 2054) for the relief of Rinaldo P. Smith, of Baltimore, Md.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. STEWART introduced a bill (S. 2055) granting an increase of pension to Mrs. Christine C. Barnard; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. DANIEL introduced a bill (S. 2056) to provide for deepening the channel from Hampton Roads to the navy-yard near Norfolk, Va., and making an appropriation therefor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2057) to authorize the purchase of certain manuscript papers and correspondence of Thomas Jefferson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2058) to execute the findings of the Court of Claims in the matter of William B. Isaacs & Co.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2059) for the relief of William Bushby; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2060) for the relief of Briscoe B. Bouldin; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VOORHEES introduced a bill (S. 2061) granting a pension to Ruth Prather; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2062) granting a pension to Thomas W. Moody; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORGAN introduced a bill (S. 2063) to grant land to the State of Alabama for the use of the Industrial School for Girls of Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. GEAR introduced a bill (S. 2064) to increase the pension of Emma O. Bacon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 2065) for the relief of John F. Anderson and Cary C. Barr; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. VEST introduced a bill (S. 2066) for the relief of the estate of J. J. Galtney, deceased, late of Yazoo County, Miss.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CANNON introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 75) providing for the disposition of certain property now in the hands of the receiver of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

BONDS OF NEW MEXICO.

Mr. BRICE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 4052) validating certain bonds of the Territory of New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY C. ROSE.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Committee on Pensions be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 366) for the relief of Henry C. Rose, and that the bill be indefinitely postponed. The applicant in the case, Mr. Henry C. Rose, has already been pensioned by the Department.

The motion was agreed to.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That on the 22d day of February current, immediately after the reading of the Journal, Washington's Farewell Address shall be read to the Senate by the President pro tempore.

IMPRISONMENT OF JOHN L. WALLER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States; which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit herewith, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of December 9, 1895, a report from the Secretary of State, accompanied by copies of correspondence and other papers, in regard to the case of John L. Waller, a citizen of the United States, at present in the custody of the French Government.

It will be seen upon examination, as would, of course, be expected, that there is a slight conflict of evidence upon some of the features of Mr. Waller's case. Nevertheless, upon a fair and just consideration of all the facts and circumstances as presented, and especially in view of Mr. Waller's own letters, the conclusions set forth in the report of the Secretary of State do not appear to admit of any reasonable doubt, nor to leave open to the Executive any other course of action than that adopted and acted upon as therein stated.

It is expected that Mr. Waller's release from imprisonment will be immediately forthcoming.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

EXECUTIVE MANSION,
Washington, February 11, 1896.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4145) to amend section 1309, Revised Statutes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 59) extending the provision of section 79 of "An act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents," approved January 12, 1895, so as to include monographs, bulletins, and reports of the Geological Survey published in 1894 and succeeding years.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. 879) to grant to the Gainesville, McAlester and St. Louis Railroad Company a right of way through the Indian Territory;

A bill (H. R. 3009) granting to the Brainerd and Northern Minnesota Railway Company a right of way through the Leech Lake Indian Reservation and Chippewa Indian Reservation, in Minnesota;

A bill (H. R. 3728) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act to divide a portion of the reservation of the Sioux Nation of Indians in Dakota into separate reservations, and to secure the relinquishment of the Indian title to the remainder, and for other purposes," approved March 2, 1889;

A bill (H. R. 4991) to open forest reservations in the State of Colorado for the location of mining claims; and

A joint resolution (H. Res. 79) granting use of White Lot and Monument Grounds to "The Committee of 1896."

THE REVENUE BILL AND SILVER COINAGE.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. QUAY. Let the resolution offered by me in reference to the revenue bill be laid before the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolution of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], coming over from a previous day.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted by Mr. QUAY on the 4th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the bill H. R. 2749, reported by the Committee on Finance with an amendment, be recommitted to that committee for further consideration.

Mr. QUAY. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL], the chairman of the Committee on Finance, yesterday gave notice that he would desire to-morrow to call up the revenue bill for consideration, and as the passage of the resolution to-day would merely embarrass him and delay the bill, I will agree that it shall go over without prejudice to await the pleasure of the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator allow me to call up Senate joint resolution 43?

Mr. HALE. First let me get the appropriation bill up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill the title of which will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the committee amendments as reached in the reading may be voted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HILL. What is the precise request?

Mr. HALE. It is the invariable practice of the Senate and saves one reading of the bill. It proceeds as if it had been read in full, the amendments of the committee being voted upon as they are reached. It saves the time of reading the bill. I have never known it to be objected to.

Mr. HILL. I hope the Senator will not make that request at present, but wait until the bill is absolutely taken up. I wish to examine it for a moment.

Mr. HALE. The bill has been taken up. I will state that in the course of my experience in the Senate I have never known any question raised about the needless reading of the text of a bill.

Mr. HOAR. Of an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. Of an appropriation bill. It is considered clause by clause, as other bills are not.

Mr. ALLISON. Every clause is read.

Mr. HALE. It is read, every clause, as we reach it. There is nothing to be gained as the result of an objection to this course, except that the Secretary rises and reads the entire text of the bill as he would read an ordinary bill that is not considered clause by clause. The Senator can, if he chooses, obstruct to the extent of taking up the time in reading the bill, but it has never been done before by any Senator who served in this body.

Mr. HARRIS. It is merely a waiver of the formal reading.

Mr. HILL. I simply suggested to the Senator, for I assumed he was going to allow the Senator from North Dakota to call up the seed bill, to wait a few moments. I saw other gentlemen rising to present morning business, and I was going to examine the bill, it being laid aside temporarily, that I could see how many amendments there were.

Mr. HALE. The Senator can take such course as he decides upon. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] gave notice yesterday that he would desire, at the conclusion of the morning business to-day, to submit some remarks to the Senate, and the rule is in such cases to grant that by courtesy to a Senator. I yield to him for that purpose. If after that the Senator from North Dakota, who is in charge of the seed bill, can secure a vote without any further debate, I am willing that that shall be done, and then I must ask the Senate to go on and finish the appropriation bill. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BLANCHARD rose.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Will the Senator from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. BLANCHARD. I will yield to ascertain what the Senator desires.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I ask the Senator from Louisiana if he will not kindly yield for a few minutes until a vote can be had upon what is known as the seed joint resolution. I think that an agreement has been reached among those who have participated in the debate which will result in a vote being taken at once, if I can have the time.

Mr. HALE. Not to lead to further debate.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. I understand there is to be no debate.

Mr. BLANCHARD. With the consent of the Senator from Maine, who has yielded to me, I am willing to yield to the Senator from North Dakota, provided there is no further debate upon the joint resolution.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that course.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. The pending question is upon the substitute offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota? The Chair hears none.

PURCHASE AND DISTRIBUTION OF VALUABLE SEEDS, ETC.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (S. R. 43) directing the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the act making appropriations for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds and for the printing and distribution of farmers' bulletins.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to purchase and distribute valuable seeds for the year 1896, as has been done in preceding years; and as the public exigency requires that the valuable seeds, bulbs, trees, shrubs, vines, cuttings, and plants to be purchased may be ready for distribution at the earliest possible date, the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to procure them by open purchase or contract at the places and in the manner in which such articles are usually bought and sold: Provided, That the said Secretary shall not, in said purchase, pay more than a reasonable and fair price for such commodities or for any of them.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GEORGE, the title was amended so as to read: "A joint resolution authorizing and directing the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase and distribute seeds, bulbs, etc., as has been done in preceding years."

THE MONROE DOCTRINE.

Mr. BLANCHARD Mr. President, I ask that the concurrent resolution relating to the assertion and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine, being the resolution reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, may be temporarily laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the concurrent resolution referred to by the Senator from Louisiana, which will be read.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution reported by Mr. DAVIS from the Committee on Foreign Relations January 20, 1896, as follows:

Concurrent resolution relative to the assertion and enforcement of the Monroe doctrine.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That whereas President Monroe, in his message to Congress of December 2, A. D. 1823, deemed it proper to assert as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintained, were thenceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power; and

Whereas President Monroe further declared in that message that the United States would consider any attempt by the Allied Powers of Europe to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety; that with the existing colonies and dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and should not interfere, but that with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have on great consideration and on just principles acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States; and further reiterated in that message that it is impossible that the Allied Powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness; and

Whereas the doctrine and policy so proclaimed by President Monroe have since been repeatedly asserted by the United States by Executive declaration and action upon occasions and exigencies similar to the particular occasion and exigency which caused them to be first announced, and have been ever since their promulgation, and now are, the rightful policy of the United States: Therefore

Be it resolved, That the United States of America reaffirms and confirms the doctrine and principles promulgated by President Monroe in his message of December 2, A. D. 1823, and declares that it will assert and maintain that doctrine and those principles, and will regard any infringement thereof, and particularly any attempt by any European power to take or acquire any new or additional territory on the American continents, or any island adjacent thereto, or any right of sovereignty or dominion in the same in any case or instance as to which the United States shall deem such attempt to be dangerous to its peace or safety by or through force, purchase, cession, occupation, pledge, colonization, protectorate, or by control of the easement in any canal or any other means of transit across the American Isthmus, whether under unfounded pretension of right in cases of alleged boundary disputes or under any other unfounded pretensions, as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States and as an interposition which it would be impossible in any form for the United States to regard with indifference.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. President, in the debate upon our foreign relations had in the Senate during the present session up to this time two speeches have been delivered—one by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. SEWELL], the other by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT]—both of which practically denied the existence of a distinctively American policy known as the Monroe doctrine.

They do not dispute that President Monroe, in his message of December, 1823, outlined a policy which he recommended this Government to pursue in a certain contingency which it was then thought might happen. But they do deny that he laid down a doctrine to be maintained in all the time to come as a distinct national policy.

Whether Mr. Monroe intended to announce a policy to endure for all time or merely one to meet the then emergencies is perhaps immaterial to the present discussion. It is sufficient that public sentiment among our people, both in the past and in the present, held and holds to the idea that the spirit, at least, of his message breathed a national policy which the honor, the dignity, and the safety of this Republic require shall be asserted and maintained.

American statesmen have differed in the past, as they do now, as to whether an enduring national policy was announced by President Monroe. The doctrine found its first advocacy in Congress from the eloquent tongue of Daniel Webster.

In 1853 Mr. Cass, leader of the Democratic party in the Senate, introduced resolutions asserting the Monroe doctrine in respect to Cuba, then, as now, torn by revolution.

Mr. Seward, speaking on the resolutions, said that—

As a practical question the Monroe doctrine had ceased to be.

From this we imply that he thought the policy recommended by Mr. Monroe was intended merely to meet the immediate emergency which drew it forth, to avoid the immediate danger then menacing. But why did Mr. Seward take this position? He gave the reason.

It is obsolete—

He said—

because on this continent we are sovereign.

But he was wrong in the confidence he then expressed, and he lived to see it. Ten years later he was Secretary of State in Mr. Lincoln's Cabinet, when we ourselves were in the throes of revolution. He saw France, taking advantage of our domestic troubles, overrun Mexico with the troops of Napoleon III, and a brother of the Emperor of Austria seated upon the throne of Iturbide.

But a change came about. Our struggles were ended by the restoration of the Union. Relieved from concern over the domestic situation, the United States was free to act. Mr. Seward's opportunity had come. A hint to the Government of France by the American minister accredited to the imperial throne of Napoleon, and a few broad intimations whispered to the French minister here that what had been done in Mexico could not be tolerated by the United States, resulted in the withdrawal of French support, and down went imperialism in Mexico, red with the blood of the ill-fated Maximilian.

Mr. President, I hold, in common with the prevalent American idea upon this subject, that the message of President Monroe should be interpreted as announcing a distinct American policy which was to endure.

I hold, further, that if it did not assert such a doctrine, the greater the reason that an American policy relating to such matters should be now asserted.

At the time of this message the Republic ranked among the minor powers of the world, though enjoying security from its isolation.

Our voice, nevertheless, was heeded. The Holy Alliance desisted from the purpose of assisting Spain in the recovery of her revolted colonies, and the threat to assert the divine right of kings on American soil and to suppress democracy in America was abandoned forever. It has not been heard of since.

The true Monroe doctrine, developed into the new American doctrine, if you will, embodies the following:

No European power will be allowed to establish monarchical government upon the ruins of an American republic.

No European power will be permitted by conquest, cession, treaty, or negotiation to acquire additional territory in America.

Territory, whether on the mainland or in contiguous waters, now held by one European power, can not be transferred to another.

The Monroe doctrine, it is claimed, is not an accepted principle of international law. Neither is the doctrine acquiesced in by all Europe, known as the "balance of power," an accepted principle of international law. Yet if any nation should attempt by conquest or peaceable cession to acquire any territory in Europe not its own, every great power in Europe would fly to arms to prevent it. It would be tantamount to a declaration of war over there.

But when we on this side of the Atlantic invoke the same demand for America, everybody on the other side seems to regard it preposterous. And yet, Mr. President, the American doctrine, first promulgated by Mr. Monroe, is just as well founded and as capable of defense as the other.

Whether the Monroe doctrine was incorporated in resolutions adopted by Congress or not, it was accepted generally by the mass of our people as a virile American policy.

It may be true, and in the abstract doubtless is true, that public policies in this country can not spring into existence by the fiat of the Executive, nor derive shape and potency from a Presidential message. That the creation or adoption of a line of policy belongs more particularly to another branch of the Government is admitted.

But here was a doctrine proclaimed by the Executive for the purpose of warning certain European powers against the attempt to carry into execution certain evil designs meditated against certain American countries. This voice of warning crossed the Atlantic and was heeded. The menace of coercion of the derelict countries ceased. Thus was the doctrine enunciated by the President, even though not vitalized by the proper sanctions of legislative approval, brought to the test of actual application, and it stood the test. Henceforth it did not lie in the mouth of any American statesman to deny the existence of the doctrine.

The historical facts out of which were evolved the declarations of that message have been briefly stated by Senators who have, prior to this, addressed the Senate on the subject. A more comprehensive statement of these facts, however, would, I think, lead to a better understanding of the subject.

The Holy Alliance, which occupied the forefront of European politics for a decade of years, probably had its inception in the secret articles of the treaty of Chaumont, in March, 1814, and its policy was partially developed and defined in the deliberations of the Congress of Vienna and the treaty of Paris after the final downfall of the first Bonaparte.

It is difficult, at this distance of time, to affirm that this league had at the outset any distinct course of action marked out for itself. The Czar Alexander, under the influence of Mme. Krudener, seems at that time to have become the victim of a morbid or romantic superstition by which he erected an ideal confederacy of princes who were to be governed wholly by the precepts and principles of Christianity—as Christianity was understood by them—in all their dealings with each other and with their subjects. His fellow-sovereigns, seizing upon a whim which could be made a potent instrument for the development of absolute kingcraft, readily humored this notion of a modern golden age, and together they entered into a compact by which they bound themselves, with the help of the Holy Trinity, to regulate their governmental practice and their intercourse with each other by the rules inculcated by religion and humanity; to consider themselves, in their control of their respective subjects, in loco parentis; to render to one another, upon occasion, the assistance due to neighbors and brethren; and, in short, to exercise their authority as the heads of Christian families, the government of which was a personal trust confided to them by the grace of the Almighty.

As a matter of course this Utopian scheme, containing, as it did, the essential germ of the doctrine of legitimacy, almost at once matured into a practical and operative line of conduct very different from that contemplated by the dreamy speculations of the great autocrat of the North, and the first outcome of which was the supervision of the then newly reinstated Bourbon régime in France. To this primary function was soon added the more extensive task of a general oversight of things political in the interest of monarchical institutions throughout continental Europe. The national constituents of this alliance were at first the Emperors of Russia and Austria and the King of Prussia, to whom the King of France was afterwards (in 1818) added. England, although never a formal party to this league, does not appear to have disclaimed its political principles as they were originally announced, and it was then understood that the reason of her not being one of the actual contracting parties at some time prior to 1818, arose not so much from any inherent objections to the plan of operations pursued by the alliance as from the technical disability under which the Prince Regent labored to affix his sign manual, along with the other sovereigns, to any political compact, his Government being compelled to act, under the theory of the British constitution, not through the personality of its monarch, but through the medium of a ministry which should at all times be accountable to the nation, at the peril of its political life in case of political misconduct.

This alliance was further developed and strengthened at the Congress of Aix-la-Chapelle in the autumn of 1818, and its purpose was then clearly ascertained to be the reassertion of the doctrines of legitimacy and absolutism in all their rigor, and the strangling of popular or constitutional government whenever and wherever it might appear; although at the same time these allied rulers pledged themselves before the world to "the strictest observance of the law of nations." The good faith of this promise appeared in the declarations of these same sovereigns at the congress held at Troppan, in Silesia, in October, 1820—

That the European powers have an undoubted right to take a hostile attitude in regard to those states in which the overthrow of the government might operate as an example.

The Congress of Troppan was in a few weeks adjourned to Laybach, in Styria. The purpose of the conclaves was the intervention of the allied rulers against the further spread of the revolutionary spirit which had latterly become rampant throughout peninsular Europe. Revolution followed revolution, and in Naples, in Sardinia, and in Spain the constitution of Cadiz of 1812 was successively proclaimed. From the Congress of Laybach emanated a circular letter, under date of May 12, 1821, in which the Holy Alliance took the high-handed step of declaring—

Null and disallowed by the public law of Europe any pretended reform effected by revolt and open force.

In consonance with this declaration, and in obedience to the behests of the allied sovereigns, Austria at once dispatched an army to the Italian peninsula, crushed the revolutionary movements there with an iron hand, and delivered the people over to their absolutist rulers. The political situation in continental Europe still remaining exceedingly strained, and its tension being in no wise relaxed by the efforts of the Holy Alliance to reestablish purely despotic governments, the sovereigns composing that league deemed the occasion fitting for a new conference, and the result was the Congress of Verona, which assembled in October, 1822. The proximate cause of this meeting was the affairs of Spain, where Ferdinand VII was still hampered in his divine right of reigning by the beneficent operation of the constitution of Cadiz and the constitutional Cortes, to which, however, he had given his kingly word of assent; and these affairs received the early attention of the congress. As a text to justify their contemplated armed intervention to put down constitutional government in the Iberian peninsula, the allied sovereigns at the Verona Congress fulminated another circular letter, under date of November 5, 1822, in which they distinctly affirmed their purpose "to repel the maxim of rebellion in whatever place or under whatever form it might show itself." To give practical emphasis to this resolution, the Holy Alliance, selecting this time France for its tool, sent a French army, under the Duke of Angouleme, across the Pyrenees, which speedily overran the country, overthrew the regency of the Cortes, and reduced Spain to the arbitrary and unfettered rule of the king, who now claimed to exercise his authority only by divine right.

It will not escape notice that in the published utterances of the Holy Alliance care is taken to confine the enumerated occasions upon which the allied sovereigns declare their purpose to interfere forcibly, to cases of "reform effected by revolt and open force," of repulsion of "the maxim of rebellion," or of the "overthrow of the government." Ostensibly, then, the league was bound only to the maintenance of de facto governments and the established order of things. The insincerity of all this, however, and its lack of merit will appear when we remember that at this same juncture, when the King of Wurtemburg saw fit to give to his subjects a constitution, sua sponte and under no sort of compulsion, these members of the Holy Alliance, without exception, peremptorily cut off all diplomatic intercourse with him and ordered their ministers to summarily demand their passports and quit his capital. This fact alone showed to the world conclusively that the enmity of the Holy Alliance was to reform per se, in the abstract, whether peaceable or forcible, compulsory or voluntary, and quite apart from its dependence upon "rebellion," or "revolt," or "open force," or the "overthrow of the government."

Of course, long prior to the period in history to which we have now come, Great Britain had found it impossible to indorse the principles of the Holy Alliance as the same had successively been matured and reduced to practice. It is evident that she could give no assent to a doctrine which presupposed and implied that her Government had been but a series of usurpations ever since the revolution of 1688, and that for all that time she had kept her God-given rulers out of their undoubted inheritance. Accordingly her representative protested energetically against the armed intervention determined on at the Congress of Laybach to repress the constitutional governments erected in Naples and Piedmont. In like manner at Verona the Iron Duke was present to speak in the name of Great Britain against the iniquitous course of policy there foreshadowed in the interest of absolutism, and which was so inimical to the cause of human freedom and progress.

These doings of the Holy Alliance and the purposes of that league as they had then been ascertained rendered the declarations of President Monroe's message of December 2, 1823, relative to a contemplated extension of the field of the interference of the Holy Alliance to the Western Continent, not only pertinent and proper, but necessary. At that date the Spanish colonies in America had been in revolt against their parent country for a long time, and after a desultory course of warfare had substantially become independent States, or at least so far so that any attempt on the part of Spain, unaided, to subjugate them would have been confessedly hopeless. The United States had extended to them a full recognition of their independence, and Great Britain gave them such a quasi acknowledgment as de facto governments as arose from sending her consular agents, duly accredited, to their commercial ports. In this state of affairs the question of the armed intervention of the Holy Alliance for the purpose of restoring to the allegiance of Spain her revolted colonies in the New World as soon as the allied sovereigns should have succeeded in purging the mother country herself of all notions of governmental reform, had been mooted at the Congress of Verona. The legitimists in Spain were notoriously appealing to the allied rulers to extend their policy of repression across the ocean; to which course the latter were by no means disinclined. Indeed, within little more than a year after the promulgation of the Verona circular an invitation was sent by a confidential minister of King Ferdinand to the courts of the allied sovereigns, asking in the name of his master that still another conference be called, to meet this time in Paris, for the specific purpose of aiding Spain "in adjusting the affairs of the revolted countries of America."

Great Britain doubtless foresaw that this proposed meeting and the execution of its object, or something akin to it, would result from the agitation of the Spanish-American question at Verona, and that only the completion of the Duke of Angouleme's invasion of Spain was needed to bring the ulterior scheme of colonial subjugation to the foreground of European politics. And although her protests and remonstrances in behalf of the cause of constitutional government had thus far gone for naught; although she had instructed her minister to Spain, shortly after the termination of the Congress of Verona, to advertise the Spanish cabinet that in her judgment the substantial independence of the American colonies was a fact, with the further intimation that the armed interference of any European power other than Spain looking to their subjugation would not be by her permitted—still the call for a congress at Paris went forth, and preparations were evidently on foot for transplanting forcibly the doctrine of legitimacy to the American continent. Great Britain could not view these things otherwise than with alarm. Her commercial and industrial interests in the Spanish-American States were very considerable, and would be greatly jeoparded by the renewed presence of invading armies. But incomparably more important than all her material interests was her position as the arbiter of European politics, the reputation which she had theretofore acquired of standing as in some sort a barrier against the encroachments of absolutism, and the stake which she had in constitutional methods of government, and in frustrating the unholy practices of the Holy Alliance.

The United States, isolated geographically from the theater of European events, from her distant position looked upon them as a spectator—interested, indeed, but still not a gainer or loser by them—and this was true with regard to all the devious dealings of the Holy Alliance, so long as those dealings remained European and were no American. But when the arena of the contest between freedo m nd legitimacy was likely to be transferred from the Old World to the New, vastly different relations arose. In that event the United States, from a curious looker-on, would become a not indifferent party to the struggle; she would be the nearest neighbor of and naturally the deepest sympathizer with one of the antagonists; and quite aside from her interest in the cause of popular government, she would, in case of the victory of the absolutists over their former dependencies, become herself the inevitable next field for the operations of the Holy Alliance in the further performance of its self-appointed task of stamping out the rule of the people and elevating and fortifying kingcraft. It is evident, then, that to keep the threatened danger away from American shores and to confine it to continental Europe, so far as that could be done by moral means alone and without making his Government a participant in European politics, or entangling it in transatlantic leagues, was the problem which the inexorable logic of events had propounded to the Administration of President Monroe for solution. It was a task of no ordinary magnitude.

The peculiar danger to which the United States would have been exposed in the event of the Holy Alliance transferring its seat of operations to America may be inferred from the statement already made of the action of the allied sovereigns in suspending diplomatic intercourse with the King of Wurtemburg. That step discloses the animus with which their league was inspired. Their purpose was the destruction of constitutional government as such, and for the sole reason that it was constitutional government. Considerations other than this were studiously kept in the background. Their wars were waged, as said by Mr. Brougham in an oft-quoted passage—

Not against freedom on the Ebro, or freedom on the Mincio, but against freedom—against freedom wherever it is found, freedom by whomsoever enjoyed, freedom by whatever name achieved, by whatever institutions secured.

Plainly, then, consistency of policy on the part of the allied rulers would compel them to follow up their reduction of the revolted colonies of Spain by an attack upon the United States; for the latter had then existed for near a half century under a form of government framed and conducted in flagrant and somewhat ostentatious disregard for all the essential maxims of legitimacy; so that the contemplated invasion of the Spanish-American States not only menaced the cause of constitutional freedom there, but amounted to a threatened descent of hostile powers upon our own shores.

Moved by the community of interest existing between his Government and our own in this exigency, Mr. Canning, then the British secretary of state for foreign affairs, in the early autumn of 1823, proposed to Richard Rush, our minister at the Court of St. James, a joint declaration on the part of the two Governments represented by them, respectively. This declaration was to be threefold in its enunciations: First, that both parties to it disclaimed all purpose of obtaining any portion of the revolted territory for themselves; second, that neither would oppose any amicable settlement or reconciliation between Spain and her late dependencies; and third, that neither would be an indifferent spectator of an armed interference looking to the forcible return to Spanish allegiance of any of the revolted colonies on the part of a foreign power, or to the forced cession of any of those colonies to a foreign power.

Mr. Rush consented to join in this declaration at once, and without first communicating its terms to his Government, if Great Britain would at the same time announce her unqualified recognition of the revolted Spanish-American colonies as independent states. Mr. Canning declined to take this decisive step, for which his Government did not think itself prepared, and Mr. Rush submitted the proposal of a joint declaration to his home Government. President Monroe, with characteristic caution, laid the proposition before his Cabinet, which was an exceptionally able one, John Quincy Adams and Mr. Calhoun being among its members. Not only so, but the President sought the advice of Mr. Jefferson in his retreat at Monticello, and the result was an elaborate letter from the venerable ex-President under date of October 24, 1823, in which he counseled the joinder of the Administration in the proposed declaration, which he formulated thus:

That we aim not at the acquisition of any of those possessions; that we will not stand in the way of any amicable arrangement between the colonies and their mother country; that we will oppose with all our means the forcible interposition of any other power as auxiliary, stipendiary, or under any other form or pretext, and most especially their transfer to any power by conquest, cession, or acquisition in any other way.

Neither Canning's proposition nor Jefferson's advice was adopted by Mr. Monroe. His Administration, acting in the light of then recent history, and of its probable self-repetition at no distant day, could not well undertake to commit the United States to a line of policy in which the declared opposition to any acquisition of Spanish-American soil by European powers, whether by conquest or voluntary transfer, was coupled with an equally emphatic self-renunciation of the same object. Florida had but just become ours; the great Louisiana purchase was then recent history, and it needed no prophetic eye to forecast the subsequent annexation of Texas, and the acquisition by conquest of New Mexico and Upper California, to say nothing of the long-continued coveting of Cuba. The insatiate territorial demands of successful slave labor, and of successful pro-slavery politics, were enough to make any Administration shrink from countenancing a foreclosure of all neighboring states south of us against a possible absorption by us in the future. Indeed, Mr. Jefferson, in the letter above referred to, warned the Administration of the possible impolicy of such a committal. He says:

We must first ask ourselves a question—do we wish to acquire any one or more of the Spanish provinces?—before we can unite in the proposed joint declaration.

And while the ex-President saw in the contemplated united action of the two powers an advantage overtopping any probable want of room on our part, Mr. Monroe declined to go to the length of assuming to bind his Government by a pledge which might cramp its future action at a time when it should act with the utmost freedom, but decided to adopt instead a course less radical indeed, but which, as the event seems to have proved, was a complete remedy for the mischief at which it was aimed. He left the British ministry to act in this exigency as it might list, with entire freedom, but alone, and in like manner he failed to act upon Mr. Jefferson's advice. But when Congress assembled at the beginning of December, 1823, he sent his annual message to that body, and in it announced the American policy which has gone down into history as the Monroe doctrine. I deem it unnecessary to reproduce it here.

The enunciations of this message were the product of the aggregate wisdom of Mr. Monroe's Cabinet, to whom they were submitted, and by whom they were, upon full consideration, approved. Such, at least, was the testimony of Mr. Calhoun at a time when he was the only surviving member of that eminent body.

For the foregoing clear statement of the case I acknowledge my indebtedness to a paper on The Panama Canal and Monroe Doctrine published in 1880 by Mr. Charles R. Grant.

It will thus be seen, Mr. President, that the declarations of the Monroe message sprang into being by reason of the imminence of a sudden and peculiar danger. This danger they were designed to meet and defeat. But they had still another purpose to serve. They were to furnish the foundation of an active policy in consonance with them to last for all time. The message was not merely a notice served at the time upon the Allied Powers of certain resistance to be offered to the extension of their operations to this continent. It went further. It posted a notice to endure as long as this Government endured, to be taken account of by all nations then existing and to exist, that American territory was not, and was not to be, the subject of further conquests or colonization by the powers of the Old World. With what territory those powers already possessed in America no interference was intended. But the message drew the line on further acquisitions.

This message of Mr. Monroe was received with satisfaction at home. It, too, was hailed with joy by every lover of free institutions in Europe. It reached England while Mr. Canning was still addressing the Allied Powers in terms of similar import and announcing the refusal of his Government to participate in or countenance the proposed Congress of Paris. It is not doubted that this action of Great Britain and America had a great effect in inducing a speedy abandonment of the designs of the Allied Sovereigns to subjugate the Spanish-American States.

It is said that the representatives of the Holy Alliance were in fact at the time informally convened at Paris. If so, the outcome of their deliberations there, if any there were, never became public.

We have the authority of Mr. Brougham, speaking from his place in Parliament two months after President Monroe's message had been sent to Congress, that as the result of the message the Spanish-American question had practically ended, and that it was a matter for the gratitude of every freeman in Europe.

Mr. Clay was Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress to which Mr. Monroe's message was addressed. In January, 1824, following the message, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the people of these States would not see without serious inquietude any forcible interposition by the Allied Powers of Europe in behalf of Spain to reduce to their former subjection those parts of the continent of America which have proclaimed and established for themselves, respectively, independent Governments, and which have been solemnly recognized by the United States.

He did not ask its immediate consideration, but suggested that the resolution lie on the table for future consideration.

Plainly, the object of the resolution was to give legislative sanction to the declarations of the President's message. It remained on the Speaker's table until near the close of the session, when, on May 26, 1824, the House being in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. Clay said:

He would ask a single moment's attention of the committee while he said only one word in respect to a resolution which he had had the honor to present some time ago. The resolution to which he referred was that which proposed an expression of the feelings of Congress in regard to an attack supposed to be meditated by allied Europe upon the independence of Spanish America. He had offered that resolution in consequence of information disclosed in the President's message at the beginning of the present session of Congress; and most certainly, if the designs imputed to the allies had really been entertained, every consideration connected with the interest, the safety, and even the independence of this country called for the most deliberate attention to his proposition. But such a purpose, abominable as it would have been, ought not to be attributed upon any other than the strongest evidence. Events and circumstances subsequent to the communication of the message evinced that, if such a purpose were ever seriously entertained, it had been relinquished. For his part, while he was disposed to keep a vigilant eye on every movement of the allies, and to be ready to give his cooperation to every measure calculated to repel their aggressions, if any such should be attempted on the independence of any part of America, he was, on the other hand, unwilling to give them any just cause of offense against us. But to pass this resolution after all that has occurred—in the absence of any sufficient evidence of their now cherishing inimical designs on this continent—might be construed as unfriendly, if not offensive. Under the full conviction, therefore, that they did not entertain any purpose so diabolical as that would be of attempting to reduce Spanish America to its ancient subjection, or of compelling it to adopt the monarchial form of government, he should continue to abstain from pressing upon the attention of the House his resolution, and should allow it to sleep where it now reposes, on the table.

It will be observed that in the course of these remarks Mr. Clay stated that events and circumstances subsequent to the communication of the message evinced that if the allied sovereigns ever seriously entertained the design of subjecting the Spanish-American countries it had been relinguished, and because of this relinquishment, and only because of it, he abstained from pressing his resolution. In other words, President Monroe's words, having had the effect already of deterring the Holy Alliance, it was quite unnecessary for Congress to take any action on the message.

But that is not the case with which we are now dealing. Great Britain has peremptorily declined the request of this Government to submit her contention to territory claimed by Venezuela to arbitration.

This refusal was preceded by representations made by this Government that British aggressions in South America were in conflict with the American policy as outlined in the Monroe message.

The British premier, replying to this, had joined issue, denying the Monroe doctrine, or its applicability to the instant case.

President Cleveland's message to Congress was the response to this denial of the Monroe doctrine and this refusal of arbitration. Congress has met the President's recommendation of a commission to determine for ourselves where the true boundary between Venezuela and British Guiana should be placed, but Great Britain has not yet altered her position, and still stands on the inapplicability of the American doctrine of Mr. Monroe to this case.

It is unlike the case presented by Mr. Clay in his remarks on his resolution in 1824. There the allied sovereigns had desisted. Here Great Britain has not desisted. There the danger had passed and there was no necessity for action by Congress. Here the danger has not passed; there is nothing to show that England does not stand on her announced intention of ignoring our view of the Monroe doctrine and of denial of arbitration. So that ground does exist in this case for action by Congress.

If, in the English view, the doctrine announced by Mr. Monroe does not fit, then there should be given to the President's view of this doctrine the sanction of a full, precise, clear, strong, vigorous legislative expression, such as that embodied in the resolutions reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

If it be true in any sense that the Monroe doctrine of 1823 does not meet this case of aggressive occupancy of territory under the guise of a boundary dispute, then the Congress should here and now, as is proposed, promulgate anew an American doctrine and policy that does meet it—an American doctrine so far reaching on this subject that it covers not only the instant case but all others that the exigencies of the future may develop.

Mr. President, without going into the history of the Venezuelan boundary dispute, let us examine the case to some extent in its relation to ourselves and to the American policy insisted upon.

The efforts of Venezuela to obtain a settlement of the dispute with Great Britain have been continuous and urgent. In 1876 she offered to close the dispute by accepting the Moroco line proposed by Lord Aberdeen in behalf of Great Britain. This was intended as a compromise, for her claims to the disputed territory carried her line much farther eastward. This offer was refused by Lord Granville on behalf of the then British ministry, who suggested a new line comprehending a large tract of territory not claimed for Great Britain in Lord Aberdeen's time. This was of course refused by Venezuela, and negotiations dragged along without result until 1882, when Venezuela sought arbitration as the only honorable course left open to her to settle the controversy. This seemed likely to be accomplished, for in 1886 a treaty was practically agreed upon with the Gladstone Government containing a general arbitration clause under which the parties might have submitted the boundary dispute to the decision of a third power or of several powers in amity with both. Before the actual signing, however, of the treaty, the administration of Mr. Gladstone was superseded by that of Lord Salisbury, which declined to accede to the arbitration clause proposed in the incomplete treaty. Since then Venezuela has continued to offer and appeal for arbitration, while Great Britain has steadily refused it, except upon terms that would concede to the latter territory the claim to which Venezuela could not admit. While these negotiations were still pending, new appropriations of Venezuelan territory continued to be made by Great Britain, whereupon Venezuela, in 1887, suspended diplomatic relations with the British Government, protesting before all the world against the acts of spoliation committed to her detriment by Great Britain.

This stand was alike dignified and creditable to the weaker power. Diplomatic relations have not since been formally restored, though, on account of continued British aggressions, negotiations were resumed by Venezuela through its minister to Paris and special envoys. These negotiations all failed, as the others had, through the stubborn stand taken by Great Britain, and Venezuela again filed with the British Government a second strong protest.

The Government of the United States took an active interest in these several attempts at amicably adjusting an ugly question, using its good offices to bring about such a settlement, and in December, 1886, Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, made a formal tender of the services of this Government in arbitration.

This offer of mediation, acceptable to Venezuela, was declined by Great Britain.

In 1890 Mr. Blaine, Secretary of State, again urged upon the English Government the advisability of arbitration.

Nothing came of these renewed attempts, and since then Venezuela has again and again brought the controversy to the notice of the United States, has insisted upon its importance to us as well as to herself, has represented it as having reached an acute stage, making definite action by the United States imperative, and has continuously solicited the services and support of the United States in aid of its final adjustment.

President Cleveland brought the matter to the attention of Congress in his message of December 3, 1894; in February following, Congress, by joint resolution, "earnestly recommended to the favorable consideration of both parties in interest the suggestion of the President for friendly arbitration;" and in July following that, Mr. Olney's note to the American ambassador at London, after fully, clearly, ably stating the whole case, appeals again for mediation and demands a definite decision as to whether Great Britain will consent or will not consent to submit the boundary question in its entirety to impartial arbitration.

In this communication the Secretary of State gave distinct notice to Great Britain that the controversy is one in which both the honor and the interests of this country are involved.

It would seem, Mr. President, that language of this deep significance could not fail to impress the British Government that the acute stage of this dispute had indeed been reached, that it had come to a point beyond which it were not safe to go and yet keep the peace of the world. It implied in no uncertain way that if Great Britain continued her aggressions upon territory claimed by Venezuela, it would be considered here a cause of quarrel between Her Britannic Majesty's Government and our own. It was more than a protest; it was a warning.

In his reply Lord Salisbury declares the controversy is one with which the United States has no apparent practical concern, and that the disputed frontier of Venezuela has nothing to do with any questions dealt with by President Monroe. He denies that it is an attempt at colonization of any portion of America.

There is no difference in practical effect between the planting of a new colony on territory seized for the purpose, and the advancing of the frontier of an old colony in disregard of existing territorial claims of another power. The difference is matter of form and not of substance, and the doctrine of Monroe, if pertinent in the one case, must be in the other also.

We do not assert, Mr. President, that Great Britain is in fact usurping dominion over Venezuelan territory. It is true Venezuela charges such usurpation, but Great Britain denies it. Our position is that until the merits of these contentions are authoritatively ascertained, the United States can take sides with neither. But we do insist upon this ascertainment, and meanwhile we demand the maintenance of the statu quo.

Who stands in the way of this ascertainment? Surely not Venezuela. Witness her strenuous efforts, first, for settlement through direct diplomatic negotiations with Grent Britain; next, her expressed willingness to arbitrate—aye, her urgent solicitations for arbitration.

No, the responsibility is on Great Britain. By far the greater power of the two, magnanimity, it would seem, would itself suggest arbitration to her. But that is not English policy. She reaches out for what she wants, and this, too, with scant regard for the laws of meum et tuum, and once she gets it in her grasp, regarding not how she came by it, holds it fast.

The plain story in this case is, Great Britain, taking advantage of the indefinite character of her claim to territory in the western part of her acknowledged possessions in the northeastern portion of South America, as transferee of the Dutch holdings there, and doubtless taking advantage, too, of the rather indefinite character of the limits of Venezuelan territory adjoining her own, has laid rude hands on a big slice of that country and coolly announced her purpose to hold on to it.

Now, this is what the United States, with its traditional policy, can not tolerate with honor and dignity, and does not propose to tolerate.

It is a matter of principle with us. If arbitration decides, or any other fair method of settlement demonstrates, that this disputed territory really and justly pertains to the British Crown, the United States can have nothing further to say except to advise Venezuela to submit. We will, in that case, wish Great Britain joy of her full possessions.

If arbitration, or other fair method, decides that Venezuela has been encroached upon in her territorial privileges, we would see to it that her right of reoccupancy of this part of her country is vindicated.

If Great Britain stands firm, declining arbitration, refusing friendly mediation, denying compromise or amicable adjustment, as is her position now, we must of necessity go ahead with what we have begun.

The Venezuelan Boundary Commission, authorized by Congress and appointed by the President, will complete its work, will ascertain what is the true eastern boundary line of Venezuela, and will definitely report to Congress and the President. The line thus established will be adopted by this Government as the true boundary between Venezuela and British Guiana, and Venezuela will acquiesce in the same, withdrawing all pretensions to any territory eastward of the line. Thereafter any crossing of this line by an armed force for the purpose of holding or seizing territory thus determined to be Venezuelan, would be held by us to be tantamount to a declaration of war against both the United States and Venezuela, and would be resisted accordingly.

That is the inevitable logic of the position we have assumed. We do not shrink from it, because it is right; it is the bold assertion of a great national policy that we are prepared to enforce and feel ourselves able to enforce against the British Empire and all comers. It is the doctrine of America for Americans; it is the "balance-of-power" idea applied to America; it is the assertion of the principle that American questions are for American decision.

The leading nations of Europe have adjudged that it is right and proper and for their security and welfare to preserve what is termed "the balance of power" in Europe. That is the distinctive national policy for Europe, which they have announced and repeatedly enforced. It led to the Crimean war, where Great Britain, in alliance with France, successfully asserted it by force of arms against the aggressions of Russia on the independence of Turkey. Our Monroe doctrine is to America what this "balance-of-power" doctrine is to Europe. Justification can not be claimed for the one and denied for the other.

The United States is expected to stand aloof from entangling alliances with European powers. We are to have, it seems, nothing to do with European concerns, nothing with Asiatic, African, nor Australian concerns. We have heretofore steadily adhered to this line of policy. We have not sought "to play in the back yard" of any of the countries located on the continents of the Eastern Hemisphere.

And now when we propose to serve notice on the nations of the Old World that we will permit no "playing in our back yard," Europe stands aghast, and we are admonished by some of the overtimid or overconservative of our own people, aye, by some even in this Chamber, that we must not do it.

Shut out of participation in European policies, neither asking nor being invited to take part in the same, are we, too, to be deprived of the right to prescribe an American policy, to dominate an American policy?

On this point, Mr. President, the people of the United States are especially sensitive. And it is not confined to any section or class of our people. It pervades all alike; it leaps over party lines and rises above party feeling.

On the Atlantic seaboard in the Northeast the caution and conservatism of capital and the fears of business disturbance may for a moment stay this feeling. But those who count upon this for the display of extreme forbearance on our part may find themselves greatly in error. The strip of country 200 miles wide from Baltimore to Boston does not constitute the American Union. The outlying districts and States are not provinces nor their people provincials. American thought, intelligence, aspiration, popular sentiment, are not confined to the eastern seaboard, and its highest expression is not always found in the columns of metropolitan dailies. The seat of empire in this country, like the center of population, tends westward and southward. Go ask the people of the great West and those of the revivified and rapidly recuperating South, and they will tell you that the time has come for a broadening of the scope of the Monroe doctrine of 1823, and for a much more enlarged application of it. They will tell you that seventy-three years ago, when this doctrine was first proclaimed, the United States as a nation was in the period of its youth. It was was weak, undeveloped, not yet sure of its position among the nations of the earth. Its population then was but little more than 9,000,000; its resources small; its power unfeared. With some misgivings it announced an American policy to meet the exigency then upon it—a policy as firm as the youthful nation, feeling its way with care and caution, dared then to make it.

But the situation has changed. From 9,000,000 of people we have multiplied to 70,000,000. From meager resources we have plowed and planted, delved and mined, commerced and manufactured, builded and constructed our way to enormous aggregate wealth. In power and prestige, weight and influence, civilization and progress, we take front rank among the nations of the world. We feel our security. None can molest or make us afraid. We do not have to make a demonstration on land or sea to proclaim our power or mark our readiness for war. There is no need for us to display unusual activity in our arsenals and gun factories, nor to mobilize fleets, nor to prepare flying squadrons to sail at a moment's notice. We are always prepared for war. In the hearts of 9,000,000 of fighting men, animated with patriotic fervor and determination, you will find this readiness.

We do not, it is true, maintain great standing armies, as is done in Europe, but we can, on brief notice, mobilize them, full panoplied for war. As for fleets, we have the resources, and from these could quickly evolve the facilities for constructing ships of war in number, size, armament, and strength that would give us the dominion of the seas. Whenever the necessity arises, mark the prediction, this Republic, with its 23,000 miles of coast line on two oceans and a great Gulf, will become the first naval power of the world. It is not the true policy of other nations to provoke this necessity. The American Republic is indeed "a great reservoir of force for all purposes, a mighty engine of war, a most beneficent power for peace." In the words of a distinguished American:

> Secure in our isolation, supreme in our resources, unequaled in our reserve, and free from dangerous neighbors, we occupy among the nations of the globe a position so exalted and safe that to compare us with other countries would be absurd.

This Republic, Mr. President, is not "to act the big brother to each turbulent or revolutionary Republic or island in the Western Hemisphere and convulse the world about matters of far less importance than many decided at every session of Congress." Nor are we to act the part of the mother hen and cluck to a nestling place under our protecting breast all the petty States of Central and South America.

But it does behoove us to proclaim a distinctive American policy—a broad, comprehensive policy that includes within its scope the three Americas—North, Central, and South.

The United States stands at the head of the American sisterhood of States. She has an interest, at once direct and vital, in the settlement of every question that can arise affecting any portion of the American continent, or any one of the free States on the continent. Indeed, I go further, and declare she has an interest, direct and vital, in the settlement of every national or international question that can arise in the entire Western Hemisphere.

Nor does this position on our part militate against the right of any and all governments to protect its citizens in any part of America, or to enforce payment of debts, or to claim indemnity for wrongs. The Monroe doctrine, even in its present proposed enlarged scope, is not to be extended to interfere with the business relations between the American Republics and Europe.

We would not interfere if war broke out and such countries were overrun by foreign troops. But neither as the result of such war nor as the result of negotiation or treaty can any European power acquire additional territory in America. That is the point. War waged by England or any other European power with South or Central American countries on any just ground, is no concern of ours. Only such war must not be one of conquest. And the war ended, foreign troops must within a reasonable time evacuate. Otherwise the nation refusing to do so would come in conflict with the declared policy of the United States in reference to the American Continent, and must reckon with us. Neither would it be ground for us to interfere, under this national policy of ours, if one South or Central American country should wage a war of conquest with another.

The Central and South American States, desiring and perhaps invoking our aid to prevent acquisition by conquest of any of their territory by stronger powers, can not object if we insist that neither shall they dispose of their territory to foreign powers by treaty, or sale, or other negotiation. It is a poor rule that will not work both ways. They can not with good grace ask us to keep the big nations of Europe off of them and then claim exemption from surveillance and control by us should they attempt to dispose of, by negotiation or treaty, the same territory to prevent the conquest of which our aid was solicited.

To say that it is right for us to prevent the acquisition of American territory by conquest, but not right for us to prevent its acquisition by sale or peaceful cession, is to my mind ridiculous. If the American policy we assert be right, if it is to serve the purpose we intend, then it must cover both propositions: First, no conquest of territory; second, no territorial acquisition otherwise than by conquest without our consent.

The Monroe doctrine and no other American doctrine asserted by us would amount to anything or be respected by other nations except that we have the power to enforce it. Having, as we believe, that power, it behooves us only to inquire whether what we propose is, first, right and just; second, whether it is to our security, welfare, and advantage to do it.

Mr. President, we heard something said on this floor—and that in derision—of the turbulance that characterizes the people of South and Central America. Suppose in the Spanish-American countries revolutions are frequent; suppose one régime is quickly followed by another; that one faction rules awhile and is then overthrown by another. The countries still remain free and independent. No attempt to set up monarchy or empire is made. Occasionally some strong man may, under stress of extreme circumstances, declare himself dictator. But it does not last long. Those people are imbued with the republican spirit, they believe in democracy. The turmoil, strife, contention, revolution through which they are going is their road to higher development and freer, more stable institutions and government. We traveled the same road to reach the goal of our independence and to found here in this Western Hemisphere this matchless Republic, which is our boast and pride. All other nations have traveled it to reach the high ground of permanent, enduring nationality. No nation has gone through more frequent and bloody revolutions than has England to attain to her present exalted station of grandeur, glory, power, and freedom. The Anglo-Saxon race literally carved its way to civil liberty—the foundation stone of enduring Government. Magna Charta, the petition of rights, habeas corpus, trial by jury, freedom of opinion, of speech, and of the press were only established after centuries of effort, of toil, of sacrifice, and bloodshed.

The Senator from Colorado, who inveighs against the countries of South America because of their frequent revolutions, is, in his high station of Senator of the United States, himself a product of revolution. There would have been no Senate to sit in but for successful revolution. Give those countries a chance. Were those people of our blood, the Anglo-Saxon strain, they would doubtless work out their destinies sooner. That race develops more rapidly the germ of self-government, and ripens it to maturity and fruition sooner. But the Latin races are not incapable of attaining the highest standard; and I doubt not the womb of the future will bring forth in due time in South and Central America great nations of stable government, free institutions, and free people, marching in unison with the great Republic of the northern part of the continent toward the accomplishment of the manifest destiny marked out by the God of the universe for America.

No American, least of all an American statesman, should complain of revolution. The American people owe all they have to successful revolution. This Republic of ours was ushered into being amid the din and tocsin of war; its cradle rocked by revolution, its infancy inured to the shock of contending armies.

Nor can we be unmindful of the fact that in our maturer years the greatest revolution of modern times drenched our soil with the blood of millions of our countrymen, and resulted in the destruction of billions of dollars in property.

Mr. President, it is said that a formal declaration of an American policy is not necessary, and is even unwise. This, sir, is an un-American idea. The American people have never been afraid of declarations, have never been backward in maintaining them, and, indeed, are fond of them. They have served us to good purpose, and we have never made one yet that we did not afterwards, either by force of arms or successful civil action, crystallize into law or established policy.

We began with the Declaration of Independence by the Continental Congress in 1776. An eight years' war followed, but it ended with the declaration still standing and acknowledged by our adversary.

In 1812 we made another declaration, proclaiming exemption from search for American vessels on the high seas. War followed. It ended on the plains of Chalmette, near New Orleans, in my own State. Again the declaration stood, and again was its correctness recognized. No more American vessels have been searched.

In 1823 came the declaration by Mr. Monroe in his message now under discussion, or a distinctive American policy, which might be termed "America for Americans."

In 1861 came the fourth great declaration—that the Union must and shall be preserved.

In 1863 President Lincoln announced another great declaration—his emancipation proclamation, by which 4,000,000 slaves were freed.

Both these declarations stood the fierce ordeal of battle, and were crystallized into fundamental law.

President Cleveland, in his message of December, 1895, announced a sixth great declaration, which is a reassertion on an enlarged basis of the Monroe doctrine, and this has been followed by the resolution unanimously reported by the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate, which further and more largely develops the American idea upon this question.

Mr. President, the time has arrived for such a declaration; broad, bold, comprehensive; not made in anger, not menacing, but decisive.

The doctrine announced by Mr. Monroe should be promoted to the dignity of a rule of governmental authority by affixing to an enlarged scope of it the seal of Congressional approval. That doctrine, even in the restricted form in which it was at first couched, had "the element of nationality of principle." It is to be regarded, I think, as "a continuing protest" against any further European control, possession, or acquisition of American territory.

It should no longer be permitted to remain a mere dictum, but should be given a legal status by Congressional indorsement. And it is peculiarly appropriate that the Senate should first take action, for the shaping of our foreign policy resides more particularly in the Senate.

Adopting the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs would be doing now what was urged upon Congress in 1845 and again in 1848 by President Polk. In his message to Congress in the former year relating to the then recent annexation of Texas, and in his message to Congress in the later year relating to the Yucatan troubles, he recommended that the doctrine of President Monroe be given the force of a positive pledge, committing the United States to its observance as a settled rule of governmental conduct.

Washington first laid down the doctrine that this country would not intermeddle with affairs of the Old World. With the disavowal on our part of any intent to seek for territory or power in the Eastern Hemisphere, there must follow, as of course, first, the right to extend our lines upon this side of the Atlantic whenever suitable opportunity may arise, and, second, the determination forever to restrict all non-American nations to such territory on this continent as they already possess. But if we are to abandon or surrender what the people of this country have fondly looked upon ever since Monroe's day as the American policy, saying to the nations of the Old World, "Hands off," so far as America is concerned, then let us by all means abandon that other policy of non-interference in affairs across the waters, and, as one of the leading nations of the earth, make our power, weight, and influence felt and our voice heard in the settlement of every international dispute, or question, or contest that may arise, no matter what its origin or what its purpose.

Mr. President, the two English-speaking nations should be frank and sincere in their dealings, their intercourse, their contentions, the one with the other. I have spoken plainly and with much directness of language on the theme that occupied my attention to-day, but with no spirit of bombast or bravado. I have tried to contribute somewhat to a better understanding with our transatlantic cousins. I love the English character; my blood thrills at the recollection of the great achievements of the race.

Other European peoples may have developed earlier and made, perhaps, more rapid advances in certain forms of civilization, but none have surpassed, nor equaled even, the English-speaking race in the practical character and permanence of their progress.

Guizot says, in his History of Representative Government, that the true order of national development in every country is, first, to convert the natural liberties of man into clearly defined political rights, and, next, to guarantee the security of those rights by the establishment of forces capable of maintaining them.

Nowhere, as has been truly said, do we find better illustrations of this law of progress than in the history of England and of the colonies which England has planted. The principle that "all political power is a trust held for the public good" finds its highest development where the Anglo-Saxon race dominates. It is indeed the legitimate heritage of every nation of Anglo-Saxon descent.

I do not forget that English history is, in a very large degree, our history. I do not forget that England is, as Hawthorne called it, "our old home"; nor am I unmindful of the fact that if we go back less than three centuries the record of America becomes one with that of the mother country.

In descent by far the greater part of us are of English blood, while in language, literature, law, legislative powers of government, and the essential features of civilization we owe to England a greater debt than to any other country. As said of England by an American historian:

Standing on her soil we possess practically the same personal rights that we do here; we speak the same tongue, we meet the same familiar names. We feel that whatever is glorious in her past is ours also; that Westminster Abbey belongs as much to us as to her; that our ancestors helped to build its walls, and their dust is gathered in its tombs; that Shakspeare and Milton belong to us in like manner; that they wrote in the language we speak for the instruction and delight of our fathers' fathers, who beat back the Spanish Armada and gave their lives for liberty on the fields of Marston Moor and Nasby.

Grave issues have arisen in the past to separate us, and we may now be confronted with grave issues. Yet, after all, our interests and our sympathies, like our national histories, have more in common than they have apart.

In the United States and the British Empire combined there are upward of 125,000,000 of people who speak the English tongue and are governed by the fundamental principles of English constitutional law. They hold possession of over 12,000,000 square miles of the earth's surface, an area nearly equal to the united continents of North America and Europe. By far the greater part of the wealth and power of the globe is theirs. They have expanded as no other people have. They have shown a greater capacity for absorbing and assimilating the millions of emigrants from every country and race and tongue than have any other people.

The inhabitants of the British islands, of Australia, New Zealand, the United States, and Canada practically form one great Anglo-Saxon race. Separated though they be by distance, they everywhere exhibit the same spirit of intelligence, enterprise, and of steady, resistless growth.

The different branches of the English-speaking family are too necessary, one to the other, their interests too essentially the same, to permit of differences leading to rupture.

Archdeacon Farrar, in his address on General Grant at Westminster Abbey, in 1885, said:

Whatever there be between the two nations to forget and forgive; is forgotten and forgiven.

In like manner, I say, whatever there is of dispute or contention between the two nations, let it be settled along lines of kindred, friendship, and peace.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HALE. I ask that the order of business be now laid before the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator from Nebraska wait a moment? The appropriation bill was simply laid aside in order that the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BLANCHARD] might address the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LODGE in the chair). The Senate resumes the consideration of the appropriation bill.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the amendments of the committee may be considered as they are reached.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill may be dispensed with and that the amendments of the committee may be considered as they are reached. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. ALLEN. I desire the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a remark or two with reference to the joint resolution which passed the Senate this morning, requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out the appropriation act of last year in regard to the distribution of seeds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska asks unanimous consent to submit some remarks to the Senate in regard to the joint resolution which passed the Senate this morning. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. ALLEN. I shall occupy but a moment.

Yesterday the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], in submitting some remarks in the Senate on the subject of the joint resolution requiring the Secretary of Agriculture to carry into effect the provisions of the appropriation act of March 2, 1895, used this language:

Without further preface, I call the attention of the Senate to a table found in the report of the Secretary of Agriculture, on page 204. This table gives the allotment and distribution of seeds to members of Congress for the year 1894-95. It will be found by reference to the table that the State of Nebraska had allotted to it 131,856 papers of seed, and that there was distributed or given to members of Congress from that State by the Secretary of Agriculture 221,961 papers, being an excess of nearly 100,000 papers for his own State.

Again he said:

The table shows that the whole number of seeds distributed in that year aggregated 9,528,653 packages. Nebraska received 1,133,754 packages, or nearly one-ninth of the whole amount throughout the United States.

Again the Senator said:

When we come to Nebraska, according to this report, the Secretary allotted to Congressmen for distribution 221,961 packages, an excess of the just allotment to that State, as I have shown, of nearly 100,000.

Mr. President, it is due to the Secretary of Agriculture that some explanation be made with reference to this matter and go in the RECORD in connection with the remarks of the Senator from Missouri and others, criticising the course of that officer.

In 1894 there was a drought in the State of Nebraska, which was quite general. That is a well-known historical fact. The people in the spring of 1895 were very poor, and many of them received the seeds from which they raised their crops this year from donations made by kindly disposed neighbors, and from various parts of the Union, and no doubt the Secretary of Agriculture furnished the people of the State of Nebraska as much seed as he could, consistently with his duties, in consequence of that fact. I have not the slightest doubt in my own mind that the Secretary of Agriculture in making these liberal allowances to the people of Nebraska was actuated by the fact that the people were in great distress, and I am sure that he had no disposition to promote his own personal or political interests.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I wish to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. I am interested in what he is saying, though I have not participated at all in the general discussion which has taken place on this subject; but if the Senator knows of any special concession that was made to Nebraska I should be very glad to know of it, because I attempted and used every effort to try to get some seed for those people in the eastern portion of Colorado who were utterly ruined by the drought, and I was unable to get a single package additional, and I personally bought what I could get from the stores here of different allotments that were sold in the establishments around Washington. I was unable to get the slightest help from the Secretary of Agriculture. If the Senator from Nebraska can point to a single act of the Secretary where he did go out of his way to furnish seed to any section, I think it would go very far to redeem his management of the office, which is generally considered worthless in our section, from the contempt into which it has fallen.

Mr. ALLEN. I very much regret that the Senator from Colorado should reflect upon the Secretary of Agriculture. I am well convinced that the Secretary of Agriculture has performed his duty faithfully and well as he understood it.

I want to call attention briefly to a fact which was referred to by the honorable Senator from Delaware [Mr. GRAY] yesterday, that the inequality in the distribution of seeds, to some extent, originated from the circumstance that the seeds were transferred from various members of Congress to their associates, by that means sending a larger portion of the seeds distributed from the Agricultural Department into some States and Territories than were sent into other States and Territories. As showing that fact I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD, without being read, a statement on the subject from the Agricultural Department.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CHANDLER in the chair). Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Nebraska? The Chair hears none, and it will be so ordered.

The statement referred to is as follows:

Record of transfer of seeds.

To—	Vegetable papers.	From—
Hon. D. D. Aitken	10,000	Hon. Jas. McMillan, United States Senator.
Hon. W. V. Allen	1,400	Hon. M. W. Ransom, United States Senator.
Do	3,000	Hon. W. A. Peffer, United States Senator.
Do	1,400	Hon. Patrick Walsh, United States Senator.
Do	1,450	Hon. Edward Murphy, United States Senator.
Do	1,450	Hon. John W. Palmer, United States Senator.
Do	1,450	Hon. Eppa Hunton, United States Senator.
Hon. John M. Allen	1,250	Hon. John C. Hendrix.
Do	1,000	Hon. Franklin Bartlett.
Do	10,000	Hon W. Bourke Cockran.
Do	2,000	Hon. L. E. McGann.
Do	2,000	Do.
Do	3,000	Hon. Jos. H. O'Neil.
Do	2,500	Hon. Allen C. Durborow.
Do	2,500	Hon. Jason B. Brown.
Hon. C. K. Bell	10,750	Hon. Richard Coke.
Hon. John L. Bretz	500	Hon. D. E. Sickles.
Hon. J. W. Babcock	2,150	Hon. E. F. Loud.
Do	1,000	Hon. H. C. Lodge.
Do	16,417	Hon. D. D. Burnes.
Do	10,000	Hon. John C. Houk.
Do	3,000	Hon. Donelson Caffery.

Record of transfer of seeds—Continued.

To—	Vegetable papers.	From—
Hon. J. W. Babcock	2,650	Hon. E. F. Loud.
Do	5,000	Hon. Robt. Adams, jr.
Hon. Wm. Baker	1,500	Hon. Wm. Ryan.
Hon. Wm. H. Bower	4,000	Hon. L. T. Griffin.
Hon. J. H. Bankhead	2,000	Hon. L. E. McGann.
Do	7,500	Hon. W. D. Bynum.
Do	2,000	Hon. L. E. McGann.
Do	2,000	Hon. C. A. Cadmus.
Do	2,500	Hon. L. W. Turpin.
Do	2,500	Hon. C. B. Kilgore.
Hon. C. S. Brice	4,600	Hon. Tom L. Johnson.
Hon. J. W. Bailey	200	Hon. J. H. Goodnight.
Hon. S. B. Cooper	1,500	Hon. Levi T. Griffin.
Do	500	Hon. E. F. Loud.
Do	1,000	Hon. Jno. C. Hendrix.
Do	2,000	Hon. J. De Witt Warner.
Do	2,500	Hon. W. M. Springer.
Do	500	Hon. L. T. Griffin.
Hon. Chas. F. Crisp	2,000	Hon. H. W. Rusk.
Hon. C. A. Chickering	1,000	Hon. Thomas F. Magner.
Hon. N. N. Cox	2,000	Hon. S. J. Schermerhorn.
Do	2,000	Do.
Do	7,000	Hon. Wm. Everett.
Hon. Charles E. Coffin	500	Hon. H. W. Rusk.
Do	1,000	Do.
Hon. Charles Curtis	3,000	Hon. J. Frank Aldrich.
Hon. Charles Daniels	3,000	Hon. D. E. Sickles.
Hon. H. A. Dinsmore	500	Hon. John J. O'Neill.
Hon. George B. Fielder	2,000	Hon. Thomas F. Magner.
Hon. J. D. Hicks	2,000	Hon. Robert Adams, jr.
Do	2,500	Hon. Galusha A. Grow.
Hon. R. R. Hitt	15,000	Hon. Ed. J. Dunphy.
Hon. James K. Jones	1,000	Hon. E. F. Loud.
Hon. J. F. Izlar	2,000	Hon. C. A. Cadmus.
Hon. O. M. Kem	3,000	Hon. James F. Wilson.*
Do	4,000	Hon. W. M. Springer.*
Do	2,500	Hon. W. N. Roach.*
Do	11,000	Hon. Galusha A. Grow.*
Do	500	Hon. L. T. Griffin.*
Hon. J. C. Kyle	2,000	Hon. Adolph Meyer.
Do	500	Hon. James P. Pigott.
Hon. R. E. Lester	500	Hon. Josiah Patterson.
Do	500	Hon. Robert Adams, jr.
Do	1,000	Hon. C. A. Cadmus.
Do	2,000	Hon. George B. Fielder.
Hon. W. V. Lucas	5,000	Hon. William A. Sipe.
Hon. A. C. Latimer	5,000	Hon. John J. McDannold.
Hon. E. F. Loud	750	Hon. J. J. Gardiner.
Hon. Thomas Lynch	1,500	Hon. William Ryan.
Hon. William M. McKaig	500	Hon. Levi T. Griffin.
Hon. H. D. Money	2,600	Hon. Julius Goldzier.
Do	3,000	Hon. J. J. McDannold.
Hon. J. W. Maddox	1,250	Hon. J. C. Hendrix.
Hon. J. C. McDearmon	1,000	Hon. Julius Goldzier.
Do	2,500	Hon. J. H. O'Neil.
Hon. G. D. Meiklejohn	2,500	Hon. T. J. Henderson.
Hon. Howard Mutchler	6,000	Hon. William McAleer.
Hon. J. H. Outhwaite	2,000	Hon. D. E. Sickles.
Hon. H. W. Ogden	2,500	Hon. Adolph Meyer.
Hon. William A. Peffer	3,300	Hon. J. H. Gallinger.
Do	7,500	Hon. D. B. Hill.
Do	5,000	Hon. N. W. Aldrich.
Do	6,000	Hon. J. C. Burrows.
Hon. Josiah Patterson	2,500	Hon. S. W. McCall.
Do	2,500	Do.
Do	1,000	Do.
Do	1,000	Hon. W. J. Coombs.
Hon. H. H. Powers	5,000	Hon. S. W. McCall.
Hon. Lafe Pence	1,000	Hon. William Ryan.
Hon. Gaston A. Robbins	2,000	Hon. A. C. Durborow.
Hon. T. J. Strait	3,000	Hon. J. J. McDannold.
Hon. Jerry Simpson	1,500	Hon. William Ryan.
Do	3,500	Hon. Secretary of Agriculture.
Hon. W. C. Squire	5,000	Hon. T. J. Campbell.
Hon. J. S. Sherman	1,000	Hon. Thomas F. Magner.
Hon. F. C. Tate	16,480	Hon. P. J. Somers.
Do	15,000	Hon. L. E. Quigg.
Do	1,000	Hon. John C. Houk.
Do	1,000	Hon. William Ryan.
Do	5,000	Hon. John H. Graham.
Do	2,000	Hon. John J. O'Neill.
Do	2,000	Hon. Robert Adams, jr.
Do	1,250	Hon. J. C. Hendrix.
Hon. J. F. C. Talbott	2,000	Hon. William McAleer.
Hon. L. W. Turpin	500	Hon. Adolph Meyer.
Hon. W. L. Terry	4,000	Hon. S. W. McCall.
Hon. Joseph Wheeler	10,000	Hon. George B. Fielder.
Do	4,500	Hon. John De W. Warner.
Do	15,600	Hon. Isidor Straus.
Hon. J. W. Wadsworth	2,000	Hon. A. C. Durborow.
Do	500	Hon. Adolph Meyer.
Do	3,000	Hon. H. C. Lodge.
Do	6,690	Hon. M. A. Smith.
Hon. J. R. Williams	5,000	Hon. Joseph H. O'Neil.
Do	7,500	Hon. William Everett.
Do	1,000	Hon. Thomas F. Magner.
Do	7,500	Hon. J. De W. Warner.
Do	2,000	Hon. L. E. McGann.
Do	3,000	Hon. John J. O'Neill.
Do	3,000	Hon. Robert Adams, jr.
Do	7,500	Hon. Julius Goldzier.
Do	8,000	Hon. M. T. Stevens.
Hon. H. K. Wheeler	500	Hon. R. A. Childs.
Hon. E. O. Wolcott	5,000	Hon. H. C. Lodge.
Do	5,000	Do.
Total	441,437

*Nebraska.

Mr. ALLEN. I also hold in my hand copies of letters by the Rev. Luther P. Ludden, secretary of the Nebraska State Relief Commission, and by Miss Clara Barton, president of the American National Red Cross Society, explanatory of the distribution of seeds, which I also ask to have published in the RECORD. They are very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so ordered, in the absence of objection.

The papers referred to are as follows:

HEADQUARTERS NEBRASKA STATE RELIEF COMMISSION,
Lincoln, Nebr., March 12, 1895.

DEAR SIR: We beg leave to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 7th, notifying us of the forwarding of our seeds. They have commenced to arrive, and trust they will be a veritable blessing to the thousands of drought sufferers that we are compelled to supply with their garden seeds.

Respectfully, yours,

LUTHER P. LUDDEN,
General Manager.

D. MACCUAIG,
Chief Clerk, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

—

LINCOLN, NEBR., April 2, 1895.

SIR: We beg leave to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 29th, contents of which are carefully noted. We have been having delightful weather for some time in Nebraska, and a very good rain in the past few days only makes the clamor for seed the louder. We note the way in which the seed is sent forward. We have sent it into the counties in lots of a hundred of each kind, and in that way obviated much of the wrapping and putting in packages that you refer to. We have the following organization in each county, and these committees can very readily divide up the work and place the seeds without all that labor of the extra packages.

Respectfully, yours,

LUTHER P. LUDDEN, Secretary.

D. MACCUAIG,
Chief Clerk, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

—

LINCOLN, NEBR., April 10, 1895.

DEAR SIR: We beg leave to acknowledge receipt of yours of the 6th, notifying us of the completion of the work of sending us the Government garden seeds. I am instructed by the commission to extend very hearty thanks to you and your coworkers for the very courteous way in which you have treated us and sent forward the garden seeds. I know that the many thousand families who have received their garden seed in this way will appreciate the blessings that come to them from this source.

Possibly next summer, as day by day they eat the result of this seed sowing, they may not think of you; but they ought, and gratitude ought to well their hearts as the result of this work stands so clearly before them.

Yours, very truly,

LUTHER P. LUDDEN, Secretary.

D. MACCUAIG, Chief Clerk, Washington, D. C.

—

LINCOLN, NEBR., April 27, 1895.

DEAR SIR: We beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of yours of the 17th. While it calls for no letter, I want to say that it would do your heart good if you could see the great gladness brought to the many homes by the seed that you have sent us under the direction of Secretary Morton. We have already written Secretary Morton concerning this matter. We are hearing from all parts of the drought-stricken district almost every mail, and there is one general report saying the seed sent out by the Government is of excellent quality and doing nicely in their gardens. We have had some of the needed rain, enough to start the seed germinating well, but we are needing more rain now.

Very respectfully, yours, LUTHER P. LUDDEN, Secretary.

D. MACCUAIG, Chief Clerk, Washington, D. C.

—

LINCOLN, NEBR., April 27, 1895.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by the commission to express to you our very hearty thanks for the splendid contribution of garden seed that you were enabled to send us from the Department. It was a veritable godsend to thousands of our needy farmers. I do not think there is a farmer in the drought-stricken district that was unable to procure seed but what we have been able to furnish enough for a large garden, either from what you forwarded us from the Department or from that which the several seed houses of the United States generously donated to us.

The season is well advanced with us this year, and the vast amount of garden seed that you have sent us has gone into the ground, and, as one little girl said a couple of days ago, "Oh, the seed that we got from Washington through you is all up," and when the inquiry was made if she hadn't pulled it up, she said, "No, we just put it in little trenches and poured in the water and covered it with ground, and it has just pushed itself up with a little green stem." I believe more and better gardens have been planted in Nebraska this year than ever before, and of course this brings a blessing to the many who have been compelled to live on flour and beans during the past winter.

On behalf of these many sufferers, to whom your contribution of seed will bring so many blessings, I tender their hearty thanks also.

Very respectfully, yours,

LUTHER P. LUDDEN, Secretary.

Hon. J. STERLING MORTON,
Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

—

BEAUFORT, S. C., October 9, 1893.

DEAR SIR: I pray you permit me to thank you for the quick response to my request for seeds sent through Hon. Senator Butler. For the reason that you can not see them given out to and received by these poor, helpless, desolated, home-destroyed creatures, standing unsheltered, and too often unfed, looking pitifully over the bare little garden spot that so lately was their pride and hope, neither you nor the good Senator will ever quite realize the comfort you have given nor the good you have done. There are 30,000 storm sufferers under our charge; five to ten thousand of these have gardens. We are getting the winter seed as fast as possible into their hands. The tight clutch of the fingers over the little package and the glisten in the patient eyes tell more plainly than words what the gift means to them. In six weeks from now their gardens all over the islands will be green, and I am to-day informed by Mr. Fagan, of your seed division, that he has sent sacks of heavier seed, peas, beans, and corn, which we shall hold for them till planting time. Always thanking you, permit me to remain,

Respectfully,

CLARA BARTON,
President American National Red Cross.

Hon. J. S. MORTON,
Secretary of Agriculture, Washington, D. C.

Mr. LODGE. What is the paper, Mr. President?

Mr. ALLEN. The first paper I offered is a statement of the Secretary of Agriculture showing the transfer of seeds from one Senator or one Representative to another, which accounts for the unequal distribution. To illustrate, I recall last spring having gone to my associates on this side of the Chamber, and possibly to some on the other side, who were representing States not afflicted with drought, and asking them to contribute to me a certain portion of the seeds allotted to them to be sent to my State, and I received, I think, something like six or seven thousand packages, which were transferred from their accounts by the Secretary of Agriculture to my account, and were sent into the State of Nebraska. That was practiced quite generally, and the statement which I have sent to the desk to be inserted in the RECORD gives an account of these transfers.

Mr. WOLCOTT. May I ask the Senator from Nebraska if it is not a fact that nevertheless these allowances were charged to the States to which they were issued? The statement made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], to which the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN] takes exception, is not traversed by any transfer of allowances, for the seeds are charged to the different States as they were originally issued from the Department, as I understand. If that is not so, I know the Senator from Nebraska will correct me.

Mr. ALLEN. I beg pardon of the Senator from Colorado. I think this is a fact: I think the States to which the allotments are made are, in the first instance, charged with the allotments. I think after that, where Senators and Representatives of those States have transferred a portion, or in some instances probably nearly all, of their seeds to Senators and Representatives of drought-stricken districts, those transfers are charged against the allotment to the State, and are accounted for in the statement I have sent to the desk.

Mr. WOLCOTT. My impression is that that has not been done.

Mr. ALLEN. With these remarks, I think I have said all I desire to say.

Mr. HALE. I now ask that the urgent deficiency appropriation bill may be proceeded with.

Mr. VEST. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VEST. I was astonished, Mr. President, to be called from my committee room by the announcement that the seed question was again before the Senate. The last I heard of it was the unanimous adoption of the joint resolution as it was amended, which had been pending here for some days.

Mr. ALLEN. I can explain to the Senator from Missouri what I was saying in a few words. There came into my hands a statement from the Secretary of Agriculture showing a transfer in detail of seeds last spring to various members of Congress and donations. In my own case I got donations of some six or seven thousand packages, which were sent into my State at my request. I have had inserted in the RECORD an itemized statement of those transfers which were honored by the Secretary of Agriculture, and also some letters from Rev. Luther P. Ludden, the gentleman in charge of the relief fund in my State, and a letter from Miss Clara Barton with reference to the distribution of some seeds down on the Sea Islands, where there was great suffering a year or so ago, as explanatory of the remarks of the Senator from Missouri. That is the substance of all I have said on the subject.

Mr. VEST. Mr. President, without detaining the Senate, and with the permission of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], I wish to say a word in regard to this subject, without rising to a question of personal privilege, and I will ask the Secretary to read what the Secretary of Agriculture says himself in this morning's paper, which, I take it, is the highest authority in regard to his action.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

MORTON'S REPLY TO VEST—WHY DROUGHT-STRICKEN NEBRASKA GOT MORE THAN ITS QUOTA OF SEED.

Being asked as to the charge made in the Senate yesterday afternoon by Senator Vest that the Secretary of Agriculture had distributed 150,000 more packages of seed in Nebraska than that State was entitled to last year, Secretary Morton said:

"Under the law, one-third of all the seed purchased was to be distributed by the Secretary of Agriculture. In accordance with that provision, some years ago when there was great suffering along the Sea Islands of the Carolina coast, the Secretary of Agriculture, through Clara Barton and the Red Cross, gave a great portion of the one-third of the seed which he was authorized to distribute to the people whose fields and gardens had been ruined by the tidal wave. As to that very large distribution of seed to those Southern sufferers no complaint was made. Therefore, during the recent seasons of extreme drought in the Northwest the Secretary of Agriculture frankly confesses that he gave far more than the normal quota of seed to Nebraska, Kansas, and each of the Dakotas, and to Oklahoma. The Representatives and Senators from the States named and the Delegate from Oklahoma will verify that statement. This was a charitable and not a political distribution.

"The quotas for the drought-stricken sections were sent directly to and distributed by societies and persons designated by their respective communities for that charitable work.

"But single members of the House and Senate, as the records of the Department show, have distributed in a year several times as many seed in their respective States and districts as they were entitled to. And how and of whom did those liberal gentlemen get those great quantities of seed?"

The Secretary challenges the severest scrutiny of his intentions and his acts, and is delighted with the character of the enemies he seems to be propagating.

Mr. VEST. With the latter part of that statement I have not the slightest controversy. I am a well-known philanthropist, and I am glad to have contributed to the delight of the Secretary of Agriculture, as I should be to that of any other person; but I am disposed to inquire, when he claims that he has turned the Department of Agriculture into an eleemosynary institution, by what authority he has done it. It seems to me most astonishing that this stickler for law, who, after distributing seeds for three years, suddenly discovered that it was necessary for him to raise the question as to the legality of his action, and to inquire of the Attorney-General what was the condition of the law, should now, without the slightest authority which I can imagine, distribute for charitable purposes the tax money of the people of this country, and that, too, in the face of the well-known veto by the head of the Administration of an appropriation of $10,000 for the distribution of seeds in Texas a few years ago to meet drought conditions which the Secretary now speaks of in other States.

But, accepting his own statement, that he had the right to turn the Department of Agriculture into a charitable institution, he has simply made matters worse for himself by this public statement in the press of the country, as I shall proceed to show from his own report.

He says that he is charitably inclined, and found it necessary and proper to make a distribution to North Dakota, South Dakota, Kansas, and Oklahoma, as well as Nebraska, where a drought existed at the same time and the same year. I now quote the figures from his report:

The Secretary of Agriculture, on his own motion, and under this claim that he had the right to distribute one-third of the seed, only sent 763 papers to North Dakota, to South Dakota 291,288, to Kansas he sent 304,010, to Oklahoma 79,990, making to three States and one Territory 676,051 papers of seeds, and to Nebraska 895,241—nearly 300,000 papers in excess of the other three States and one Territory. The excess to Nebraska was 219,190 packages, to speak accurately. The population in 1890 of Nebraska was 1,058,910; the population of the three States of North and South Dakota and Kansas and of the Territory of Oklahoma, by the same census, amounted to 2,000,457. The State of Kansas alone had 1,427,096 people in 1890, and received 304,010 papers of seed, while Nebraska, with only 1,058,910, received 895,241 papers.

Mr. President, if the Secretary of Agriculture is satisfied with that exhibit I am; and I am very glad to say it affords me intense delight to set him right before the public.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, this is caput mortuum. The Senate this morning disposed of this entire subject.

Mr. VEST. I did not bring it up.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator did not. I am very desirous of going on with the urgent deficiency appropriation bill.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine one question. Does he mean to call the Secretary of Agriculture a deadhead?

Mr. HALE. The Senator himself is entirely competent to answer that question.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I think the Senator from Maine should give way a moment to a further discussion of this subject.

Mr. HALE. I yielded to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. ALLEN], who said he only wanted two minutes, and apparently the whole general debate is going to be reopened. I can not yield for anything further, and I ask that the regular order be proceeded with.

Mr. ALLEN. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me for one second.

Mr. HALE. I have just declined to yield to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] on the same subject-matter. I can not make any discrimination.

Mr. ALLEN. I merely want to say a word now, so that I shall not be compelled to consume the time in making my statement while the bill in charge of the Senator from Maine is under consideration.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Senator would make it then.

Mr. ALLEN. I want to say just one word, and then let the matter drop.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. HALE. While the regular order is under consideration the Senator will find his opportunity. I would not decline to yield if I had not just done the same thing to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well; go ahead.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill (H. R. 4321) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1896, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the heading of "Office of Public Printer," at the top of page 2, to insert:

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

For printing and binding, to be executed under the direction of the Public Printer, as follows:

For the Department of Justice, $3,000.

For the United States Geological Survey, viz: For printing advance copies of papers on the economic resources of the United States, as provided in the sundry civil act of March 2, 1895, $4,000.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I regret very much that the Senator in charge of this bill would not permit a brief statement in answer to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], with reference to the distribution of seeds, that it might go into the RECORD in conjunction with what was then said, but I have observed every time the Appropriations Committee walked into this Chamber with a bill that every other man is supposed to take a back seat and not question their authority or what they want, but to tamely submit to dictation—I was going to say obstreperousness, but perhaps the remark is a little too harsh—until the Appropriations Committee have got through and see fit to announce that they are ready to retire and consider other bills.

I want at this time to record my protest, however feeble it may be—and it no doubt is feeble—against the system which has grown up here—I do not know how long it has been in existence—of the Senator in charge of an appropriation bill walking into the Chamber, buttoning his coat up tight to the throat, and saying, "We want unanimous consent to consider all the committee amendments before any other man is heard," and after that is done to sit like a watchdog and object strenuously to every amendment which may be offered by any other Senator.

I am perfectly willing to concede, Mr. President, that the Committee on Appropriations knows much more than the entire Senate; I think possibly their selection indicates that and forecloses the question, and that we who are sent here to represent States which are not represented on the Committee on Appropriations are supposed not to be interested in the distribution of the public moneys of the country, and that our States shall have no voice whatever in such distribution, except as that voice may be indirectly represented by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. President, I am a little bit loath to say this, because I have some favors to ask of the Appropriations Committee—not favors, but I have some measures which are to go upon appropriation bills, and I am a little loath under those circumstances to make this statement; but it does seem to me that the true and the natural and proper thing to do is to give the entire Senate, as representing the entire nation, an equal opportunity in the formation and enactment of appropriation bills. I do not think it was ever contemplated by the fathers of this country that two or three men should control the appropriations of this nation, amounting to $450,000,000 or $460,000,000 a year.

What I say is not prompted by any personal dislike for any member of the Appropriations Committee, for I think they are all my personal friends—I certainly feel friendly to them—but this practice is raising up in the Senate of the United States a government of the committee. We have been taught to believe, especially we who live away in the interior of the nation and are therefore supposed to know but little about public matters and public measures and public men, that this is a government by the people, for the people, and of the people; but, Mr. President, the American people must unlearn much they have been taught within the last few years. They must learn the great truth that, so far as the Senate of the United States is concerned, it is a government of the committee, by the committee, and generally for the committee, and not for the country.

What is there about these appropriations which are being brought in here from time to time which should give the honorable Senator from Maine, for instance, an opportunity to stand here like a slave driver and crack his whip over the backs of Senators representing other States that are interested in these appropriations? The Senator rises in his place and demands of the Presiding Officer to lay his bill before the Senate, as though that bill had the right of way and as though no other Senator dare open his mouth and speak out upon any subject unless he be a member of that committee.

Sir, the State of Nebraska is not represented upon that committee. We have a million and a half people who are interested in these appropriations and who pay their proportion of the taxes of this country. Why should this committee come in here and undertake to control the affairs of the Senate, and say to me or say to the Senators from any other State who have business before the Senate to be considered: "We are the Appropriations Committee; you must get out of the road. When we want a bill laid before the Senate, we are to have it; and no man dare open his mouth to protest against it."

I asked the honorable Senator from Maine a moment ago to permit me to make a single remark and put it in connection with the remarks of the junior Senator from Missouri on the distribution of seed, and I was snapped off as though I had no right even in this Chamber, to say nothing about rising and addressing the Chair upon any subject. And what was that remark? The honorable Senator from Missouri, with whom I agree in many things, and with whom I agreed this morning in voting for the joint resolution to require the Secretary of Agriculture to purchase seeds, made a statement to the effect that the Secretary of Agriculture had put into the State of Nebraska a greater amount of his distributive portion of seeds than he had put into Kansas, the two Dakotas, and Oklahoma.

Mr. President, that may be true; but what I wanted to correct the Senator from Missouri about—and I should have corrected him with fewer words than I am using now if the Senator from Maine had yielded to me—was the fact that the distribution was an equitable and honorable and proper distribution considering the portions of the States of Kansas and Nebraska and the portions of the Territory of Oklahoma which were drought-stricken, if precedent counted for anything. I am not a political friend or associate of the Secretary of Agriculture; I do not think he entertains a political opinion with which I agree; I think we are entirely antipodal in our political beliefs and political practices; yet, Mr. President, as the head of the Agricultural Department of this nation and as a distinguished citizen of my State, it is eminently proper, and it is due to him, that this statement should go into the RECORD in connection with the statement of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I am more anxious to go on with the bill than to take up any old questions that have already been settled by the Senate with reference to the Committee on Appropriations. The committee has not taken up in an aggressive way the time of the Senate, or even asserted itself during this whole session. We are now in the third month of the session, and this is the first occasion on which the committee has taken up any time. There are four appropriation bills already reported, and the general demand, not by me nor the committee, but from the Senate and the country, is to proceed with their consideration. I have been very moderate about them in every way. I yielded to the Senator from Nebraska at his request to make his statement. Then I yielded to the Senator from Missouri to answer him; and then a general debate sprang up. The Senator from Colorado came in. Then the Senator from Colorado wanted to come in again, and I drew the line on him. I said this is dead matter and I must insist on the regular order. I did just what anyone would have done, and to-morrow the Senator himself, who is at bottom a good-natured man, will not think himself more justified for this little ebullition against the committee than anyone else thinks. He will see that I was very fair with him and very liberal and wanted to give him his chance, but I could not consent that a general debate, in which one Senator and another was springing up, should go on to the exclusion of the pending bill.

This is all I have to say. I hope the reading of the bill will be proceeded with.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. President, I trust the member of the Committee on Appropriations having this bill in charge will not think that I make any criticism upon the committee if I ask why it is that a bill which comes here from the other House for deficiencies carrying $4,421,000 in round numbers carries about $6,000,000 as reported by the Committee on Appropriations? The point to which my question is directed is not so much as to whether the items are necessary as it is to the point whether the House which originates these bills ought not to be made to appropriate for necessary items.

I am not going to inquire at present about the necessity of these items, but for years and years it has been our practice that appropriation bills coming over from the House were constantly enlarged in the Senate upon the plea that the items added in the Senate must be appropriated for in order to carry out law or to pay for expenses already contracted in pursuance of law. I think it is time that that should stop, and so upon this first appropriation bill which has come from the House to the Senate I think that the Appropriations Committee ought to have refused to appropriate for these items, at least to the extent which they have been appropriated for, and it is a good time to make that refusal, because these are deficiencies. This is not the last deficiency that we can or shall have. There are plenty of opportunities for the House to send us further deficiency bills, and they always do so. If these items are matters which the Government must pay, and which must be appropriated for, I would very much prefer for one that the Senate Committee on Appropriations had refused to add them and had taken the bill as it came from the House. I think if the committee would do that and the Senate would do it we should very soon have a different practice from what has heretofore prevailed.

It is said here in the Senate—it has been said during the discussions relating to the distribution of appropriation bills—that the House deliberately sends bills here for less than they ought to amount to for the purpose of having the Senate add to them. It seems to me that the matter of originating appropriations belongs in the House; that it belongs to the committees of the House having the appropriations in charge, and that the duty of the Senate should be rather a supervisory duty with reference to the appropriation bills—an examination to see whether the items appropriated by the House are to carry out existing law or to pay for bills which have been contracted under existing law, and not to take up here in the Senate the business of the partial origination of appropriation bills, for that is what we are doing here, and what we have been doing every year.

